

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

In accordance with the announcement made a short time ago, the publication of the Library is resumed. The disorders of the currency have, it is hoped, been in a great degree removed, and the intense political excitement has subsided. The public mind seeks relief; and what can better administer it, than the delightful influence of calm, literary pursuits? We turn, too, to the domestic circle, and desire to participate again in its virtuous pleasures.

The means, the inclination, and the leisure, necessary to the enjoyment of "Waldie," are thus afforded. Contemporaneously, the severe bodily disease, which had paralysed the energies of the proprietor, has been mitigated; and he has been, for some time, preparing to renew his intercourse with his former friends, with enlarged means of imparting pleasure and instruction. With lively emotions, he finds himself again in the enjoyment of his former relations with numerous friends; from very many of whom, though personally unknown, he has received testimonials of approbation and friendship, which have relieved the pains of severe disease, and which it becomes him, on this occasion, to acknowledge with deep sensibility. To these friends, it is unnecessary to delineate the plan hitherto pursued, and still to be adhered to, in the conduct of the Library. But to those who are unacquainted with its character, it is necessary to address some words of explanation. They will be few; for it becomes us simply to describe the Library, and not to praise it.

The object of the Library is chiefly to impart instruction—but always in an agreeable and entertaining form. We contemplate the publication of "light literature," using the term in its best sense. History written with good sense and animation, biographies and memoirs of eminent persons, voyages, travels, and miscellaneous works, containing desirable information, with occasionally a superior novel or tale, make up nearly the whole sphere in which we wish to move.

As a favourite object is to obtain—may we not say retain?—for the Library a high place in the confidence of the domestic circle, we shall always claim and exercise the privilege of pruning the works we shall republish of every word which could cause the slightest confusion, if read aloud among the most fastidious.

Experience has shown that the Library can furnish a family with almost as much light literature as it will desire, and at a very trifling expense. In a single year, at an expense to our subscribers of only five dollars, we have published from thirty to forty London volumes, which would cost, if purchased at the book-sellers, at least fifty to sixty dollars; besides a large number of selections from the best British periodicals.

Thus much of the plan of the Library. The proprietor has employed the term of its suspension in devising and preparing new means of fully executing that plan; and he believes he has made arrangements, which will render the Library more worthy of the favour which has been so liberally awarded to it. He has engaged the assistance, in the editorial department, of John Sanderson, Esq., of this city, a gentleman whose literary accomplishments and productions are very favourably known; and whose extensive acquaintance with persons of the best literary taste and acquirements will enable him to enrich the Library from their stores, and guide it with reference to their judgments.

Some time ago, in consequence of the determination of the post-master general to impose postage upon the cover, (on which appears the Journal of Belles Lettres,) it was proposed to issue instead, a monthly number containing the Journal for the month. The change was resolved upon reluctantly; because a weekly miscellany, accompanying and enlivening each number, was believed to be a valuable part of the Library. The proprietor announces with pleasure, that he has devised a plan by which this valuable accompaniment may be retained. The Journal of Belles Lettres will be printed on the two external leaves of each number. These two leaves may be removed, leaving the remaining leaves in a fit state to be bound. In order that the capacity of the Library may not be diminished, five numbers will be given monthly.

A typographical improvement has been made at the suggestion of some of the former readers of the Library. A new and larger type has been procured, (on which this number is printed,) which will be read with greater satisfaction than that formerly used.

Finally, the punctuality in issuing each number, which failed not once in seven years, will be a sufficient guarantee, it is hoped, for the regular publication of the Library hereafter.

JESSE'S MEMOIRS.

We shall be obliged to retrench something from this book to accommodate it to our occidental side of the sea, but enough will be left to divert, and we hope instruct, our readers. They will find at the outset, a chapter for that genuine subject of memoirs, James himself, followed by the other most distinguished persons of his time—a chapter for the Archbishop of Canterbury, one for the great "secretary of nature," and one of equal length for Arceus the Fool. By the by, Arceus is represented to be not only witty, but a very shrewd, honest, and intelligent personage. A pity it sometimes is that the fool cannot change caps with the monarch. The apposition of Arceus and Lord Bacon conveys a reluctant intimation to the mind that wise men are not always the "better sort of fools." A chapter, too, is allotted to that eminent and supercilious individual, who was served up by the Duke of Buckingham in a pie, Sir Jeffery Hudson—a kind of pocket Hercules, who mixed in chivalric exploits, and killed his man in a duel, as was to be expected. He was eighteen inches high, and is preserved in a full-length picture by Vandyke.

The second series includes the Protectorate, in which so many of the fiercest passions of human nature were brought into conflict by religious and political excitement—and Charles the Second. There is much in the latter portion too significant of the times. Is it not a pity to efface the beauties? We remember the gratification we enjoyed at Hampton Court in contemplating the pretty group by Lely, who had a sense of female beauty, on the side of its frailties, beyond all others of the brush—Castlemaine, who loved every body, Churchill and the king, and Jacob Hill—made a rope-dancer the rival of majesty, yet so pretty, the gods laughed at her perjuries, for she became no uglier by a single black tooth or nail, but walked forth more the care of love than before. She at her side, who began the world plain Mrs. Palmer, is Duchess of Cleveland. And next, with indolent languor, affected and sentimental coquetry, fair hair and complexion, is the graceful form of Middleton.

"Helas! avec tant d'attraits précieux, Qui n'eut été friponne!"

Lady Denham, too!—Sir John wrote Cooper's Hill, and married Miss Brook. He should have married Miss Brook first. Vain man at seventy! who hoped to reign in a heart of eighteen, and be exempt from the general calamity. Poor Denham! thou wert cut off in the flower of age and beauty, leaving a heart-broken and jealous husband to deplore thy loss—not without the reputation of having poisoned his wife. And the Duchess of Portsmouth, the little French bribe, who was given by Louis with 200,000 francs a year to "settle popery in England." The tall, slim, erect, and graceful form of Stewart, who without art—by the sole dint of looking pretty, supplanted Castlemaine—lived in the very air of Cyprus, and kept herself (they say) almost honest for her legitimate lord, the Duke of Richmond. She on the left, of the same height and grace, and a face replete with sense and beauty, in spite of her little eyes and turn-up nose, is Hamilton, Countess of Grammont. And she next? The orange girl, the rival of Portsmouth, (le roi m'aime autant que sa Portsmouth—Nell,) of such impassioned and benevolent beauty—one wishes to call her Eleanor—it is Nell Gwynn! Anne Hyde, the tall and stately Clarendon's daughter, mistress and duchess of York, and mother of two queens, overlooks the whole. To her we owe this little court. It was she who commissioned Lely to snatch these beauties from the scythe of time. One only is wanting—the more remarkable for this. The barbarous Westphalian has let the frail and gentle Chesterfield slip through the fingers of posterity. Any one curious of this kind of lore, who can read De Grammont, will, neither on the score of grace nor propriety, regret Jesse.

Such works as this are to be counted amongst the luxuries of literature. It is delightful, in these days of improved steamboats and universal travel, to go back into the past ages for novelty; for what is so little new now-a-days as the "latest news," a day old? Such works, too, relieve the reader from the toil of research, and bring into view what many a one would never have sought in the grim looking tomes in which it is shelved only for the profound scholar. Who is going to wade through the collections of Rushworth, Ludlow, Clarendon, or Walker?—surely not that perpetual man of business, the American. Our encyclopedical list of studies is too extensive for even antediluvian longevity; and what is to be done by one of us frail and ephemeral beings, who is outlived by a beetle? One of the advantages of this book, is the comparison it enables us to institute, in many particulars, between the new world and the old, and between the present and preceding ages. This comparison seems much in our favour as regards several of the commandments, and notably the fourth. King James, by his royal edict, ordered that his subjects should be indulged in dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May-games, and Morris dances on Sunday. This Jesse calls shedding "a gleam of sunshine upon the broad shadows of human wretchedness." In the last reign but two, Lady Huntingdon's daughter could not hold her office in the bed-chamber, for, being a Methodist, she was averse to playing cards with the princesses on Sunday. We have the advantage, too, (who would think it?) on the score of cleanliness. The Countess of Dorset says, on quitting the palace of James, she found herself infested (not with bugs) with a vermin "scarcely considered delicate to mention;" and in the succeeding reign, Pepys, who kept a journal, writes as follows, under February 12th, "Up, finding the beds good, only—only infested with the vermin whose very name is now considered indelicate." Sydney Smith says, in the face of Erasmus, that "no English gentleman has spat upon the floor since the Heptarchy;" and English gentlemen, when they visit us now-a-days, are disgusted at not finding French cooks, and other epicurean delicacies, even beyond the Alleghany. Revels and complotions, also, of the higher classes at least, have undergone a salutary change. Jesse has signalized James's revels, and Pepys speaks thus of Charles II.:—"Let us drink the king's health, said some one. Why let us, said the king. Nay, you must do it on your knees. So he did, and so did all the company; and having done it, they all fell a crying for joy, and kissing one another—the king the Duke of York, and the Duke of York the king, and in such a maudlin pickle as never people were, and so passed the day." Men are yet living who made a fortune by the regular business of picking up drunken gentlemen in the night about the streets of London. At present, no gentleman at a dinner ever exceeds the bounds of "moderate Bacchus."

In reading the Protectorate, to observe the change from Puritanism to the merry times of Charles, is a curious speculation. For a long time, laughing seemed to be a modulation of face to which the English muscles were entirely disused. That they were thus suddenly relaxed, is a phenomenon in physics, if not in morals.

All authorities—romance and history—work together unmercifully to the prejudice of James. Every one knows the indignant manner in which Hume breaks from the enumeration of his weaknesses. "History charges itself willingly with a relation of the great crimes, and still more with that of the great virtues, of mankind; but she appears to fall from her dignity, when necessitated to dwell on such frivolous events and ignoble personages." And so he gives up the pedantry, self-conceit, the puns, the quirks, and solemn trifling of James to the writers of memoirs. In the work before us, he is treated as indolent, a spendthrift, egregiously vain, a hypo-cite and buffoon, and getting drunk and swearing habitually; otherwise, a very unexceptionable person, having an almost Judaical antipathy to pigs and a pious horror of tobacco. Jesse attempts to vindicate him from the charge of pedantry. It is certain that he learned at school more than the quantity of Latin usually administered to kings, and that he took for his model Solomon, whom he followed with great emulation. Whether he had a head properly timbered for Latin or other learning, will be best ascertained from the actions of his life.

If kings were remarkably great and good men, republicanism would go out of fashion. But—tyrants apart—when you have read of Charles the Bald, and Charles the Fat, and Charles the Simple, their story is told. A man of even tolerable merit, such as Henry IV., passes among kings for a sort of miracle. Temples are built, and incense is burnt upon his altars. The best advocates of democracy, after all, are kings. This opinion is uttered from no spite at nobility or monarchy. Such a sentiment is not necessary to the preservation of the republic. At least the Romans, who would as lief see his Satanic majesty rule at Rome as a king, were not the more preserved for their royal antipathies. A man of good taste will no more wish the monarchy of England, with its machinery of nobles, banished from their island, than the gods and goddesses from the Iliad or Odyssey. Kings are good things, if only to make novels out of. One likes to be vexed at refined and dignified distresses, and to laugh at the expense of one's betters. Walter Scott has turned both James and his successor in this way to good account.

The style of Jesse's book is correct, harmonious, and sometimes elegant; but rather aiming at the dignity of history, than the easier graces of the memoir. He has said nothing new, and is not always correct in his anecdote. He sometimes takes "Pierre pour Thomas." An observation made by Queen Elizabeth to Nicholas Bacon about his villa, is applied to Francis; and at page 220, Vol. II, he says, "Richelieu, however, triumphed over his rival, though Buckingham did not live to see it. After the death of her husband, Louis the Thirteenth, the queen united herself to the cardinal, his sacerdotal habit, as he had never taken priest's orders, proving no obstacle to their union. Richelieu soon grew tired of her, and treated her unkindly." Now the fact is, that the cardinal died December 4th, 1642, and Louis in the following May, 1643, in consequence of which, the cardinal did not marry the widow, and being dead, did not treat her unkindly.

There is a charm about memoirs which no other species of writing possesses, so fond is the world of tittle-tattle. A language follows the genius and habits of the people who speak it. The French are the only truly social people, and of all the world, the only people who can talk, write letters, and make anais, vaudevilles, and memoirs. We call to witness, Froissart,

Memoirs of the Court of England
DURING THE REIGN OF THE STUARTS, INCLUDING THE PROTECTORATE.
BY JOHN HENRAGE JESSE.

PREFACE.

It is a fact, which cannot have escaped observation, that while French Literature abounds with private memoirs and personal anecdote, our own is deplorably deficient in agreeable chronicles of this nature. To the author, or rather compiler, of this work, the want appeared to be less owing to the absence of materials, than to a requisite diligence in bringing them to light; in a word, that there existed a supply of latent stores in our own language (buried, as it were, among voluminous records and forgotten pamphlets) sufficient to form a succinct social history of distinguished characters, who figure more or less in every portion of our annals.

With this view of the subject, it occurred to the author that the private history of the Reigns of the Stuarts and of the Protectorate,—their families, and others intimately connected with the Court,—would present a series of agreeable and instructive anecdotes; would furnish the means of introducing the reader to the principal personages of their day, and of exhibiting the monarch and the statesman in their undress; while, at the same time, it would afford an insight into human character, and a picture of the manners of the age.

It could not escape the author, that some of the anecdotes contained in the present volumes, have already appeared in more than one popular work of modern date. But it would have been impossible for him to follow out his intended plan, and to give a complete and distinct form to his sketches, without partially treading in the footsteps of other writers; in those instances, however, where he has been compelled to make use of the same materials, his researches, whenever it was practicable, have been extended to the fountain-head.

The author now ventures to put forth the present volumes as a portion only of his labours. Should others agree with him in thinking that a work like the present has, in any degree supplied a desideratum in our literature, he will consider himself fully repaid for the trouble it has cost him; at the same time, he is free to confess that he would have been as well pleased, had the task fallen into abler hands.

JAMES I.

CHAP. I.

The reign of James the First is eminently deficient in matters of stirring and general interest. A timid prince, a people not discontented, a long peace abroad, and a tolerably submissive parliament at home, supply but meagre materials to the historian. It is not, therefore, too much to expect, that, in the private history of the individual, in the manners of the time, and the intrigues of the court, some slight compensation may be found for the absence of more important events.

The peaceable career of James, and his unwarlike character, are the more remarkable, when we reflect on the eventful history of the unhappy and turbulent race from whence he sprang. With the Stuarts, misfortune had been hereditary. For six generations, his immediate ancestors, with the single exception of a broken heart, had met with violent and untimely ends. His mother had suffered on the scaffold, and his father fell by the hand of an assassin; and it is singular that James should have stood between two crowned heads, his mother and his heir, who were the first and almost only instances in modern times of the sovereign suffering by the hands of the executioner. It would appear indeed as if Providence had conferred a peculiar blessing on the peace-maker. His ancestors, fond of war and familiar with bloodshed, had with difficulty retained possession of their birthrights, while James, who even shuddered at the sight of a drawn sword, became master of a kingdom threefold the value of his inheritance. We must remember, however, that in James the love of peace was less the effect of principle than of constitutional infirmity.

The slight differences which occurred during this reign to ruffle the quiet tenor of public feeling, arose almost entirely from subjects of a religious or parliamentary nature. It was solely the fault of James that his career at home was not in every respect as peaceable as it was abroad. His endeavours to encroach on public liberty caused, in a great degree, the opposition of his parliament: his attempts to conciliate all parties, in matters of religion, ended in his satisfying none. The great source of interest which his reign produces, is derived from the gradual advances which were effected in parliamentary liberty. With little to engage their attention abroad, the Commons began to be jealous of their privileges, and the nation at large of its rights; these are the circumstances which throw a peculiar, and almost the sole political interest over the reign of James. It is as curious as it is instructive to watch the birth of that spark, which burst forth in the wild rage for liberty in the succeeding reign. James had really less of the despot in him than Elizabeth; but the nation could bear the golden chains of the one, while it contemned the clumsy fetters of the other.

James the First was born in Edinburgh castle, 19th June, 1566. The apartment in which he first saw the light was, within the last few years, and probably still is, a guard-room for soldiers. In those who are influenced by local associations, that apartment must still excite no slight degree of interest; less, perhaps, as the birthplace of James, than as being identified with the sorrows of Mary Stuart. The clouds of misfortune had gathered fast around that beautiful but imprudent woman. She had irretrievably disgusted her nobility by her impolitic preference of the arrogant Italian Rizzio, and her people by her open exercise of the Romish faith; her misunderstandings with her husband, the weak and showy Lord Darnley, had produced positive hatred and consequent misery on both sides. The ministers of the Puritan or Reformed Church, were daily intruding their conscientious brutality in her presence, or promulgating their rebellious tenets among her subjects; and, within a very short period, the blood of her favourite servant Rizzio had been actually shed before her face,—a remarkable scene of violence, when we consider that her own husband, who ought to have been the first to cherish the wife who was shortly to become a mother, and the Lord Chancellor, who should have been foremost to protect the laws and the person of his queen, were the principal actors in that detestable outrage.

The queen and the Puritan clergy were equally anxious to baptize the heir to the throne, according to the ceremonies of their respective faiths. An assembly of the church, which happened to be convened at Edinburgh at the time, while they sent to congratulate the unfortunate mother, expressed their great solicitude on the subject. The superintendent of Lothian, a man of a milder nature than his fellows, was their delegate on the occasion. Mary received him with her usual sweetness, but returned no answer as regarded the principal object of his mission. She sent, however, for the royal infant in order to introduce the superintendent to his future king. The minister fell on his knees and breathed a short prayer for his welfare; he then took the babe in his arms and playfully told him to say amen for himself, which the queen, says Archbishop Spotswood, "took in such good part as continually afterwards to call the superintendent her Amen." This story, in after life, was repeated to James, who, from that period, always addressed the superintendent by the same familiar name.*

Immediately after the birth of the prince, Sir James Melvil was despatched by Mary to convey the intelligence to her sister, the Queen of England. The account which Melvil gives of this mission is perhaps the most amusing part of his memoirs. Elizabeth was in high spirits, enjoying herself at a ball at Greenwich, when the event was announced to her. Notwithstanding her habitual self-command, and the fact that the possibility of such an event must have been long a source of anxiety, the jealous feelings of the woman prevailed, and her chagrin was but too evident. The dancing instantly ceased, and the queen sat down in her chair, leaning her head upon her hand, and remaining for some time speechless. "The Queen of Scots," she said to one of her ladies who inquired the cause of her melancholy, "is the mother of a fair son, while I am but a barren stock." She did not fail, however, to call dissimulation to her aid, and the next morning, when Melvil received his audience, she appeared gayer and better dressed than usual; and, though she deceived no one but herself, expressed the sincerest affection for the Queen of Scots, and joy at her happy delivery.

The innocent cause of this jealousy was baptised at Stirling, 17th December, 1566, by the Bishop of St. Andrews, according to the rites of the Romish Church. Such of the Scottish nobles as professed the reformed religion absented themselves from the ceremony. His godfathers were the King of France and Philibert Duke of Savoy; Elizabeth consented to be his godmother, and by her representative, the Earl of Bedford, sent a present of a golden font, valued at three thousand crowns. After the conclusion of the ceremony, the young prince was publicly proclaimed by the hereditary titles of Prince and Steward of Scotland, Duke of Rothsay, Earl of Carrick, Lord of the Isles, and Baron of Renfrew. According to Sir Theodore Mayerne, who subsequently became the physician of James, the wet nurse of the young prince was a drunkard, and it was owing to her milk becoming thus vitiated, that, though early weaned, he was unable to walk alone before his sixth year.*

The birth of an heir to the throne ought not only to have added to Mary's influence at home; but, with proper management, Elizabeth might have been forced to acknowledge her as her successor to the crown of England. Nothing, however, could exceed Mary's egregious imprudence and, shall we add, iniquity, at this period. Within the short space of two years, the greater number of loose incidents occurred which have thrown so much of fearful, yet romantic, interest over her history. The murder of her husband, and her consequent marriage with Bothwell; the insurrection of Lord Hume; her confinement and forced abdication at Lochleven; her romantic escape from that fortress; the battle of Langside; and her flight into England—are all included in that period, and closed every hope of her again enjoying the sovereign dignity. In order, however, to weaken her remaining influence still more, and to strengthen the claims of her son, it was decided that the young prince, though only thirteen months old, should be solemnly crowned in her stead. The inauguration of the royal baby was performed at Stirling by the Bishop of Orkney, 29th July, 1567. The coronation sermon was preached by the celebrated John Knox; and the oaths, that he should maintain the reformed religion, and administer equal justice, were somewhat unscrupulously taken by the Earl of Merton and Lord Home.† Soon after the ceremony, the republican party, whose hopes were naturally elated by the events which were taking place, caused a coin to be struck, on which was inscribed the well-known motto of Trajan: Pro me; si merear, in me.—"For me; and if I deserve it, against me."

James was a pedant even when a boy. His tutor, the famous historian Buchanan, though he communicated to him a portion of his learning, imparted but little of his own elegant taste to his royal pupil. In the treatment of his charge, he appears not only to have been laudably uninfluenced by rank and circumstance, but to have behaved himself towards James as the most rigid disciplinarian. On one occasion the young king was engaged in some boisterous sport, with his playfellow the Master of Erskine, at a time when Buchanan was deeply engaged in his studies. The tutor was annoyed, and declared that he would administer a sound flogging if the interruption continued. James announced stoutly that he should like to see who would bell the cat; at which the tutor started up, threw away his book, and performed the threatened chastisement most effectually. To his playfellow, the young Earl of Mar, James ever continued his regard. The earl afterwards became enamoured of Mary Stuart, daughter of Esme Duke of Lennox, and on her rejecting him, became the victim of despondency, and fell seriously ill. "By my saul," said James, "Mar shanna dee for e'er a lass in the land!" Accordingly he interfered in favour of his early companion, and Lady Mary eventually became his wife, and the mother of his children.

Such an impression had Buchanan's discipline produced on the mind of James, that many years afterwards, when King of England, the miseries of his tutelage, and the austerity of his old master, continued vividly to haunt his imagination. He used to say of a certain person about his court, that he trembled at his approach, "he reminded him so of his pedagogue."‡ And on another occasion, he is described as dreadfully agitated by the appearance of his former corrector in a dream, and as vainly endeavoring to soften the fanciful displeasure which he had incurred.† It may be observed, that in his writings, James more than once speaks slightly, and even acrimoniously, of his old tutor.

The elegant Buchanan was far from satisfied with the mere progress which his pupil had made in classical and theological learning. At a certain audience, which was given by James to a foreign ambassador in his boyhood, it was found necessary that the conversation should take place in Latin. The foreigner happened to be guilty of several grammatical errors, in every one of which James, with equal pedantry and ill-breeding, thought proper to set him right. The ambassador accidentally meeting Buchanan, after the audience was at an end, inquired of him how he came to make his illustrious pupil a pedant. "I was happy," said the historian, "to be able to accomplish even that."‡

CHAPTER II.

In his thirteenth year James began to interfere with affairs of state, and met his parliament for the first time. He said a great deal respecting the benefits of peace, and mentioned his anxiety to maintain the interests of the reformed religion, and to remedy public grievances.§ Probably, young as he was, James had some hand, if not in the composition of, at least in the matters to be discussed in, this juvenile oration. At all events, it is curious to find him commencing his first speech with the subject of peace; a principle and a topic on which he acted and harped to the last.

He showed his aversion to business at a very early age; so much so, that he was in the habit of signing whatever papers were brought to him, without either reading or making himself acquainted with their contents. To correct this pernicious habit, his tutor Buchanan adopted the following scheme:—one day, when the young king was preparing to set out on a hunting excursion, he placed before him a document containing a formal abdication of his kingdom. It was signed, as usual, without inquiry into its purport. On the return of James in the evening, Buchanan produced the paper, and pointed out its contents. At the sight of what he had done, the king burst into tears. Buchanan comforted him by throwing the document into the fire; at the same time seizing the opportunity of enlarging on the injustice which he might be guilty of to others, as well as to himself, should he hereafter persist in so indolent and injurious a practice.*

James's tears at this period seemed to have been easily brought to his assistance. When, in 1582, in his seventeenth year, his person was seized at Ruthven by the rebel lords, his first impulse was to weep. "No matter for his tears," said the Master of Glamis; "it is better that boys should weep than bearded men."†

From a person who felt his own griefs so deeply, we can scarcely expect much sympathy with the sufferings of others. His cold indifference at his mother's death, and his previous lukewarm interposition with Elizabeth in her behalf, can never be sufficiently reprobated. Of an age when the best feelings of our nature are generally warmest in the heart; with a chivalrous nobility urging him to avenge the unparalleled indignity which had been offered both to himself and his country; with the means of obtaining powerful foreign aid both from France and Spain,‡ James, with the exception of some slight blustering, (arising less from any feeling which he entertained for his mother's dreadful situation, than from the apprehension that her death on the scaffold would interfere with his own prospects,) submitted tamely to his own dishonour, and the ignominious execution of his only parent. There can be no question that, as a matter of mere policy, James acted wisely in not breaking with Elizabeth; but who can forgive the man, who, on so sacred a subject, prefers the cold dictates of interest to the common impulse of natural affection? Alas! James had a pension to lose, and a kingdom in prospect. And how does he act when he finds that his mother's death is fully agreed upon, and that her days are numbered? He sends to the principal divines to desire that they will pray for her in their churches. It is an undoubted fact, that the Master of Gray, James's accredited agent to intercede with Elizabeth for his mother's life, and who, the king must have been well aware, was entirely in the interest of the English queen, if he were not actually in her pay, gave private intimation to the English ministry, that if Mary's execution would not be allowed to prejudice James's expectations to the English throne, "her death would be forgotten."§ The Master of Gray afterwards confessed before the Scottish council, that he had, in fact, advised the Queen of England to take away the life of her rival; recommending, only, that she should be made away with by some underhand means, instead of by a public execution. He acknowledged, also, that he had made use of the significant words, Mortui non mordent. "The dead do not bite." He was sentenced to banishment; a decision much caviled at, at the time, for its extreme leniency.||

The ruling and obstinate idea which occupied the mind of James, was an apprehension lest the manner of his mother's death should prove a bar to his own succession to the English throne. It was this selfish fear, and not the affront to his feelings or his diadem, which we find the English ministers most anxious to combat. Even previous to the death of the unhappy Mary, the Earl of Leicester, probably by Elizabeth's directions, addressed a letter to James, in which, though clothed in the most Jesuitical language, he points out the worldly advantages which would accrue to him by submitting quietly to his mother's execution, and even indirectly asks his concurrence. To any other monarch but James, the insolence and bad taste of such an epistle would have been intolerable. "She is the person and prince in this world," says the earl, speaking of Elizabeth, "that may do you most good or most harm; let no persuasion or desire let you think otherwise."* And again Lord Hudson writes to him after the fatal blow had been struck, offering to procure a declaration, signed by all the judges in England, that the execution of his mother could in no way interfere with his legitimate claims.

We are informed, though the authority is questionable, that when Henry the Fourth sent his ambassador, Sully to James, inviting him to join with him against Elizabeth, by which means he might satisfy his revenge, the young king answered, that he was unwilling to fall out with the Queen of England, for his mother's death had left him more secure on the throne than ever.† The Scottish nobles were greatly disgusted at the indifference of their young prince. Instead of appearing in mourning, as had been ordered by the king, Lord Sinclair presented himself at court in full armour, as the garb best suited to the occasion.‡

It has been already remarked, that in his mother's extremity, James had applied to the principal ministers of religion to remember her in their prayers. This order, with the exception of his own chaplains, and a Mr. David Lindsay, the minister at Leith, was universally disobeyed. James, indeed, was treated quite as cavalierly by the Scottish clergy (and stood just as much in awe of them) as by his nobility. The following anecdote is highly characteristic of his suberviency to the Puritan priesthood, and of the pulpit familiarity which was permitted at the time. James had fixed on a particular day, on which prayers were to be offered up for his unfortunate mother in the several churches, and had selected the Bishop of St. Andrew's to officiate in his own presence on the occasion. As soon as this order became known to the principal opposititionists, they induced a young man, a Mr. John Cowper, to ascend the pulpit, and to forestall the bishop in the performance of the service of the day. The king, says Archbishop Spotswood, seeing Cowper in the place, called to him from his seat, and said, "Mr. John, that seat was destined for another; yet since you are there, if you will obey the charge that is given, and remember my mother in your prayers, you shall go on." Cowper replying that he would do as the Spirit of God should direct him, was commanded to leave the place. This order he showed no inclination to obey: accordingly the captain of the guard proceeded to pull him out; on which he burst forth as follows; "This day shall be a witness against the king, in the great day of the Lord," and then denouncing a wo to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, he went down, and the Bishop of St. Andrew's performed the duty.§

James was, to a certain degree, indebted for these insults to the discussion of familiar subjects, and the personal allusions which he himself encouraged in the pulpit. This taste continued to the last period of his life; nor was he ever known to be displeased as long as the preacher hit his courtiers somewhat harder than himself. Even when seated on the English throne, a conscientious, or perhaps discontented, clergyman would occasionally proceed to such lengths as to keep the courtiers in continual alarm, lest any thing disagreeable to the king, or injurious to their own interests, should transpire. On these occasions they distracted his majesty's attention by the best means in their power. A jest well introduced, or a facetious remark, seldom failed in such an emergency. Among those who were best acquainted with James's character, and who thus pandered to his amusement, was Neile, Bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbishop of York.* This prelate was constantly at James's side, and whenever any thing was uttered, especially from the pulpit, which he was unwilling should meet the royal ear, diverted the king's attention by some "merry tale." Arthur Wilson was himself present at a sermon which was preached before James at Greenwich, when the following remarkable scene took place. The preacher, one of the royal chaplains, selected for his text, Matt. iv. 8. "And the devil took Jesus to the top of a mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world, saying, 'All these will I give,' " &c. He first proceeded to demonstrate the power of the devil at that period; he then brought his kingdom down to the present time, expressing his belief that, as the devil was in possession of such large dominions, there could be no doubt but that he had his viceroys, councillors of state, treasurers, secretaries, &c. This gave him an opportunity of attributing the several vices, of which James's advisers were accused, to the ministers of his Satanic majesty, and portraying their characters accordingly. At last he came to the devil's treasurer, when he fixed his eyes on the Earl of Cranfield, a man notorious for his exactions, and lord treasurer at the time, and pointing at him with his hand, exclaimed in an emphatic manner, "That man," (repeating the words,) "that man, who makes himself rich and his master poor, is a fit treasurer for the devil." Cranfield all this time sat with his hat over his eyes, ashamed to look up; while James, who was placed above him, sat smiling, like a mischievous schoolboy, at his minister's discomfiture.

A treaty of marriage between James and Anne, daughter of Frederick, King of Denmark, had been set on foot as early as the year 1585, though not fully concluded till 1587. The death of the Danish king in this latter year still further delayed the completion of the marriage. When the match with Denmark was first proposed to James, he is said to have displayed the grossest ignorance as to the history and respectability of that country, and to have objected to the alliance on the ground of the unworthiness of that kingdom to furnish him with a consort.* Every thing, however, was at length settled. The marriage ceremony had been performed in Denmark, by proxy, in August, 1589, and James was anxiously expecting the arrival of his bride, when he received the news that she had been driven on the coast of Norway, and had determined to defer her voyage till the spring. It is amusing to discover a solemn historian of the period gravely attributing these delays to the machinations of witches. One Agnes Simson, "a matron of a grave and settled behaviour," actually confessed, that, at the instigation of the Earl of Bothwell, she had applied to her familiar spirit, (whom she was in the habit of invoking by the words holla, Master.) to take away the king's life. The demon, she said, had informed her, that on this occasion his powers had failed him; giving her his reasons in French, a language of which she was ignorant, though she was able to repeat the actual words of the spirit—il est homme de Dieu;† a compliment to James, which he, no doubt, fully appreciated.

* Richard Neile, the son of a tallow-chandler, was born in King Street, Westminster. He rose, by a rapid gradation of preferment, to be master of the Savoy, Dean of Westminster, and successively, Bishop of Rochester, Litchfield and Coventry, Lincoln, Durham, Winchester, and Archbishop of York. Both Pryme and Wilson accuse him of Arminianism, but his orthodoxy is defended by Laud. "He died," says Anthony Wood, "as full of years as he was of honour, an affectionate subject to his prince, an indulgent father to his clergy, a bountiful patron to his chaplains, and a true friend to all who relied upon him." He was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Fasti Oxoniensis, vol. i. p. 159.

Notwithstanding the powers of witchcraft, and the terrors of the sea, of which latter James stood greatly in awe, he was so eager to behold his future consort as to determine on proceeding in person to Norway for the purpose of conducting her home;‡ the only act of gallantry on his part which history has been able to record.

James set sail, October 22, 1589, and after a prosperous voyage arrived at Norway, not far from Upsalo, where the Princess of Denmark had taken refuge; and where the marriage was eventually solemnized. His dread of the sea is mentioned by more than one writer, and in his farewell manifesto he himself alludes to his anxiety on the subject: "As for my part, what moved me, ye may judge by that which I have already said,

‡ The interest which he took in the approaching ceremony is discoverable by a letter which he addressed to Lord Burghley, and which is still preserved among the Lansdown MSS. In this epistle he particularly recommends to his lordship's favour some merchants whom he has sent to London, to purchase dresses for the interesting occasion.

Right Trusty and Well-Beloved,

We greet you heartily well. Having directed the bearers, Robert Jowise and Thomas Feslie, merchants of Edinburgh, toward London for buying and provision of certain abulzementis and other ornaments requisite for decoration of our marriage, we have taken occasion to recommend them to your great courtesy, heartily requesting and desiring you to interpose your good will and mind to their expedition and furtherance in that concern, so that they be in no wise interrupted nor hindered in the performance and execution thereof, but may receive quick and hasty despatch; as ye will report our right special and hearty thanks and do us acceptable pleasure. besides the shortness of the way, the surety of the passage being clear of all sands, forelands, or such like dangers; the harbours in these parts so sure, and no foreign fleets resorting upon these seas."

Shortly after the marriage ceremony, James proceeded with his bride to pay a visit to the court of Denmark, where he remained during the winter, and did not return to his dominions till May 20, 1590.* During his stay in Denmark, he constantly attended the courts of law, with the object of obtaining an insight into the legislature of that country; he afterwards, according to Daines Barrington, added to the Scottish law three statutes for the punishment of criminals, which he had borrowed from the Danish Code.†

The day following the arrival of the royal party in Edinburgh, the Council met for the purpose of fixing a day for the queen's coronation. There happened to be no bishop in Edinburgh at the time, and the clergyman, whom James had honoured by selecting him to perform the office, positively refused to officiate, unless the ceremony of unction, which he asserted to be papistical and of Jewish origin, were omitted. James was obstinate on the subject, and so was the clergyman, who, moreover, was supported in his opposition by the principal puritan ministers. The consequence was, that a very learned discussion was carried on between James and the church, in which, as regarded controversial skill and theological knowledge, the king certainly proved his superiority. It was only, however, by threatening that he would wait the arrival of a bishop, that a divine, Andrew Melvil, rather than that the ceremony should be Episcopalian, consented to perform it as the king wished.‡ The court put forth its rude splendour on this occasion. There was a succession of banquets and masks; and the rejoicings lasted for two months.

CHAPTER III.

The Gowrie conspiracy, by which we are to understand the real or pretended attempt on the life of James, by the Earl of Gowrie and his brother, Alexander Ruthven, is too memorable and too mysterious an event to be passed over in silence. We must recollect, that it has not to this day been clearly ascertained, whether there were really a treasonable intention on the part of Gowrie, or whether the plot were not altogether a specious contrivance of the king, in order to get rid of a dangerous subject.

The suspected conspirators were the sons of that Earl of Gowrie who had been executed some years previously for seizing James's person at Ruthven. Soon after his father's death, the young earl had permission to travel abroad, and it is said that, at Padua, he adopted an heraldic device on which were a hand and a sword aiming at a crown. There is another story, that, when at Orleans, a fortune-teller predicted to him that he should become melancholy from the effect of love, that he should be possessed of great power, and that he should die by the sword.§ On his way home he paid a visit to the court of Elizabeth, on which occasion he is said to have fixed his affections on the unfortunate Arabella Stuart.

James, who had previously restored him to his father's honours and estates, received him with much kindness on his return; his brother Alexander he made a gentleman of the bed-chamber, and on his sister he conferred one of the principal posts about the queen.* The character of the earl, at this period, appears to have been drawn according to the political prejudices of the different writers. By one party he is described as proud, insolent, and ambitious; by the other, as amiable, kind-hearted, and strictly disposed to the duties of religion. At the time of the plot, he had only just completed his twenty-first year, while his brother was but nineteen.

Previous to fixing a crime on a suspected person, the first step is to investigate the motive which he might have had in view. In the present instance, two inducements have been mentioned—the desire to revenge the death of a father, and the hope of supplanting James on the throne. The first of these suppositions clearly loses its weight from the fact, that the earl was put to death during the minority of the king, who could therefore have had no voice on the occasion. With regard to the second deduction, it appears, to say the least, extremely improbable, that so very young a man, without any adequate force, without the remotest probability of ultimate success, should have been rash enough to embark in so hazardous an enterprise. The circumstances, as regards the supposed attempt on James's person, are commonly related as follows:

The king was residing at Falkland for the purpose of indulging in his favourite sport of hunting, and on the morning of 5th August, 1600, was sallying forth with his hounds, when Alexander Ruthven, looking pale and agitated, rode up to his majesty, with the information that a person, supposed to be a Jesuit, and having a large amount of foreign gold about him, had been intercepted by his brother, Lord Gowrie. To this intelligence he added a request, that the king would ride to his brother's residence at Perth, by which means he expressed his belief that some important secrets might be extracted from the suspected person. From what we know of James's character, this part of the story certainly carries with it an air of truth. Such an investigation was exactly suitable to the king's tastes, for he peculiarly prided himself on his talent for cross-examination and power of eliciting the truth; besides, the thoughts of the gold was probably not without its consideration. He accordingly expressed his intention of honouring Gowrie with his presence at dinner.

After continuing the sport for a short time, and having killed a buck, James, accompanied by the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Mar, rode to the residence of the Gowries. No sooner had he finished his repast, and the attendant noblemen had been seated for a similar purpose, than Alexander Ruthven approached him; intimating that now was the most favourable moment for examining the stranger. The king rose and followed Ruthven to an upper room, on entering which the latter closed the door, and James suddenly found himself in the presence of a person in complete armour. His natural inquiry was whether this was the person he had come to examine? "No," said Ruthven, (at the same time snatching a dagger from the girdle of the man in armour,) "you have been brought hither for another purpose; you killed my father, and are here to answer for his death." James, greatly alarmed, insisted that, being a minor at the time, he was entirely innocent of the execution of the late earl, and used every argument and entreaty to avert the threatened danger. Ruthven's compassion was so far moved, as to undertake, on condition that the king should remain quiet, to endeavour to soften his brother. However, he soon returned, and informed James that there was no remedy, and that he must make up his mind to die; at the same time forcibly laying his hands upon the king, and endeavouring to bind his hands with a garter—a remarkable expedient, when we consider that a pistol or a dagger (if Ruthven had, indeed, any intention on the king's life) would have been much more effective. Besides, according to James's own account of the transaction, which he afterwards published, it appears that during Ruthven's temporary absence, the man in armour not only expressed his intention not to injure the king, but asserted with an oath that he would sooner die first. For what reason, therefore, this person was placed there, or why he did not assist James to escape, or why he did not interfere when he beheld his sovereign struggling in the gripe of Ruthven, appears not only unaccountable, but has occasionally induced a disbelief of the whole affair.

The king, according to his own narrative, managed during the struggle to drag his adversary towards a window which looked into the street, and perceiving the Earl of Mar below, called out to him lustily for assistance. The earl, followed by a considerable number of persons, rushed up the staircase, and finding the door fastened within, burst it open.* Previously, however, to the arrival of the earl on the spot, John Ramsey,† a page, happening to come up a back staircase, through which the assassins meant to have escaped, discovered the king struggling with Ruthven. James instantly called to him to strike his antagonist, desiring him to thrust low, for he wore a coat of mail. His words were, "Fy! strik him laich, becaus he has a pyne-dowlit upon him."* Ramsey instantly obeyed, forcing his dagger into Ruthven's stomach two or three times. According to Spotswood, the man whom the king found in the apartment endeavoured to make his escape, but was run through the body by Sir Thomas Erskine, and killed on the spot. It seems, however, by every other account of the affair, that this mysterious individual took advantage of the commotion, and retired unnoticed from the apartment.

* The Duke of Lennox, in his deposition, gives an amusing description of the stirring scene in which he bore a share. "As they wer standing [below the window] advyseing quhair to seik the king, incontinent, and in this mentyme, this deponar hard ane voce, and said to the Erie of Mar, 'This is the kingis voce that cryis; be quhair he will!' † For this service, Ramsey was created Viscount Hadington, and, having accompanied the king to England in 1620, was raised to be Baron of Kingston and Earl of Holderness. The elevation was attended by a particular proviso, that on the 5th of August, the day on which he had delivered his sovereign, he and his heirs should for ever carry the sword of state before the king, in commemoration of the service which he had performed.

Soon after this, the Earl of Gowrie, who really seems to have been completely ignorant of what was going forward, rushed into the apartment in which James had been placed by Sir Thomas Erskine, accompanied by three or four of his retainers, and having a sword in each hand. He made a most gallant attack, or rather defence, and was on the point of routing his opponents, when one of them cried out that the king was killed. Gowrie, in natural astonishment, dropped the points of his swords to the ground, when Ramsey, the page, seized the opportunity, and ran his rapier through the earl's heart.†

Thomas Cranston, George Craigengelt, and John Baxon, retainers of Gowrie's, were executed for having conspired at this conspiracy; they all declared with their dying breath that they were ignorant of any treasonable intent, and that they had only drawn their swords in defence of the earl, their master. "I have been taken," said Cranston, "for a traitor, but I thank God I am not one. I was stabbed through with a sword at this last tumult, and now I am to be hanged."‡ Andrew Henderson, another follower of that unfortunate nobleman, deposed, on the other hand, that he was the person in armour already mentioned; though it seems that the king had been previously well acquainted with Henderson's person; and yet, notwithstanding a protracted conversation, had hitherto entertained not the least suspicion of his identity. The evidence, indeed, of Henderson is so full of contradictions, as to render the fact of his being the person extremely improbable.§ It appears far more likely that he volunteered the testimony which he gave, in order to save his life; if, indeed, he had not been tampered with by the court, who were naturally anxious to corroborate the king's statement, on which hitherto had alone rested the suspicions of Gowrie's guilt. Besides, James describes the man in armour as "a black, grim man," while Henderson is stated by his contemporaries to have been a person of "low stature, ruddy complexion, and brown bearded." In addition to these inconsistencies is the fact, that the king's published relation of what occurred, is in singular opposition to the evidence of the witnesses.*

The further we investigate this complicated affair, the greater difficulties we meet with at every step. On the one hand, it appears highly improbable that James should have entered into such a plot against his own subjects—that he should have allowed the earl and his brother to return from abroad, and have loaded them with favours, when all the time he fully intended their destruction—that he should have been guilty of the solemn mockery of appointing an annual day of thanksgiving for a deliverance: which was merely ideal;† and, what is perhaps the most weighty argument, that so notorious a coward should have voluntarily implicated himself in so perilous an adventure.

On the other hand, the arguments in favour of the Gowries' innocence are still more staggering. Besides the absence of a sufficient motive, it was proved that the only weapon found on Alexander Ruthven after his death, was a sword rusted in its sheath and undrawn; and he was, besides, a mere boy at the time. The earl and his brother were both slain on the spot, instead of being taken prisoners, which might easily have been effected. The king, without any apparent motive, had assembled an unusual force of armed men at the time, and as many as five hundred gentlemen are said to have composed his suite in the neighbourhood. The reality of the conspiracy was not only generally canvassed at the period, but appears to have been commonly disbelieved. The ministers of the church in Edinburgh positively refused to return thanks for the king's delivery, and preferred encountering his utmost vengeance to implicating themselves in what they conscientiously believed to be an infamous and mountebank cheat. The Bishop of Ross alone had complaisance enough to address the people at the Market Cross, at Edinburgh; but even he contented himself with a narrative relation of what was supposed to have taken place. For many years afterwards, Gowrie was spoken of in Perth and its neighbourhood as an innocent and injured person, and James's conduct invariably mentioned with abhorrence.

It has been asserted that a criminal intercourse had been carried on between the queen and Alexander Ruthven, and that the king's jealous sensibility induced him to adopt this means of revenge: this supposition, however, can be mentioned as little more than a surmise.

An attempt has been made to prove that the Earl of Gowrie was not only nearly allied, but, after James, was actually the next heir to the English crown; and, strange as it may appear, notwithstanding the proverbial industry and perseverance of the genealogists, this important doubt has never been cleared up. The supposition of Gowrie's affinity to the throne rests as follows: At the death of Elizabeth, the crown would naturally revert to the descendants of Henry the Seventh; Margaret Tudor, eldest daughter of that monarch, and grandmother of James the First, after the death of her husband, James the Fourth of Scotland, had married Henry Stuart, Lord Ruthven; who again married Lady Janet Stewart, daughter of the Earl of Athol. Lord Gowrie's mother was certainly granddaughter of Lord Ruthven, but whether descended from his first wife, the queen dowager, or from Lady Janet Stewart, remains yet to be proved: if from the former, after the failure of issue from James the First, the earl was certainly the natural successor to the throne; if from the latter, though in some degree it allied him to the royal family, it placed his hopes of succession at a very considerable distance.

Ingenious as are the attempts to prove this relationship on the part of the Gowries, and some of the arguments are staggering, we must ever bear in mind the important fact, that not a single contemporary historian has alluded to the subject; and we can hardly believe that, had such claims really existed, we should have been left so entirely in the dark. There are innumerable instances which clearly demonstrate that both Elizabeth and James regarded Lady Arabella Stuart as the subject most nearly allied to the throne. "Quiet as that young creature looks," said Queen Elizabeth to the French ambassador, "she may one day sit on this throne!" Now, if the Earl of Gowrie were really the grandson of Queen Margaret, the claims of Arabella Stuart as great granddaughter are thrown altogether in the background. Supposing, however, as a matter of argument, that Gowrie really stood in the position in which it has been attempted to place him, the fact, however satisfactorily proved, would throw but little additional light on the identity of the guilty party. The same inducement which might have led Gowrie to get rid of James, in order to his own succession, might have actuated James in getting rid of Gowrie; for James was undoubtedly as jealous of his successor, or of any person who might interfere with his rights, as was Elizabeth herself; a fact sufficiently proved by his treatment of Arabella Stuart. It is improbable, also, that the proximity of the Gowries to the blood royal should have been an inducement with James; for, after the death of the earl and his brother, there remained two younger brothers, William and Patrick, who naturally inherited the claims of their elder brother. James, whatever was the motive, certainly persecuted that gallant and unhappy family to the last: William died in exile, and Patrick remained a prisoner in the Tower of London till liberated at the accession of Charles the First. The boon of freedom would have been valueless without the means of subsistence, and Charles considerably settled a small pension on the victim of his father's gross injustice. During his incarceration, Patrick Ruthven had occupied his time and attention in literary and scientific pursuits. When the troubles of the revolution deprived him of the royal bounty, the last of the Ruthvens appears to have wandered an impoverished scholar in the streets of London; if he had not actually to struggle with the horrors of starvation.

§ See a very ingenious treatise, "The History of the Life and Death of John Earl of Gowrie, by the Rev. James Scott," p. 327, Edinburgh, 1818. This work, which is one of considerable labour and research, contains some curious references and extracts from unpublished MSS. the parochial records of Perth, as also a summary of the various tracts, and other printed works, which treat on the subject of the "Gowries' Conspiracy." The object of the reverend author is confessedly to exculpate his favourites, the Gowries; and if he has fallen short of effecting his purpose, he has at least deduced some very staggering facts, and opened an interesting and wider field for discussion. The reader is also referred to the detailed, and more popular account of Robertson.—Hist. of Scotland, Works, vol. ii. p. 205.

* See Life and Death of John Earl of Gowrie, p. 324. It is there affirmed, on the authority of an Edinburgh MS., that at the very time when Gowrie was killed, Henderson was seen walking on the Tay Bridge of Perth; and again, "That he was the man said to be in armour, was known to be a falsehood, for he was seen that day coming from Secon to Perth, on foot; and having heard that the king was in Gowrie's house, and the gate shut, walked on the bridge till all was over."

† A thanksgiving for the king's deliverance was continued on the 5th of August throughout his reign. Bishop Andrews is said to have fallen on his knees to James, beseeching his majesty to enlighten him as to the reality of the treason, in order that he might be released from mocking the Almighty, should the story be a mere fiction. James, however, assured the bishop, on the faith of a Christian and the word of a king, that there was no deception in the case.—Biog. Brit. vol. iv. p. 2455.

It is but fair on the part of James to record the following anecdote:—Mr. William Cowper, the minister of Perth, informed Archbishop Spotswood, that, visiting the Earl of Gowrie some days previous to the supposed conspiracy, he found him intent on a book entitled, "Conspiracies against Princes."* The earl remarked that former plotters had invariably failed in their object through mismanagement, and that entire secrecy was the only basis of success.

To enable the crown to confiscate the estates of the deceased earl, it was necessary that there should be a legal inquiry into the proofs of his guilt. This ceremony may be rather called a trial of the dead, for, in accordance with an ancient custom, the massacred remains of the brothers were deposited in court during the process of investigation. The parliament decreed that their names, dignities, and memories should be blotted from the books of the nobility; that their property should be at the disposal of the king; that they should be hung, drawn, and quartered at the cross of Edinburgh; and that the several portions of their bodies should be affixed to the most public buildings of the principal towns in the kingdom. The sentence was fulfilled almost to the letter; their heads were placed on the Tolbooth at Edinburgh, and their legs and arms on the gates of Perth.

Such are the circumstances connected with the famous Gowrie conspiracy. It must be admitted that the generality of our historians have decided in favour of James; indeed, the curious evidence recently brought forward by Pitcairn, in the Criminal Trials, is supposed by many to have set the question at rest. Whatever, therefore, is now adduced, has been intended rather to display the merits of a perplexing controversy, than as throwing any additional light on a subject which has been so often and so ably discussed.

CHAPTER IV.

The crown of England, at the death of Elizabeth, was transferred tranquilly and undisputedly to the brows of her successor. The deceased queen, as is well known, partly, perhaps, from superstitious, and partly from political motives, had ever shrunk from naming the person whom she wished to succeed her, and had invariably met any importunities on the subject with the utmost indignation. In the last moments of her glorious career, while in extreme sickness of mind and body, the lord admiral, the lord keeper, and Secretary Cecil, for the last time intruded upon her the hateful subject. The queen, says Camden,† replied faintly, that as she held a regal sceptre, so she desired no other than a royal successor. When Cecil requested her to explain herself more fully: I would, she added, have a king to succeed me, and who should that be but my nearest kinsman the King of Scots? Such is Camden's account, from which our principal historians appear to have borrowed their relation of this important passage.‡ There is, however, another writer,

Robert Carey, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, who was constantly in the queen's sick chamber, who relates the story in a somewhat different manner. Elizabeth, he says distinctly, was speechless at the time; adding, that, when the name of the King of Scotland was mentioned to her, she put her hand to her head, by which "they all knew that he was the man she desired should reign after her."* The council, and especially Cecil, were naturally anxious, in order to the quiet establishment of James, that they should be enabled to add the authority of the queen's express wishes to the claims of hereditary descent; we can therefore readily imagine that any circumstance, however slight, would have been brought to bear on the occasion. It is just as probable that the movement of the queen's hand should have been caused by a pain in her head, as that it should have been intended to denote the disposition of a kingdom.

No sooner was the breath departed from the queen's body, than Sir Robert Carey,† who had been anxiously hovering about the death-bed of his kinswoman and benefactress, set off, with the lamentations of her women still ringing in his ears, to announce the important tidings to James: an act quite as indelicate as it was unauthorised. It appears, by Carey's own statement, that he must have ridden the distance between London and Edinburgh (about 400 miles) within the space of sixty hours, notwithstanding he received a dangerous fall from his horse, which retarded him on the road.‡

James received the news of his accession with proper decency. Rapin states, on the indifferent authority of a French historian,§ that he could not forbear lifting up his eyes to heaven, as if to thank God for the boon which he had so long and anxiously expected. Carey, on his part, mentions nothing of this discomposure, slight as it was, in the manner of James. The king had just gone to bed when he arrived, and therefore received him in his bed-chamber. "I kneeled by him," adds this true courtier, "and saluted him by his title of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. He gave me his hand to kiss, and bade me welcome. After he had long discoursed of the manner of the queen's sickness, and of her death, he asked me what letters I had from Horace Walpole has given him a place among the Noble Authors, observing, that "he was a near relation to Queen Elizabeth, but appears to have owed his preferment to the despatch he used in informing her successor of her death." On the 17th of July, 1620, one Bernard Calvert, of Andover, rode from St. George's Church, Southwark, to Dover, crossed the channel in an open boat to Calais, and from thence returned to St. George's Church in the same day; having performed the whole distance between three o'clock in the morning and eight in the afternoon. the council? I told him none; and acquainted him how narrowly I escaped from them. And yet I had brought him a blue ring from a fair lady, that I hoped would give him assurance of the truth that I had reported. He took it and looked upon it, and said, 'It is enough; I know by this you are a true messenger.'"

Birch has thrown a partial light over the history of the blue ring. "Lady Elizabeth Spelman," he says, "used to relate, that the Lady Scroope, who waited upon the queen in her last moments, as soon as her majesty expired, threw this ring out of the window to her brother, which appears to have been a token agreed upon between her and the King of Scots as the notice of the queen's death."† A window was recently pointed out on Richmond Green, the site of the old palace, from which legend reported that the ring had been thrown.

Nothing could exceed the joy of the Scots, when the tardy accession of James to the throne of England was at length announced. The protracted reign of Elizabeth had been universally regarded as a national calamity; and we are even assured that a belief existed among the lower classes in Scotland, that the Queen of England had been long since dead, and that the English had been in the habit of substituting a series of old women in her room. Weldon says that the wisest heads in Scotland could scarcely be induced to believe, that as long as there was an "old wife" in England, their king would be called on to succeed.

The person selected by James to communicate his intended proceedings to the English council was Sir Roger Aston,‡ who is reported to have served the king for many years as his barber, though he eventually rose to be a gentleman of the bed-chamber and master of the wardrobe. He seems to have been a plain and straight-forward man, and quite as overjoyed as his master at entering upon the splendours and luxuries for which they had so long waited. This rough Scotsman being admitted into the council-chamber, the lords received him with much courtesy, and asked him how he did? "Even, my lords," he replied, "like a poor man wandering about forty years in a wilderness and barren soil, and now arrived at the land of promise."§ Such was the general feeling of the Scottish nation. Shortly before James's departure from Edinburgh, happening to attend divine worship at St. Giles's church, the preacher thought proper to remind him of God's mercies, exhorting him to be duly grateful for the favour which had been shown him, and not to forget his countrymen! The king actually rose from his seat, and, "promising to have a care of them and their good, gave them a most loving and kind farewell."||

The progress of James, from his old to his new capital, was every where attended with a magnificence to which he had scarcely been accustomed in his own impoverished realm.¶ The houses of the nobility and principal gentry were prepared for his reception on the way, and he was every where entertained with the most splendid hospitality. "These people," said a blunt Scotsman, "would spoil a good king." With the exception of a fall from his horse in hunting, and a remarkable circumstance of his having hung a footpad without even the form of a trial, no event of any importance occurred in his progress through his new dominions.

The grief for a departed monarch is commonly of short duration. The joy of the people was not less ardent, nor their acclamations less loud, when they beheld the foreign successor, (of whose character they knew about as little as they did of his folios,) than when they had crowded round the chariot of the great princess over whose remains the grave was just closing. James, however, did his utmost to damp the ardour of his new subjects. He had always disliked a crowd, and on the pretence that such a concourse of admirers would produce a scarcity of provisions, he issued an order for their dispersion. The higher ranks were not better pleased with the manner in which he prostituted all titles of honour. Besides his promiscuous additions to the peerage, it is reported that within six weeks after he left Scotland, he conferred knighthood on no less than two hundred and thirty-seven persons. A pasquinade was affixed to St. Paul's, purporting to be a method to enable weak memories to retain the names of the new nobility.*

James's notions of the royal prerogative appear to have increased with his addition of territory. At Newark, as has been already related, he took upon himself to hang a highwayman without the least pretence of a trial—a sort of orientalism which was afterwards canvassed in such a manner as to prevent the probability of its recurrence.†

In James's progress to London celerity seems to have been considered as of the least importance. The greater part of the days were passed in hunting, and the nights in feasting. He arrived in London on the 7th of May, 1603, having consumed five weeks in his journey.‡

The tastes and habits which were introduced by James into the English court differed widely from the stately pastimes and chivalrous amusements of the past reign. There was no want of what may perhaps be called magnificence; indeed, the expense of supporting the royal pleasures occasionally amounted to extravagance,—but at this period of his reign there was not only little elegance, but the taste of the court, and especially of the king himself, appears constantly unctured with grossness and vulgarity. The nice perceptions of Prince Charles and Buckingham eventually introduced those intellectual refinements which, in the succeeding reign, distinguished the court of England as the politest in Europe.

* Wilson, in Kennett, vol. i. p. 665.

† James entertained to the last the most dangerous notions as to the extent to which the royal prerogative should be carried: this is the more singular since his tutor, the illustrious Buchanan, endeavoured by every means in his power to instil very different ideas into the mind of his sovereign pupil, and, indeed, published his work, De jure Regni apud Scotos, with this object.

‡ The coronation of James took place on the 25th of July, 1603; the ceremony, owing to the plague which raged fearfully in the metropolis, being performed hurriedly, and without ostentation, by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Scots, who accompanied James to his new dominions, are said to have brought with them their dirt as well as their poverty. The Countess of Dorset informs us, that when she paid her visit of congratulation to the royal family at Theobald's, she was surprised at the great change which had taken place, in regard to the want of cleanliness, since the preceding reign. Soon after quitting the palace she found herself infested with those insects, the name of which it is scarcely considered delicate to mention.

It is to be regretted, that Sully, in his account of his embassy to England, enters so little into the fashions and manners of the court. He mentions, however, an occasion of his dining with James at Greenwich, when he was "not a little surprised to behold that the king was always served on the knee. A surtout," he adds, "in the form of a pyramid, was placed in the middle of the table, which contained most costly vessels, and was even enriched with diamonds." Let us return, however, to the private tastes and pursuits of James.

There were a set of persons about the king, who were ever ready to pander to his gross ideas of amusement. Sir Anthony Weldon gives us the following account of the popular entertainments at court, about the period that Buckingham first came into favour. "Then," he says, "the king began to eat abroad, who formerly used to eat in his bed-chamber, and after supper would come forth to see pastimes and fooleries, in which Sir Edward Zouch,* Sir George Goring,† and Sir John Finett,‡ were the chief and master-fools: and surely this fooling got them more than any other's wisdom, far above them in desert. Zouch's part was to sing bawdy songs and tell bawdy tales: Finett to compose these songs. Then were a set of fiddlers brought up on purpose for this fooling; and Goring was master of the game for fooleries, sometimes presenting David Droman and Archie Armstrong on the back of the other fools, to tilt one at the other, till they fell together by the ears; sometimes the property was presented by them in antic dances. But Sir Jo. Millisent, who was never known before, was commended for notable fooling; and so was indeed the best extemporary fool of them all."

Sir George Goring, who afterwards rose to military celebrity in the civil troubles, appears to have well merited his title of "Master-fool." In a letter to the Earl of Arundel, dated 22d November, 1618, another of his follies is described. The occasion was a kind of al fresco party, in commemoration of the prince's birth-day, when the principal courtiers had agreed to meet together, each contributing his own share of the repast, some striving to be substantial, some curious, and some extravagant. Sir George Goring's invention bore away the bell; and that was four brawny pigs, piping hot, bitted and harnessed, with ropes of sausages, all tied to a monstrous pudding.*

The king's love of buffoonery never deserted him, even when age and vexation were pressing hard upon him. But what he most delighted in was any burlesque, however caricatured, on the incidents of real life: the more ridiculous they were, says Arthur Wilson, the more they pleased him. A story is told by this writer, of a profane expedient, adopted by Buckingham and his mother, to divert the royal melancholy at the most dismal period of his reign. A young lady was introduced, carrying in her arms a pig, in the dress of an infant, which the countess presented to the king in a rich mantle: one Turpin, dressed like a bishop, in a satin gown, lawn sleeves, and the usual pontifical ornaments, commenced reading the ceremony of baptism from the book of Common Prayer, while an assistant stood ready with a silver ewer filled with water. The king, to whom the joke was intended to convey a pleasing surprise, hearing the pig suddenly squeak, looked more closely about him, and recognised the face of Buckingham, who was intended to personify the god-father. "Away, for shame," he cried: "what blasphemy is this?"—extremely indignant at the trick which had been imposed upon him.†

We must not, however, attribute his displeasure, on this occasion, to any other cause than the accidental melancholy which happened to have mastered him at the time. It is extremely improbable that such artful politicians as Buckingham and his mother should have ventured on such "blasphemies," unless persuaded, by the success of former puerilities, that their impious buffoonery would not be displeasing to the weak-minded monarch. It may be proper, too, to mention, that a pig was an animal of which James had a more than Judaical abhorrence;—he tells us, in his "Counterblast to Tobacco," that were he to invite the Dèvil to dinner, he would place three dishes before him;—first, a pig; secondly, a poll of ling and mustard; and thirdly, a pipe of tobacco to assist digestion.‡ His dislike to tobacco was only equalled by his horror of the pig; a fact well known by the fame of the celebrated tirade above alluded to. There was an order issued during his reign, prohibiting the members of the University of Cambridge from smoking tobacco in St. Mary's church. Considering how frequently references are made by contemporary writers to the king's dislike to pigs, we are surprised to find his favourite Buckingham more than once addressing him in his letters, by the familiar appellation of "Sow;" but the following curious letter, addressed by the Earl of Pembroke to Sir Edward Zouch, is even more startling.

"Honest Ned,

"I know you love your master dearly, and his pleasures, which makes me put you in trust with this business, myself not being able to stay in the town so late.

"I pray you, therefore, as soon as it grows dark fail not to send the close cart to Basingborn for the speckled sow ye saw the king take such liking unto this day; and let her be brought privately to the man of the wardrobe, by the same token, that I chide him for letting the other beasts go carelessly into the garden while it was day, and he will presently receive her into his charge. Some may think this a jest, but I assure you it is a matter of trust and confidence, and so assuring myself of your secret and careful performance of it, I rest your affectionate friend,

"PEMBROKE."*

On other occasions, we find the king familiarly addressed by his minions as "Your sowship."

The following lively letter of the period contains a more graphic picture, and will afford a more accurate notion of the manners of the court, than could be effected by a more elaborate description. That the wit is of a lighter kind, and the language less ponderous, than is generally the case with the familiar epistles of the period, must be taken as an additional reason for its insertion: it is addressed by Sir John Harrington to Mr. Secretary Barlow, and dated London, 1606:

"My Good Friend,

"In compliance with your asking, now shall you accept my poor account of rich doings. I came here a day or two before the Danish king came, and from the day he had come to the present hour, I have been well nigh overwhelmed with carousal and sports of all kinds. The sports began each day in such manner and such sort, as well nigh persuaded me of Mahomet's paradise. We had women, and indeed wine too, of such plenty, as would have astonished each beholder. Our feasts were magnificent, and the two royal guests did most lovingly embrace each other at the table. I think the Dane hath strangely wrought on our good English nobles; for those whom I could never get to taste good English liquor, now follow the fashion, and wallow in beastly delights. The ladies abandon their sobriety, and are seen to roll about in intoxication. In good sooth, the parliament did kindly to provide his majesty so seasonably with money; for there has been no lack of good living, shows, sights, and banqueting from morn to eve.

"One day a great feast was held; and after dinner the representation of Solomon's temple and the coming of the Queen of Sheba was made, or (as I may better say) was meant to have been made, before their majesties, by device of the Earl of Salisbury and others. But, alas! as all earthly things do fail to poor mortals in earthly enjoyments, so did prove our presentment thereof. The lady who did play the queen's part did carry most precious gifts to both their majesties; but, forgetting the steps arising to the canopy, overset her caskets into his Danish majesty's lap, and fell at his feet, though I rather think it was in his face. Much was the hurry and confusion; cloths and napkins were at hand, to make all clean. His majesty then got up, and would dance with the Queen of Sheba; but he fell down and humbled himself before her, and was carried to an inner chamber, and laid on a bed of state, which was not a little defiled with the presents of the queen which had been bestowed on his garments; such as wine, cream, jelly, beverage, cakes, spices, and other good matters. The entertainment and show went forward, and most of the presenters went backward or fell down; wine did so occupy their upper chambers.

"Now did appear in rich dress, Hope, Faith, and Charity; Hope did assay to speak, but wine rendered her endeavours so feeble that she withdrew, and hoped the king would excuse her levity. Faith was then all alone; for I am certain she was not joined to good works, and left the court in a staggering: Charity came to the king's feet, and seemed to cover the multitude of sins her sisters had committed; in some sort she made obeisance, and brought gifts, but said she would return home again, as there was no gift which heaven had not already given his majesty. She then returned to Faith and Hope, who were both sick in the lower hall."

"Next came Victory, in bright armour, and presented a rich sword to the king, who did not accept it, but put it by with his hand; and by a strange medley of versification did endeavour to make suit to the king. But Victory did not triumph long; for after much lamentable utterance, she was led away by a silly captive, and laid to sleep in the outer steps of the antechamber.

"Now did Peace make entry, and strive to get foremost to the king; but I grieve to tell how great wrath she did discover unto those of her attendants; and much contrary to her semblance, made rudely war with her olive-branch, and laid on the pates of those who did oppose her coming."

"I have much marvelled at those strange pageantries; and they do bring to my remembrance what passed of this sort in our queen's days, of which I was sometimes an humble spectator and assistant; but I never did see such lack of good order, discretion, and sobriety, as I now have done. I have passed much time in seeing the royal sports of hunting and hawking, where the manners were such as made me devise the beasts were pursuing the sober creation, and not man in quest of exercise and food. I will now, in good sooth, declare unto you, who will not blab, that the gunpowder fright is got out of all our heads, and we are going on hereabouts as if the devil was contriving every man to blow up himself, by wild riot, excess, and devastation of time and temperance. The great ladies do go well masked, and indeed it be the only show of their modesty to conceal their countenances: but alack! they meet with such countenance to uphold their strange doings, that I marvel not at aught that happens. The lord of the mansion is overwhelmed in preparations at Theobalds, and doth marvellously please both kings with good meat, good drink, and good speeches. I do often say (but not aloud) that the Danes have again conquered the Britons, for I see no man, or woman either, that can command herself. I wish I was at home:—O rus, quando te aspiciam! and I will before the Prince Vaudemont cometh."

* The whole account, and especially the disgraceful state of the Cardinal Virtues, is no doubt somewhat overcharged.

Wine was always palatable to James. It was therefore, not unnatural that the visit of his jovial brother-in-law should have led to more than one scene of inebriety.* The Danish monarch, indeed, seems to have been somewhat famous for disordering his faculties with the juice of the grape. Howel tells us of an instance of his excess, which occurred when, some years afterwards, this author accompanied the Earl of Leicester on his embassy to Denmark. The earl was invited to dinner by the Dane, who did the best in his power to make the ambassador drunk. They sat down to their meal at eleven o'clock, and continued drinking till the evening, during which period the king proposed thirty-five healths,—first the emperor, then the King of England, and so on, till he had exhausted all the kings and queens in Christendom. The consequence was that his majesty was eventually carried off in his chair. The same considerate attention was offered by two of the guards to the ambassador, who, however, was fortunately able to reach his hamber without their assistance.

Peyton mentions a remarkable debauch, which occurred during the visit of the King of Denmark at the English court, on which occasion the two kings got intoxicated. James was in such a disgraceful state, that he was obliged to be carried to bed by his courtiers, a task which was performed with considerable difficulty.

Even in his taste for wine, as in most of his other habits, we may trace the effeminacy of his nature. His partiality was for "sweet rich wines," such as are commonly supposed to be preferred by the fairer sex. Coke informs us that he indulged "not in ordinary French and Spanish wines, but in strong Greek wines." Even when engaged in hunting, a sport which seldom requires adventurous excitement, he was attended as closely as possible by a special officer, who constantly supplied him with his favourite beverages. Coke's father, on one of these occasions, managed to obtain a draught of the royal wine, which his son tells us, not only

* The arrival of the boisterous Dane in England, and the manner in which, with homely jocularities, he surprised his sister the Queen of England, are amusingly described in a letter of the period. "He landed here at Yarmouth, and then took post-horses here to London, where dining at an ordinary inn, near Aldgate, he hired a hackney-coach, and presently addressed his course to the queen's court, and entered the presence before any person had the least thought of him. I hear Cardel, the dancer, gave the first occasion of his discovering him, by saying that that gentleman was the likeliest the King of Denmark that ever he saw any in his life, which a Frenchman, one of his majesty's servants, hearing, and viewing his countenance well, whom he had seen the last time of his being here, grew confident that it was he; and presently ran to carry the news thereof to the queen, who sat then at dinner, privately, in her gallery at Somerset House. The queen at first scorned him for his labour, so vain it appeared, and thought it some fantastic caprice of a French brain. But the king, following close after, and begging silence with the beckoning of his hands as he entered, came behind her and embraced her, ere she was aware, and saluting her with a kiss, taught her the verity of that which before she believed to be a falsehood. Presently she took off the best jewel she wore about her, and gave it to the Frenchman for his tidings, despatched a post to his majesty, who was then well onward on his progress, and then intended the care of his entertainment."—*Letter from Mr. Lorkin to Sir T. produced intoxication and spoiled his day's sport, but disordered him for three days afterwards.

Weldon gives his opinion that James was not habitually intemperate, but that as old age crept on, and Buckingham's jovial suppers became more alluring, he occasionally exceeded, and was sometimes overtaken; a transgression which he would next day remember and repent with tears. After such indulgences there is generally another matutinal memento besides conscience. The maudlin monarch weeping over the recollections of the last night's debauch must have been an edifying sight to his courtiers. "His drinks," adds the same writer, "were of that kind for strength, as Frontignac, Canary, high-country wine, tent wine, and Scottish ale, that had he not had a very strong brain, he might have daily been overtaken, although he seldom drank at any one time above four spoonfuls, many times not above one or two." James, says Sully in his memoirs, was in the habit of quitting the company after dinner and going to bed, where he usually spent part of the afternoon, and sometimes the whole.

Another of James's vices was the constant practice of having an oath in his mouth. Sir John Peyton assures us, that from the example set by the king, the fashion of swearing grew into great esteem; and even the king's apologist, Bishop Goodman, admits that he was "wonderfully passionate and much given to swearing." And yet the same man, who was daily offending against morality, and undermining it by his influence, in his Basilicon Doron, has the conscience thus to apostrophise his own son, who is well known to have regarded an oath with the utmost abhorrence:—"Beware," says James, "to offend your conscience with the use of swearing or lying, suppose but in jest; for oaths are but a use, and a sin clothed with no delight nor gain, and therefore the more inexcusable, even in the sight of men." Weldon says, that in his cooler moments, the king was in the habit of expressing his abhorrence at his own bad habit, trusting, he said, that as the oaths which he made use of were uttered in moments of passion, they would not be imputed to him as sins.

That his reputation for profane swearing was not confined to his own subjects, may be discovered by the following anecdote:—When the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury was ambassador at Paris, the Prince de Condé paid him a visit. The conversation chanced to turn upon the character of James, who was then King of England. The learning, clemency, and other good qualities of the king were politely admitted by the prince; who, however, mentioned the reports which he had heard of his majesty's habit of swearing. Lord Herbert answered paradoxically, that it was a weakness which arose entirely from the natural gentleness of the king's disposition; an assertion which brought forth a remark from the prince that curses and gentleness were incompatible. "On the contrary," replied Lord Herbert, "the king, my master, is too kind to punish men himself, and therefore leaves their chastisement in the hands of God." Lord Herbert, who had more to be proud of than the credit of a smart saying, appears to have valued himself highly on this ingenious apology for his sovereign. He informs us that it was afterwards much celebrated at the French court.

CHAPTER V.

James kept faithfully the promise which he had made to his Scottish subjects in his farewell attendance at St. Giles's Church. A temperate prejudice in favour of former friends would have been laudable; but the unqualified distinction which, in the early part of his reign, he made in favour of Scottish interests and Scottish connections, was naturally productive of much comment and envious feeling among his English subjects. We may trace an evidence of the English antipathy towards the northern and penniless favourites of James in the answer of Guy Fawkes to a Scottish nobleman who assisted in interrogating him before the council. When asked by the latter for what purpose he had collected so large a quantity of gunpowder, "To blow," he said, "the Scottish beggars back to their native mountains." It may be observed that James happily denominated Guy Fawkes the English Scævola.* The following pasquinade, which was every where posted at the time, has reference to the king's national prejudices:—

Scots from the northern frozen banks of Tay,
With packs and plods came whiggling all away;
Thick as the locusts which in Egypt swarmed,
With pride and hungry hopes completely armed;
With native truth, diseases, and no money,
Plundered our Canaan of the milk and honey;
Here they grew quickly lords and gentlemen,
And all their race are true-born Englishmen.

So great was the disgust which this principle of favouritism had produced, that James thought it necessary to make the following characteristic apology to the English parliament. "Had I," he proceeds, "been oversparing to them, they might have thought Joseph had forgotten his brethren, or that the king had been drunk with his new kingdom. If I did respect the English when I came first, what might the Scottish have justly said if I had not in some measure dealt bountifully with them that had so long served me, so far adventured themselves with me, and been so faithful to me? Such particular persons of the Scottish nation as might claim any extraordinary merit at my hands, I have already reasonably rewarded; and I can assure you that there is none left for whom I mean extraordinary to strain myself further."† James's assurance was worth little. As Harris justly observes, it was but a short time afterwards that he took Robert Carr into favour, and heaped on him such immense treasures.

The credit, indeed, which James has generally acquired for profuse liberality, taking the word in its more generous sense, appears, on a very superficial investigation, to be totally undeserved. There certainly are numerous instances of his having squandered large sums on undeserving favourites;‡ but there is perhaps not a single instance on record of his having condescended to relieve misery or reward merit. The following anecdote, as it is commonly related, would at first sight place his character for generosity in an advantageous light; but we have only to call to mind his well-known partiality for masculine beauty,—the fact that Rich, the present object of his munificence, was eminently handsome, and indeed that it was only the coldness with which he met the king's advances to familiarity that prevented him from becoming the chief favourite,—and James's merit for liberality falls to the ground. The story purports, that James, on a certain day being in the gallery at Whitehall, attended only by Henry Rich, afterwards Earl of Holland, and Maxwell, a gentleman of the bedchamber, some servants happened to pass through, bearing a large sum of money (3000*l.*), which they were conveying to the privy purse. James, observing the two gentlemen whispering with one another, and ascertaining from Maxwell that the subject of their conversation was an incidental wish which had been expressed by Rich, that he could appropriate the gold to his own use, he immediately ordered it to be conveyed to the latter's lodgings; remarking, that it afforded him more pleasure, in bestowing the money than Rich could receive in accepting it.

James's want of knowledge of the actual value of money may, however, be taken as some apology for the sums which he so unworthily lavished. There is an instance of his presenting the Earl of Somerset at one time with an order for twenty thousand pounds, an immense sum at that period. The lord treasurer, desirous of making the king aware of the enormous amount which he was squandering on his favourite, invited James to an entertainment, at which four sums, of five thousand pounds each, were purposely placed on as many tables, in an apartment through which James was to pass. The king, who had never before seen so much money at one time, inquired the reason of the display. Being informed that these heaps were the amount of the sum which he had ordered to be paid to Somerset;—"Zounds, man," he cried, "five thousand is enough to serve his turn," which was all that the favourite at that time received.*

These munificent, though ill-bestowed, donations, added to the vast sums which were lavished on the entertainments of the court, had at one time drained the royal treasury to its lowest ebb. By a letter among the Talbot Papers, it is proved that one masque alone cost the exchequer three thousand pounds.† This taste for lavishing immense sums on magnificent spectacles and social diversions was not merely confined to the court. To provide for a masque at Lord Haddington's marriage, twelve of the principal courtiers subscribed three hundred pounds apiece. The king, however, was the principal sufferer; and so reduced were his finances about the fourth year of his reign, and so clamorous were the officers of his household for the payment of their salaries, that they actually stopped the coach of the lord treasurer, and prevented his proceeding further, till he had given a solemn promise that their demands should be satisfied.* At Brussels James was caricatured in a hose doublet, with empty pockets hanging out, and an empty purse in his hand.

The king's personal expenses and individual pleasures were but, in a small degree, the cause of his pecuniary embarrassments. His principal source of enjoyment was in the chase, from which he ever derived the keenest gratification. It was a common expression of our ancestors, when they took leave of their friends, "God's peace be with you, as King James said to his hounds." Scalliger observed of him, "The king of England is merciful except in hunting, where he appears cruel. When he finds himself unable to take the beast, he frets, and storms, and cries, God is angry with me, but I will have him for all that! When he catches him, he thrusts his whole arm into the belly and entrails of the creature up to the shoulder." His favourite pastime, on one occasion, very nearly cost him his life: Sir Symonds D'Ewes tells us, that he was thrown headlong into a pond, and very narrowly escaped drowning. Nor is this the only instance of his indifferent horsemanship nearly proving fatal to him. Mr. Joseph Meade writes to Sir Martin Stuteville, 11th January, 1622: "The same day his majesty rode by coach to Theobald's to dinner, not intending, as the speech is, to return till towards Easter. After dinner, riding on horseback abroad, his horse stumbled and cast his majesty into the New River, where the ice brake; he fell in so that nothing but his boots were seen. Sir Richard Young was next, who alighted, went into the water, and lifted him out. There came much water out of his mouth and body. His majesty rid back to Theobald's, went into a warm bed, and, as we hear, is well, which God continue."[†]

In addition to his ruling taste for hunting, and his addiction to the pleasures of the table, the cockpit, at least twice a week, was frequented by the frivolous monarch, and indeed constituted one of his principal sources of amusement. It is even affirmed that the salary of the master of the cocks, amounting to two hundred pounds per annum, exceeded the united allowances of two secretaries of state.

His personal vices, his excessive indolence, and love of pleasure, interfering, as they were allowed to do on all occasions, with the calls of business and the most important necessities of state, excited equally the indignation of his ministers and the offensive strictures of his people. It was in vain that the former even fell on their knees to him, and implored him to show more care for his subjects' interests and his own. He replied coldly, that the state of his health required frequent relaxations; adding, that he would far sooner return to Scotland, than consent to be immured in his closet or chained to the council-table.[‡]

Neither did the stage overlook his notorious vices and foibles, where they were introduced with unbecoming familiarity. Sometimes he was represented as indecently intoxicated; at others as cursing and swearing at his hawks and hounds, and striking his servants in his intemperate wrath.

James sufficiently admired those personal graces in others, in which he was himself so eminently deficient. His friendships were generally cultivated among the young and handsome; and so well were his failings understood by the courtiers, that perpetual intrigues and speculations appear to have been carried on, by opposing interests, for the purpose of undermining the existing favourite, by the introduction of a more engaging rival. Weldon asserts, that Lady Suffolk, a notorious intriguer of the period, carried this extraordinary traffic to such an extreme, that she was constantly on the lookout for handsome young men, whose hair she daily curled, and whose breath she perfumed, in hopes that they would attract the royal attention. Henry Rich, afterwards Earl of Holland, is said by Osborne to have lost the opportunity, which his handsome face afforded him, of being prime favourite, by turning aside and spitting after the king had saluted him.

Many of the original letters, which passed between James and the Duke of Buckingham, are preserved among the Harleian MSS. and elsewhere, and abound with evidences of disagreeable familiarity, and sometimes with the grossest indecency. The equality on which they corresponded is well known. The king generally addressed Buckingham as "his dear child and gossip," and frequently subscribes himself as "your dear dad and gossip:" on one occasion, when he sends his favourite some partridges, he concludes, "your dear dad and purveyor," while Buckingham, on his part, generally addresses the king as "dear dad and gossip," and terminates with "your majesty's most humble slave and dog, Steny." In one of his letters, the king tells Buckingham that he "wears his picture in a blue riband, under his waistcoat, next his heart," and in another, he assures his "only dear and sweet child" how anxious he is that he should "hasten to him at Birely that night, that his white teeth may shine upon him." In a letter, published by Dalrymple, in his Memorials of the Reign of James I., Buckingham addresses the king with the following strange parade of familiar titles: "My purveyor, my good fellow, my physician, my maker, my friend, my father, my all; I heartily and humbly thank you for all you do and all I have."

At other times we find the king assisting Buckingham in his profligate amours: "To please this favourite," says Sir John Peyton, "King James gave way for the duke to entice others to his will. Two examples I will recite. First, the king entertained Sir John Crofts and his daughter, a beautiful lass, at Newmarket, to sit at the table with the king. This he did then to procure Buckingham the easier to vitiate her. Secondly, Mrs. Dorothy Gawdy, being a rare creature, king James carried Buckingham to Culford to have his will on that beauty: but Sir Nicholas Bacon's sons conveyed her out of a window into a private chamber, over the leads, and so disappointed the duke of his wicked purpose. In which cleanly conveyance the author had a hand with the knight's sons."

After the relation of such scenes of profligacy, it is somewhat startling to find the king addressing to Buckingham a meditation on the Lord's Prayer. "For divers times," says James in his preface, "before I meddled with it, I told you, and only you of some of my conceptions on the Lord's Prayer, and you often solicited me to put pen to paper: next, as the person to whom we pray it, is our heavenly Father, so am I that offer it unto you, not only your politic, but also your æconomicke father, and that in a nearer degree than unto others. Thirdly, that you make good use of it; for since I daily take care to better your understanding, to enable you the more for my service in wordly affairs, reason would that God's part should not be left out, for timor Domini est initium sapientiæ. And lastly, I must with joy acknowledge, that you deserve this gift of me, in not only giving so good example to the rest of the court, in frequent hearing of the word of God, but in special, in so often receiving the sacrament, which is a notable demonstration of your charity in pardoning them that offend you, that being the thing I most labour to recommend to the world in this meditation of mine: and how godly and virtuous all my advices have ever been unto you, I hope you will faithfully witness unto the world."^{*}

More hypocritical trash than this, or at any rate, a more conflicting line of conduct, it would be difficult to imagine. Even if James were himself sincere in his professed reverence for religious duties, (and there is reason to believe, notwithstanding his evident inconsistencies, that such was the case,) what can be more incongruous than his introducing so sacred a subject to a gay and thoughtless courtier, whose complaisance, and pretended interest in his majesty's pursuits, could surely only have originated in a desire to gratify the weak monarch, by the usual arts of adulation! There is one part of the king's preface which reminds us of the last days of Louis the Fourteenth, whose courtiers, when religion became a fashion at Versailles, were accustomed to take the sacrament two or three times in one day. It is possible that Buckingham's motive was not very dissimilar.

That James's friendships, which had their birth in mere outward accomplishments, should have been extremely brief in their existence, is scarcely to be wondered at; but to fickleness he added insincerity—an important ingredient in what he termed his kingcraft. It was in his nature to hug a favourite at one moment and to ruin him at the next. At the time when he was apparently taking the most affectionate interest in Buckingham's welfare, there is reason to believe that, in his heart, he was projecting his destruction. Had James lived, the fall of that magnificent favourite would, in all probability, have been as rapid as his rise. His behaviour to Robert Carr was even more iniquitous. When that unfortunate and once splendid criminal was proceeding to his trial, and, for aught that was known to the contrary, to his death, the king expressed the most poignant grief at their parting. And yet he was not only secretly overjoyed at his favourite's disgrace, but had been making use of every means to procure his utter and irretrievable ruin. Of the farewell parting between James, and the companion who had once been so dear to him, Weldon has given the following curious account:—"When the earl kissed his hand, the king hung about his neck, slabbering his cheeks—saying, 'for God's sake, when shall I see thee again? On my soul I shall neither eat nor sleep until you come again.' The earl told him on the Monday (this being on the Friday.) 'For God's sake let me,' said the king:—'shall I, shall I?'—then lolled about his neck. 'Then for God's sake give thy lady this kiss for me:' in the same manner at the stair's head, at the middle of the stairs, and the stair's foot. The earl was not in his coach when the king used these very words (in the hearing of four servants, one of whom reported the story instantly to the author of this history) 'I shall never see his face more.'"

CHAPTER VI.

It has long been the fashion to decry James as a mere pretender to learning. "His pedantry," says Lord Bolingbroke, "was too much even for the age in which he lived;" and again he adds:—"He affected more learning than became a king, which he broached on every occasion in such a manner as would have misbecome a schoolmaster." Pope and Horace Walpole have joined in the outcry. "Quotations," says the latter writer, "puns, scripture, witticisms, superstition, oaths, vanity, prerogative, and pedantry, the ingredients of all his sacred majesty's performances, were the pure produce of his own capacity, and deserving all the incense offered to such immense erudition by the divines of his age, and the flatterers of his court." His majesty's writings, however, though cramped and obscured by pedantry and false taste, are not altogether without their merit. He was certainly possessed of considerable learning, if we may not add genius; and though not an elegant scholar, was at least an industrious one. His love of literature was sincere, and his efforts in its cause unwearying. "Were I not a king," he said, on visiting the Bodleian library, "I would wish to be an university man." To the University of Cambridge he was constantly sending for books of reference; and many of those days, which he professedly borrowed from the court, with the object of indulging in the sports of the field, were terminated in long hours of study or literary relaxation. If his assumptions of superiority in the field of letters were arrogant and ostentatious, we should remember that when the sovereign turns author, he has few critics and numberless admirers. A bishop flattered him by translating his works into Latin, and the court endeavoured to persuade him that he was a Solomon. James, however, had certainly no mean opinion of his own capacity. He told Sully, (perhaps the best judge in Europe of the merits of such an assertion,) that, for a long time previous to his accession to the throne of England, he had secretly governed the whole of Queen Elizabeth's councils, and that her ministers were merely tools in his hands. No wonder Sully has thought such a piece of vanity worth recording. In the first folio edition of his works,* which no doubt underwent his own supervision, and indeed issued from the press of the royal printer, we find the following modest lines inserted beneath his portrait:—

Crowns have their compass, length of days their date,
Triumphs their tombs, felicities their fate;
Of more than earth, can earth make none partaker,
But knowledge makes the king most like his Maker.

James was in all probability the author of his own encomium. The work before us must have been revised with great care and attention, and it is not unamusing, in comparing it with one of his own Edinburgh treatises or proclamations, to observe what pains must have been taken to render it palatable to the English reader.

The Dorset Basilicon, containing advice to his son respecting his moral and political conduct, is undoubtedly the best of King James's productions. It was first published in 1603, and went through three editions in that year. It has less of pedantry, and more of good sense, than are to be found in the writings of his contemporaries: moreover, it exhibits no slight knowledge of human nature, and no common capacity. We regret, however, that he did not himself act up to the principles which he endeavoured to inculcate. Had this work proceeded from the heart,—had it been softened by any pleasing traits of real affection for his son, it would probably have continued popular to the present day. Unfortunately, it was written to attract admiration, and not to benefit a child whom he is known to have disliked.

His work on Demonology is less meritorious but more remarkable. James had at one time doubted the existence of those "detestable slaves of the devil, the witches," as he himself styles them, though he afterwards adopted a different opinion, and dignified the subject with his pen.

The following extract will exhibit how little superior he was, to the idle superstitions of the day. Discussing the probability of innocent persons being accused and unjustly punished:—"There are two good helps," he writes, "that may be used for their trial; the one is the finding of their mark, and trying the insensibleness thereof; the other is their fleeing on the water: for, as in a secret murder, if the dead carcass be at any time thereafter handled by the murderer, it will gush out blood, as if the blood were crying to heaven for the revenge of the murderer: so it appears that God hath appointed (for a supernatural sign of the monstrous impiety of witches) that the water shall refuse to receive them in her bosom, that have shaken off them the sacred water of baptism, and wilfully refused the benefit thereof."

It is amusing, in these enlightened times, to find his majesty inveighing against the "damnable opinions of one Scot, an Englishman, who," he informs us, "is not ashamed to deny in public print, that there be such a thing as witchcraft, and so maintains the old error of the Sadducees in denying of Spirits." Such were the arguments of our forefathers. Because a sensible individual disbelieved that an old woman had the power of diseasing a pig, or blighting an apple tree, the evidence that he was a materialist was considered as damning and conclusive.*

The king's translation of the Psalms, in which he endeavoured to rival the far-famed Sternhold and Hopkins, was never finished, and is the least known of any of his compositions. The eleventh verse of the seventy-fourth Psalm,—“Why withdrawest thou thy hand?—why pluckest thou not thy right hand out of thy bosom, to consume the enemy?” is thus paraphrased by James, and may be taken as a specimen of the whole.

Why dost thou thus withdraw thy hand,
Even thy right hand restrain?
Out of thy bosom for our good,
Draw back the same again.

The translation of the same verse by Hopkins, is still more solemnly ludicrous:—

Why dost thou draw thy hand aback,
And hide it in thy lap?
O pluck it out, and be not slack
To give thy foes a rap.

James again paraphrases the first verse of the same Psalm as follows:—

* King James's Works, p. 91.

Oh why, our God, for evermore
Hast thou neglected us?
Why smokes thy wrath against the sheep
Of thine own pasture thus?

Altogether, from the specimens of the king's muse, which have been handed down to us, it is very clear that, as a poet, he has not the slightest claim even to the doubtful credit of mediocrity. Of taste James was almost equally devoid. Walpole says, "it is well for the arts that King James had no disposition for them: he let them take their own course. Had he felt any inclination for them, he would probably have introduced as bad taste as he did into literature. A prince, who thought puns and quibbles the perfection of eloquence, would have been charmed with the monkeys of Hemskirk, and the drunken boors of Ostade." Probably Sully was not far wrong, when he spoke of James as the wisest fool in Christendom.

The charge, which has been so frequently brought against James, of egregious pedantry, is undoubtedly well deserved. Henry the Fourth of France, amused himself, in more than one instance, with this weakness of his brother monarch. When it was told him that James had succeeded to the throne of England, he observed, "En verite, c'est un trop beau morceau pour un pedant." On another occasion, when James happened to be styled the English Solomon, in Henry's presence—"I hope," he observed, alluding to the supposed attachment of James's mother to David Rizzio, "I hope the name is not given to him because he is David the fiddler's son." Lord Sanquhar was present at the utterance of this biting sarcasm, and when that nobleman was afterwards sentenced to be hanged, for having assassinated Turner the fencing-master, James refused him his pardon on the ground that he had neglected to resent the insult.* In allusion to James's character for pedantry, Pope introduces the following lines into the Dunciad:—

Oh, cried the goddess, for some pedant reign!
Some gentle James to bless the land again;
To stick the doctor's chair into the throne,
Give war to words, or war with words alone;
Senates and courts with Greek and Latin rule,
And turn the council to a grammar-school.

There are two points, his wit and conversational talent, on which James deserves some credit. There seems reason to believe that he was a very companionable personage. Weldon, who rarely says a word in his favour, informs us that "he was very witty, and had as many ready jests as any man living, at which he would not smile himself, but deliver them in a grave and serious manner." When one of the Lumleys was, on one occasion, boasting of his ancestry rather beyond the limits of good breeding,—“Stop, man,” said the king, “you need say no more: now I know

* Divine Catast. This was Robert Crichton, Lord Sanquhar, a Scottish nobleman, whose eye was accidentally put out by Turner, while they were amusing themselves with fencing. Sometime afterwards, he was asked by the French king how the accident had happened. Sanquhar detailed the circumstances, on which the king asked whether the man still lived who had mutilated him? The question had such an effect upon Lord Sanquhar, that he returned to England and hired two of his countrymen to shoot the fencing master at his house in White Friars. Lord Sanquhar was tried in the Court of King's Bench, in 1612, and, being found guilty of murder, was hung opposite to the gate of Westminster Hall, only two days after his being found guilty.”—Rapin, vol. ii. p. 181 note.

that Adam's surname was Lumley."* The House of Commons he styled, with some humour, "the five hundred kings." It was one of James's sayings that "very wise men and very fools do little harm: it is the mediocrity of wisdom," he added, "that troubleth all the world."† Pope has re-echoed this sentiment in the well-known line:

A little learning is a dangerous thing.

"Men, in arguing," said James, "are often carried by the force of words farther asunder than their question was at first; like two ships, going out of the same haven, their landing is many times whole countries distant." In a letter, also, from Mr. Mead to Sir Martin Stuteville, we have an instance of his conversational humour. "His majesty, at Theobald's," says the writer, "discoursing publicly how he meant to govern, was heard to say he would govern according to the good of the common-weal, but not according to the common-will."

On another occasion, a certain courtier, on his deathbed, expressing the utmost remorse that he had formerly cheated the easy monarch; "Tell him to be of good courage," said James, "for I freely and lovingly forgive him;" and he added with some humour—"I wonder much that all my officers do not go mad with the like thoughts; for certainly they have as great cause as this poor mau hath."‡

There is a curious little work in the British Museum, entitled "Witty observations of King James, gathered in his ordinary discourse," from which I have extracted the following specimens:—

"I love not one who will never be angry; for he that is without sorrow is without gladness, so he that is without anger is without love."

"Parents may forbid their children an unfit marriage, but they may not force their consent to a fit one."

"No man gains by war but he that hath not wherewithal to live in peace."

"It is likely that the people will imitate the king in good; but it is sure they will follow him in ill."

"I wonder not so much that women paint themselves, as that when they are painted, men can love them."

"Much money makes a country poor, for it sets a dear price upon every thing."

"Cowardice is the mother of cruelty; it was only fear that made tyrants put so many to death, to secure themselves."

There is another work, entitled the "Witty Aphorisms of King James," which affords a still higher notion of his intellectual powers; but it has been more frequently selected for quotation. There have been many writers who have amused themselves with the king's wearisome folios and pedantic frivolities, who have been in fact, greedily his inferiors in real learning and natural capacity.

"In that curious repository, the Nugæ Antiquæ," says Horace Walpole, "are three letters which exhibit more faithful portraits of Queen Elizabeth and James I, than are to be found in the most voluminous collections." From this agreeable miscellany I have selected the following letter, addressed by Sir John Harrington to Sir Amias Paulet. It introduces us at once behind the scenes, and affords an interesting sketch of the character of James, and no despicable view of his literary attainments and conversational powers.

"January, 1670.

"My Loving Cousin,

"It behoveth me now to write my journal, respecting the gracious command of my sovereign prince, to come to his closet; which matter, as you so well and urgently desire to hear of, I shall, as suiteth my best ability, relate unto you, and is as followeth:—When I came to the presence-chamber and had gotten good place to see the lordly attendants, and bowed my knee to the prince, I was ordered by special messenger, and that in secret sort, to wait awhile in an outward chamber; whence, in near an hour waiting, the same knave led me up a passage, and so to a small room, where was good order of paper, ink, and pens, put in a board for the prince's use. Soon upon this, the prince his highness did enter, and in much good humour asked, 'if I was cousin to Lord Harrington, of Exton?' I humbly replied: 'His majesty did some honour in inquiring my kin to one whom he had so late honoured and made a baron;' and moreover did add, 'we were both branches of the same tree.' Then he discoursed much of learning, and showed me his own in such sort, as made me remember my examiner at Cambridge. He sought much to know my advances in philosophy, and uttered profound sentences of Aristotle, and such like writers, which I had never read, and which some are bold enough to say, others do not understand; but this I pass by. The prince did now press my reading to him part of a canto in Ariosto; praised my utterance, and said he had been informed of many as to my learning in the time of the queen. He asked me what I thought pure wit was made of, and whom it did best become? Whether a king should not be the best clerk in his own country; and if this land did not entertain good opinion of his learning and good wisdom? His majesty did much press for my opinion touching the power of Satan in matter of witchcraft, and asked me with much gravity, if I did truly understand why the devil did work more with ancient women than others? I did not refrain from a scurvy jest, and even said (notwithstanding to whom it was said) that we were taught hereof in scripture, where it is told that the devil walketh in dry places. His majesty, moreover, was pleased to say much, and favourably, of my good report for merit and good conceit; to which I did covertly answer, as not willing a subject should be wiser than his prince, nor even appear so.

"More serious discourse did next ensue, wherein I wanted room to continue, and sometimes some to escape; for the queen, his mother, was not forgotten, nor Davison neither. His highness told me her death was visible in Scotland before it did really happen, being, as he said, spoken of in secret by those whose power of sight presented to them a bloody head dancing in the air. He then did remark on this gift (second sight), and said he sought out of certain books a sure way to attain knowledge of future chances. Hereat he named many books which I did not know, nor by whom written; but advised me not to consult some authors which would lead me to evil consultations. I told his majesty the power of Satan had, I much feared, damaged my bodily frame, but I had not further will to court his friendship for my soul's hurt.

We next discoursed somewhat upon religion, when at length he said: 'Now, sir, you have seen my wisdom in some sort, and I have pried into yours; pray you do me justice in your report, and in good reason, I will not fail to add to your understanding in such points as I may find you lack amendment.' I made courtesy hereat, and withdrew down the passage and out at the gate, amidst the many varlets and lordly servants who stood around. Thus, you have the history of your neighbour's high chance and entertainment at court; more of which matter when I come home to my dwelling, and talk of these affairs in a corner. I must press to silence hereon, as otherwise all is undone. I did forget to tell that his majesty much asked concerning my opinion of the new weed, tobacco, and said it would, by its use, infuse ill qualities on the brain, and that no learned man ought to taste it, and wished it forbidden. I will now forbear further exercise of your time, as Sir Robert's man waiteth for my letter to bear to you, from your old neighbour,

"Friend and cousin,
"JOHN HARRINGTON."*

CHAPTER VII.

James prided himself highly on his discriminative powers, especially in nice points concerning the administration of justice, in which he fancied that he bore an especial resemblance to Solomon. The following story is not only illustrative of the times, but affords a tolerable notion of the king's boasted powers of discernment. The eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Lake,† secretary of state, was married to Lord Rosse, or Rous, ambassador extraordinary to Spain. Lord Rosse, in consequence of some family misunderstandings, afterwards retired into Italy, where he embraced the Roman Catholic religion. In these family contentions, whatever they might have been, was implicated the young and handsome Countess of Exeter,‡ who, by marriage with the "old, gouty, and diseased" earl, had become step-grandmother of Lord Rosse. With the view of effecting the young countess's ruin, Lady Lake and her daughter, Lady Rosse, accused Lord Rosse§ not only of having been guilty of incest with Lady Exeter, but of having attempted to poison his wife and mother-in-law. The story was soon blazoned abroad, and having reached the king's ears, he examined the witnesses separately on the subject. Lady Exeter could do little more than assert her innocence, which she did with many tears. Lady Lake and her daughter, on the other hand, produced a document purporting to be in the countess's handwriting, in which she declared herself guilty of the charges, and implored the pity and forgiveness of her accusers. This document was stated to have been drawn up and agreed upon at Lord Exeter's house at Wimbleton: the particular apartment, and, indeed, the precise spot in the apartment, were minutely pointed out, and Lord

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Woman in her Social and Domestic Character. By MRS. JOHN SANDFORD. Fifth American edition. Boston: Otis, Broaders & Co. 1840.

Woman as She Should Be. By REV. HUBBARD WINSLOW. Fourth edition. Boston: Otis, Broaders & Co. 1840.

There can be no topic more useful for discussion, not only in books, but in domestic circles, than the appropriate sphere and real duties of women. Sufficient attention has not hitherto been paid to it; and an earnest inquiry set on foot among our most active and intelligent writers, both male and female, could not fail to elicit much practical truth, and exert an extensive influence on society. The volumes before us, which have run through several editions already, are exactly suited to awaken inquiry on this subject, and, to a certain extent, to satisfy inquiry also. They should be universally read, for the soundness of their doctrines, and should form the text-books to be referred to in future discussions.

The History of the Condition of Women, in various Ages and Nations. By MRS. D. L. CHILD. Third edition. Boston: Otis, Broaders & Co. 1840.

Kindred to the above-mentioned works is this of Mrs. Child, whose name is a guarantee for a sensible and useful book. The facts which she has contrived to bring together, in the space of two ordinary duodecimo volumes, evince a degree of perseverance and research only paralleled by the zeal of the writer in the cause of her sex and of humanity. Her volumes will be prized not only on account of the interesting character of the subject, but from their furnishing the historical materials requisite for an intelligent discussion of the proper sphere and duties of woman.

The American Medical Almanac for 1841. Designed for the daily use of Practising Physicians, Surgeons, Students, and Apothecaries; being also a Pocket Memorandum and Account Book, and General Medical Directory of the United States and the British Provinces. By J. V. C. SMITH, M. D., editor of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal. Vol. III, continued annually. Boston: Otis, Broaders & Co. 1841.

The title page of this book gives a perfectly full and satisfactory account of the contents. It is very neatly got up in the small pocket size, and substantially bound,

From Bentley's Miscellany for November.

THE ORIGIN OF THE BUCEAUR.

A man yet young, but clad in garments tatter'd
A man of evident griefs—for suffering
Looks from his hollow cheek, and from his shatter'd
Yet noble form, and dimm'd, yet threatening Glaucous, whose haughtiness might quail a king)—
Before the Doge Ciani's palace gate
Hath sat for days—motionless as a thing
Of marble!—Suppliants, officers of state,
Guards, gorgeous dames, the servitors who wait,
Pass and repass, and yet he heeds them not!—
His soul sits brooding on his dreary fate!—
“The Doge Ciani comes!”—He moves no jot—
No homage yields—scarce hears the crowd's acclaim—Nay, scarce the Doge's shout, “Ha!—art thou not?— Thy name?”

“Name! I had two!—one titular, one my own—
Roland Ranucci was my name by birth;
But Alexander is the one more known.
Sienna was my birth-place, the wide earth
Has been my kingdom, and my will sent forth
Mandates, which monarchs, slave-like, have obeyed.—
I'm now a mark for mockery and mirth!—
The Kaiser hath despoil'd me, and hath made
The Holder of the Keys, his arts betray'd,
A houseless vagabond!—yes, so that Rome,
The three-crown'd seven hills whereon I sway'd,
Hath yell'd me from her! Friend, nor food, nor home
Have I, nor hope! I would that I were dead!—
Strike!—Barbarossa's gold will pay you for my head!”

The Prince Ciani sinks upon his knee
Before the beggar'd Pontiff, and around
The City of the Islands of the Sea
Behold the nobles groveling on the ground
In homage, like their noblest. A wild sound
Of welcome multitudinous shakes the sky,
Startling like thunder! And the clouds which frown'd
On the unthron'd Alexander's destiny
Are swept away! Visions, long, long past by,
Resume existence in his brain again;
For She of the Lion lifts her hand on high,
Swearing to seek the Kaiser in his den,
By words to calm, or sheathed in steel to cope
With him whose impious soul defies the anointed Pope.

Frederick the Swabian sits in state, and lo!
The Adrian snarls from him. He, the Greek,
Emanuel, blinded, Henry Dandolo,
He, that was after Doge, stands forth to speak
Peace 'twixt the Pontiff and the Prince to seek.
“Venice doth Frederick Barbarossa greet—
Long may he reign, protector of the weak,
And queller of the strong!—Lo, you! the heat
Of furious feud, most impious and unmet
In Christian clime, between thee and the Pope
Rages, which humbly Venice doth entreat
May now be quenched for ever; in which hope
She, for the Pope, her guest, doth peace demand.
Say, wilt the Kaiser take the Pontiff's proffer'd hand?”—

* A melancholy interest surrounds the above production. The clever author, who had been for some time a contributor to our Miscellany, besides being the author of several popular ballads, placed it in our hands only a few days before, in a moment of mental aberration, he terminated his existence. Mr. Inman had been subject to occasional fits of mental excitement, induced principally by too much study. To this clever young man a medal was awarded by the Melodists' Club in 1837, for the words of a song entitled “The Days of Yore,” set to music by John Parry, Jr., and also gained the prize of the value of ten guineas in 1838. Mr. Inman was also the writer of the national song, “St. George's Flag of England,” composed by Mr. Blewett, to whom the same club awarded its prize of fifteen guineas on the 25th of June last. He also wrote the song, “Sweet Mary, Mine,” which Madame Stockhausen and Miss Birch rendered so popular last season by singing it at numerous concerts.

† This was Byron's “octogenarian chief, Byzantium's conquering foe.” Fabellious recounts the perfidy of Emanuel, the Emperor of Constantinople, thus: “Mistrando adunque egli di voler di segreto parlare ad Enrico Dandolo, uno degli ambasciatori, menatolo in luogo occulto, con ferro ardente lo privo di vista.”

“No, by the blood of God!” the Swabian roar'd;
“Hence to your marshy hovels by the sea,
And leave the shaveling to my threatening sword!
What boots our quarrel unto yours or ye?
Nay, mark, moreover, meddlors that ye be,
If ye would not have his fate be your own,
Send me his head,—or you will hear from me!—
And thank your insignificance alone
I keep not yours for hostages. Begone!”
Then Dandolo, “For these thy words, proud king,
The Planter of the Lion to thy throne
Hurls down her gage, and brands thee as a thing
Most miscreant and leprous! and stands forth
As champion to the death for Heaven, 'gainst thee and earth!”

At dawn the Istrian waves were calm and clear,
And ruddy with the morn-blush—but at night
Ruddier with blood, and studded with the gear
Of shatter'd galleys! The wan moon's soft light
Stream'd o'er the fragments of a fearful fight,
Corpses, and mangled limbs! and mast and oar Hither and thither drifting. In fierce might Venice hath grappled with the Emperor,
And grappled, as her custom was of yore,
Daringly! Eighty galleys did she meet
With thirty. Yes, and came off conqueror!
With prizes which outnumbered her own fleet!
Home went her warriors chanting o'er the sea,
“Not unto us, O Lord! be glory given, but Thee!”

Yes, eighty galleys were the armament
Of her whose impress in her after-pride
Was the five vowels! 'Gainst the which were sent
But thirty of th' Italians; but their tried
And val'rous seamanship so well replied
To Austria's boasting, that o' the eighty sail
They captured forty; eight beneath the tide
They sunk. They also took the admiral,
Otho, fierce Redbeard's nephew. A brisk gale Ransomed the rest, or Almaine had not had A galley left to carry home the tale.
Think ye how each Venetian's heart beat glad
To view such booty, gained against such odds.
“A miracle!” they cried. “Not man's hand fought, but God's!”

The admiral, Otho, had a sort of sneaking
Love for the Pope, or haply his own fame,
And wisely owned this vengeance as heaven's wreaking.
Since, thereby, certes, neither shame nor blame
Could fall on his or any other name!
With this consoling subterfuge imprest,
One morning to his grace, the Doge, he came,
And gaining audience, ventured to suggest
That with the family influence he posset,
If he were sent to expound this miracle
To Frederick, all would shortly be redrest.
The Doge assented; Otho's scheme took well.
Worried by words, by superstition cowed,
Bold Frederick lost all heart, and to the Pontiff bowed Abject! Before the altar of Saint Mark

The Pope, in full pontificals arrayed,
Stood, smiles illumining his visage dark!
For at his feet the despot kneels, who laid
Such anguish on his soul, that life was made
A curse! This strange success so fat had fed
His ancient pride, that, all results unweighed,
He placed his foot on Frederick's neck, and said
In the great Psalmist's words, “Thus do I tread
On the young lion, and the venomous snake!”
Whereat the Kaiser raised his bended head,
And cried, “Not thou, but Peter!” Then thus spake
The Pontiff, flashing anger from his eye,
“Peace, impious dog! Not Peter only, also I!”

Then to the Ciani he addressed these words,—
“In memory of this day, and that when ye
Had God to aid the prowess of your swords,
Take ye this ring, and know that we decree
Venice is henceforth sovereign of the sea;
It is her lordship, heritage, and fee.”

* The famous device of Austria, A, E, I, O, U, was first used by Frederick III., who adopted it on his plate, books, and buildings. These initials stand for “Austria Est Imperare Orbi Universo;” or, in German, “Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan.”—Hallam's Middle Ages.

We, God's vicegerent, will it. It shall be
To Venice as a wife. In joy and grief, Handmaid and comfort. To thee, the chief
Of the republic, we entrust this ring,
In token of the covenant; which our brief
At full shall certify! For revelling
Be this day marked amid the calendar,
And kept each year!" It was. 'Twas called the Bucentaur!

J. E. INMAN.

AN UNFORTUNATE AUTHOR.—What truth there may be in the following paragraph from a recent newspaper, we cannot say. There is much of it, however, which we suspect to have a strong general resemblance to circumstances of actual daily occurrence in literature:—

"A person who signs himself 'Samuel Hardman,' and dates from 'King's Road, Brighton,' has addressed a letter 'to the editors of newspapers in Brighton,' in which he 'begs leave to acquaint' them that he has 'lost two hundred and odd pounds by publishing' his 'Descriptive Poem of the Battle of Waterloo,' his 'Petition to the House of Commons, and a few other little things.' He gives the following details of his fruitless exertions to force a sale:—'When I published my "Descriptive Poem of the Battle of Waterloo," I paid three pounds to some of the daily papers, and not less than one pound to all the daily and weekly papers; and also one to all the monthly and quarterly reviews. I placarded the streets from Whitechapel Church to Hyde Park Corner, and so on all round London. I presented a copy to the Lord Mayor in the Mansion House; I had three men walking the streets with boards on their backs three weeks; I had my house in Kennington Lane, close to Vauxhall Gardens, placarded all over; they were acting the Battle of Waterloo in the gardens; and after all this enormous expense, I only sold one sixpenny number, and my publisher, Mr. Chapell, of the Royal Exchange, only sold seven numbers; so that we got four shillings between us, for me laying out upwards of one hundred pounds. I expended the same sum on my "Petition to the House of Commons," thinking that I should recover some part of my former loss; but, alas! I only sold seventeen sixpenny numbers of that petition. I have now only sold sixteen numbers of my five letters.'"

THE LOST DAYS.—Bradley, astronomer-royal, had a considerable share in the assimilation of the British Calendar to that of other nations. Lord Chesterfield was the original promoter of this measure, which was carried in 1751. The following curious anecdote happily illustrates the presumption and ignorance of the mob of those days:—Lord Chesterfield took pains, in the periodical journals of the day, to prepare the minds of the public for the change; but he found it much easier to prevail with the legislature, than to reconcile the great mass of the people to the abandonment of their inveterate habits. When Lord Macclesfield's son stood the great contested election for Oxfordshire, in 1754, one of the most vehement cries raised against him by the mob was, "Give us back the eleven days we have been robbed of"—the reader will recollect that Hogarth introduces this in his Election Feast; and, several years after, when Bradley, worn down by his labours in the cause of science, was sinking under the disease which closed his mortal career, many of the common people attributed his sufferings to a judgment from heaven, for his having been instrumental in what they considered to have been so impious an undertaking.—Edinburgh Review.

* The words which Sabellicus puts into Alexander's mouth, are, "Ricevi questo anello d'oro, o Ciani, e per mia autorità, con questo pegno ti farai il mare soggetto, la qual cosa tu e tuoi successori ogni anno in tal giorno osservate, accio quelle che haveranno a seguire intendano la signoria del mare per ragion de guerra esser vostra, e come la moglie al huomo, così il mare al vostro dominio essere sottoposto."

COFFINS IN HEREFORD CATHEDRAL.—On the 3d of April, men employed in opening a grave in the north aisle of Hereford Cathedral, found, at the depth of about four feet, two stone coffins, one finely chiseled, in which were two male skeletons, evidently the remains of persons holding high offices in the church. One skeleton was enveloped in a silk robe, embroidered with gold lace, and shoes made right and left, with cloth tops and pointed toes, and the hair on the skull was abundant and perfect. The other, which was in the chiseled coffin, had also a robe of silk embroidered with gold, a wig on, but no shoes; under the skull was a pillow with feathers in it. The coffins were covered with stone slabs, but nothing was found indicating the names of the parties.

SELECT CIRCULATING LIBRARY, AND
JOURNAL OF POLITE LITERATURE.

EDITED BY JOHN SANDERSON, ESQ.
Professor of Classics in the Central High School, Philadelphia;
Author of the "Americas in Paris," &c.

The proprietor of this popular and well-known periodical has the gratification of replying to the many affectionate inquiries after its resumption, from his kind friends and patrons—friends and patrons in the true meaning of the words—by the publication of this first number. Restored by a beneficent Providence once more to active life, he hopes again to be able to give that superintendence to the publication which was his pride and pleasure for seven years. He anticipates, with inexpressible satisfaction, the renewal of associations with thousands of families, with either of which an acquaintance is an honour. During his protracted indisposition, the intensity of suffering was greatly mitigated by the generous expressions of sympathy and regard received from his kind-hearted patrons; and the gloom and tedium of a sick room were much lightened by the rays of genuine friendship emitted from every quarter. This egotism, he hopes, will be judged of mildly—he certainly has no wish to make a display—but the impulse of grateful acknowledgment for such disinterested kindness was irrepressible, and he could not announce the reappearance of the work without yielding to it.

To these friends he addresses himself, solicitous for their continued support, and hopes to have the Library once more introduced among their families, see it honoured again with a place on their centre tables, and become a welcome weekly visiter. He is at the same time very desirous to extend his acquaintance and form new friends.

From the arrangements made, dictated by experience, the Library, it is believed, will in every respect be improved. The cover, which is so arranged as to avoid the extra postage, he hopes to make a sheet of abiding interest, so combining original and selected articles, of foreign and domestic literature, science and art, and from such sources of respectability, as to make it a work of authority and reference.

The regularity of its former publication, not a failure in seven years, will be taken as a guarantee for the future punctuality of the Library; but there is only one way to make that permanent, viz. by payment in advance. This is an indispensable pre-requisite from all at a distance. The losses by deviating from this rule formerly, are too heavy to be forgotten soon, and a little reflection may satisfy any one of the reasonableness of the request. The reasons are too obvious, indeed, to require much discussion. Five dollars are all that a subscriber risks, but the publisher risks thousands, by crediting. The publisher is in a city, and can be reached without trouble. A subscriber lives perhaps a thousand miles off; and how is he to be reached? It might cost six times the amount to collect the trifle. Payment in advance, then, as all may perceive, is a reasonable request, and sad experience compels the proprietor to make it absolute. The few who paid in advance for 1840, will be supplied for 1841, unless otherwise ordered.

An early remittance of names is respectfully urged, so as to enable the proprietor to make proper calculations about the quantity to be printed, as he will print very few over the number absolutely subscribed for. To this he would call particular attention.

To his brethren of the press, throughout the country, the proprietor returns grateful thanks for former favours, and hopes the work will be again so conducted as to warrant a renewal of their friendly assistance. A few copies of the Port Folio are still on hand, a year of which will be forwarded in payment for advertising as much of this announcement as they may think an equivalent; or two years will be sent for publishing the whole.

TERMS.

1. The Library is published on a double royal sheet, sixteen pages quarto each, on new type, and printed in the best style of book work. The weekly Journal of Belles Lettres will be contained on the two outer leaves of the number. To compensate for this arrangement, five numbers will be published monthly.

2. Price FIVE DOLLARS a year, if paid at, or remitted to, the office. SIX DOLLARS if collected by an agent from this office.

3. Subscriptions commence with January, and no subscriptions taken for less than a year. Letters must be all post-paid. Postmasters are allowed by law to forward subscriptions free. As postage has been a very heavy item of expense, we urgently request subscribers' attention to this.

Premiums.—As we have some extra copies for 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839, we offer two of these years' Library and the new year for Ten Dollars. At the same rate to old subscribers, who wish to complete sets.

A few sets of the Library yet on hand for sale.

We have sent the Library to those old personal friends who were on our list at the "suspension." Those who do not wish to take it, will please let us know through a postmaster—not by returning the number, for that we do not get, but by direct notice.

During the publication of Jesse's work, we propose extracting from the best authors, anecdotes, characters, &c. of the most distinguished persons who flourished during the seventeenth century—thus throwing cotemporary information on the most brilliant period of the history of Europe.

"The standard of virtuous and honourable feeling seems never to have been reduced lower in England than in the reign of James I. Even the most exalted spirits were unable entirely to soar above the mephitic atmosphere in which they were enveloped. The wisdom of Bacon could not prevent him from groveling in the dust of a court, and soiling the splendours of a character which might have shone stainless through all ages, by acts which have rendered him a warning to posterity, when he should have been its highest example. The varied accomplishments of Raleigh, a man whom Nature had fashioned to be the model of all gallantry, honour, and wisdom, serve but as lights to draw into more conspicuous notice his faults and his follies, for of vices he ought surely to be acquitted. Not all the learning and patriotism of Coke can ever cleanse his fame from the blot with which his fierce inhumanity towards the unfortunate Raleigh has stained it. Thus, amongst nearly all the eminent men of that day, we look in vain for that conjunction of the great and the good, which is the only basis of a truly noble character. There cannot be a stronger proof of the disorganised state of moral feeling at this period, than the various fates of the individuals whom we have just named. Somerset, a convicted adulterer and murderer, retired upon a pension. Northampton, his accomplice, endowed an almshouse, and died an edifying death in his own palace. Bacon, the services for which he had sold his honour forgotten, perished in destitute poverty—the learned head and brave heart of Raleigh could not save him from the steel of the executioner; and disgrace was the portion accorded to the honesty and profound sagacity of Sir Edward Coke. In times thus ordered, it is gratifying to find one instance where worth and valour, and learning and prosperity, were all united, as they were in the person of Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury."

The life of Lord Herbert is given by Jesse. It is also written by himself, and in the advertisement prefixed, the following character is given of him by Horace Walpole.

"The noble family which gives these sheets to the world, is above the little prejudices which make many a race defraud the public of what was designed for it by those, who alone had a right to give or withhold. It is above suppressing what Lord Herbert dared to tell. Foibles, passions, perhaps some vanity, surely some wrong-headedness, these he scorned to conceal, for he sought truth, wrote truth, was truth. He honestly told when he had missed or mistaken it. His descendants, not blind to his faults, but through them conducting the reader to his virtues, desire the world to make this candid observation with them: 'that there must have been a wonderful fund of internal virtue, of strong resolution, and manly philosophy, which, in an age of such mistaken and barbarous gallantry, of such absurd usages and false glory, could enable Lord Herbert to seek fame better founded, and could make him reflect, that there might be a more desirable kind of glory than that of a romantic duellist.' None shut their eyes so obstinately against seeking what is ridiculous, as they who have attained a mastery in it: but that was not the case with Lord Herbert. His valour made him a hero, be the heroism in vogue what it would; his sound parts made him a philosopher. Few men, in truth, have figured so conspicuously in lights so various; and his descendants, though they cannot approve him in every walk of glory, would perhaps injure his memory, if they suffered the world to be ignorant, that he was formed to shine in every sphere into which his impetuous temperament or predominant reason conducted him.

"As a soldier, he won the esteem of those great captains, the Prince of Orange, and the Constable de Montmorency. As a knight, his chivalry was drawn from the purest founts of the Fairy Queen. Had he been ambitious, the beauty of his person would have carried him as far as any gentle knight can aspire to go. As a public minister, he supported the dignity of his country, even when his prince disgraced it; and that he was qualified to write its annals, as well as to ennoble them, the history I have mentioned proves, and must make us lament, that he did not complete, or that we have lost, the account he purposed to give of his embassy. These busy scenes were blended with, and terminated by meditation and philosophic enquiries. Strip each period of its excesses and errors, and it will not be easy to trace out, or dispose the life of a man of quality into a succession of employments which would better become him. Valour and military activity in youth, business of state in the middle age, contemplation and labour for the information of posterity in the calmer scenes of closing life. This was Lord Herbert. The deduction he will give himself."

THE OLD KING AND THE YOUNG HEIR.

BY CHARLES WEST THOMSON.

"— all this thou see'st is but a cloud,
And module of confounded royalty." SHAKESPEARE.

High upon the walls of night,
Hangs the belt of proud Orion,
And the winds are moaning light,
Like the growl of slumbering lion.
There's a sadness every where,
O'er the wintry landscape lying;
Men look round with thoughtful air,
For the poor old year is dying.

The poor old year!

There he lies, his sceptre gone,
All his pride and strength departed;
Poor old monarch, pale and wan,
Sick and weak, and broken hearted.

His straggling hair and matted beard,
Show how much he is neglected;
Yet once by many he was feared,
And by the most, at least respected.

Poor old year!

On his bed of withered leaves,
He drags his snowy sheet around him,
His palsied hand no more receives
The rod of power, as when they crowned him.
His fading eye no more retains
The faces near him, friend or lover;
There's scarce a breath of life remains,
Alas! poor king! 'tis almost over.

The poor old year!

The clock! it strikes the midnight round,
One—two—three—four—five—six—seven;
He stands and listens to the sound;
Eight—nine—ten—eleven—
Twelve!—and the moment that the bell,
Its last tone to the air has given,
He falls, as stricken by the knell,
And gives his spirit up to Heaven.

The poor old year!

But hark! what means this merry chime,
Thro' the frosty midnight ringing—
'Tis the prancing steeds of time,
The young heir! the New Year bringing.
How they shout him—how they quaff
Bumpers to his health and glory!
The poor old year hears not their laugh,
He is but a theme for story

To the Merry New Year.

Joyous, blithe he seems, and gay,
Full of hopes and promises—
Pure and fresh, as winds that stray
In summer landward from the seas.
He looks fair and smiling now—
How each heart his presence cheereth!
Think you he will keep his vow?
Will he prove what he appeareth.

A Happy New Year!

God be with us—we know not
What beneath his robe he hideth;
Whether a calm or adverse lot,
Unknown fate for us provideth.
God be with us—let's be gay;
In his smiles hope on, hope ever—
Dream not of the coming day,
But make ourselves amid his favour,

A Happy New Year.

Talent.—Homer was a beggar; Plautus turned a mill; Terence was a slave; Boesius died in jail; Tasso was often distressed for five shillings; Cervante died of hunger; Milton ended his life in obscurity; Bacon lived a life of meanness; Spenser died of want; Dryden lived in poverty and died of distress; Otway died of hunger; Lee in the streets; Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle to save him from prison; Fielding lies in the burying ground of an English factory; Savage died in prison; Chatterton destroyed himself; and John Keats died of a broken heart.

From the Charivari.

THE MAN OF ANECDOTE.

Under the general title of storyteller, I include the members of a family as varied as it is numerous, and which, although appearing under divers denominations, and with separate qualities, do not the less belong to a singular and original type.

There are professed storytellers, in the same way that there are professed vaudeville and romance writers: these deal in written literature, the former in oral literature.

In the hotel, in the back shop, in the cottage, on the deck of each vessel, in the barrack-room, everywhere where men habitually assemble, if only to the number of two or three, there, in the midst of them, we are sure to meet a storyteller, whose constant care it is not to lose ground in the opinion of his audience; and, above all, to observe with jealous care that none encroach on his privileges. Let a number of persons, who are not in the constant habit of meeting together, form an assembly on the occasion of a baptism, a wedding, or a burial, rest assured, that in less than a quarter of an hour one of the party will have assumed the exclusive right of speech, and that he will recount his stories in the waiting room, in the coach, at the church, in the cemetery, at table, in the garden, or at the fireside, in the street, and even to the very door of his dwelling, where a few intrepid auditors never fail to accompany him.

In certain houses, the choice of a storyteller is a matter of nice consideration; on this choice the celebrity of the entertainments given, and the affluence of guests, most frequently depend. Indeed I should not be surprised to see, in letters of invitation, "the storyteller's arm chair will be taken by M. —," as we see in the present day, "A band will attend under the direction of Collinet." I have said that there are storytellers in the same way that there are vaudeville writers; but it was never my intention to institute a comparison between these two estimable classes. Oh, how wide the difference! How great, with regard to genius, are the exigencies of the first compared to those of the second! A vaudeville is played forty or fifty nights, while a story will only serve once. Write three or four vaudevilles in a year, and you will be considered as a distinguished author; but if your budget boast but of two or three anecdotes, the most unpretending salon of the Marais will dismiss you ere a fortnight have elapsed. The storyteller is required to possess an immense, a gigantic magazine; his auditors are endowed with the privilege of hawking about and spreading the story, the bon mot he has brought to light, without even exciting the susceptibility of the société des gens de lettres, but for him the rule non bis in uno is peremptory.

The life of a storyteller is, therefore, one of unceasing labour. He rises every morning with the necessity before him of creating a subject, of grouping his personages, of inventing an intrigue, of hitting off characters, of manufacturing a joke. Nor does his task end here; he must not only possess the qualities of an author, he must also be a finished comedian. Here a particular passage requires a smile on the lip,—there another must be given in a fearful tone; now his diction must be naïf, and now impassioned; here sarcastic and witty, there sombre and terrible; and when he has carefully studied his gesture and expression—when he has gone through what may be called his rehearsal—it is time to appear on the scene of his future exploits.

Like a star who would esteem it infra dig. to appear on the stage at the rise of the curtain, our storyteller always manages to be the last comer. Already he feels the glow of gratified vanity in reflecting that in each group the enquiry is anxiously made, "Do you think he'll come! I wonder whether he'll come!" And what can equal the voluptuous satisfaction he feels on hearing the "ah!" escape from every mouth at his appearance. That "ah!" which is equal to the loud applause with which a favourite actor is greeted on his first appearance for the evening.

After this he makes his tour with open snuff-box for the men, compares all the women under thirty to roses, persuades mammas that they are growing quite young again, and when he has effectually secured the good wishes of his audience, he takes a seat, waits with apparent indifference until a general silence is established, and then commences. He must, indeed, be inexperienced and imprudent who would dare to gather a single branch of the laurel which it is the storyteller's privilege to monopolise. The latter, who is a sworn foe to competition, has a thousand means whereby to crush his rival at the outset—a pitiful smile, accompanied with a slight shrug of the shoulders,—a fit of sneezing at the most interesting passage, or a controversy suddenly entered into in the very middle of the story on a point of the utmost indifference. One might swear it was a dramatic author called upon to judge the composition of a brother in trade. Every storyteller has his peculiar line. This one excels in sentimental stories, that in tales of travel, another is ever on the scent for scandalous adventures; some deal in reminiscences of the empire, others are acknowledged masters in the art of punning; every school has its representative, every style boasts of its celebrity, from the classic to the romantic, from the ancient tragedy to the modern sea novel.

It is no extraordinary thing to see a storyteller arrive at a venerable old age. But, alas! Voltaire's are scarce; most commonly, a storyteller who has passed his sixtieth year can claim no other title than that of dotard; and we avoid him with as much eagerness as formerly we sought him with. Think not that this decay can ever induce him to give up. The storyteller is the intrepid champion of his worth, and, like a certain actress of our acquaintance, prefers universal desertion to an honourable retreat. This suggests a reminiscence which I shall not be sorry to relate in conclusion of this article.

Among the storytellers who flourished among the last generation, perhaps the most remarkable was C—V—. He had established his chair in the green room of one of our first theatres, and there nightly delighted an audience as numerous as it was select. When C—V— had grown so old as no longer to find sufficient resources in his exhausted imagination, while, notwithstanding, death would have appeared less bitter than the obligation of renouncing his daily tribute of admiration and applause; how was he to do? This is the expedient on which he hit. C—V— made, with his son, H—, a very clever young man to this day, a treaty, whereby he should become bound to compose facetious stories for his father, at the rate of 12 fr. for each story. Thus revivified, our venerable storyteller would cling more tenaciously than ever to the arm chair which had witnessed all his flattering triumphs, secretly determined not to quit it until his very last gasp. But it sometimes happened that H—, whether through laziness or thoughtlessness, would give his father a second edition of some bon mot or adventure, which he had already sold a fortnight back, and for which he received double pay without a blush. If the memory of the old man had lost its tenacity, that of his audience had not, who invariably stopped him with the heart-breaking remark, "You have told us that already."

Then poor C—V— would suddenly break up the assembly and make his retreat, in an agony of noble indignation; and, ordering his son to be brought before him, would greet him with the following rebuke: "Wretch! you have dared to sell me the same pun twice; you have basely deceived your old father; you have committed a paltry theft; and I predict that you will end your days on the gallows!"

A LESSON IN DANCING, AND A CLEVER DANCING MASTER.

"Have you read Baruch?" was the question which La Fontaine was in the habit of propounding to every person he met. "Have you read Young?" we should take the liberty of asking, were not the enquiry a useless one. Who has not wandered, with the poet of the "Night Thoughts," under the gloomy cypress trees of the churchyards his imagination loved to depict! for, in spite of their dark and sombre colouring, his portraits possess attractions which it is almost impossible to resist. Such is the constitution of the heart; in its alternations of reverie, the image of grief and suffering is not without a certain charm; and we all know, and must have felt, that there is a pleasure even in melancholy.

And yet how much in Young is false and exaggerated! How little he possesses of that gentle and unaffected sadness which finds its way at once to the heart, and twines around its strings while it softens and relaxes them; in fact, in his strained and pompous elegies, there is something laboured and artificial, which checks the illusion, and compels us to think of the author instead of the sentiment. There are fine verses and fine images, but very little nature. True grief, the grief which consoles the heart as if with a hand of iron, does not so coquettishly and carefully arrange the crape folds of its mourning. The declamation of Young is constantly directed against solitude; hence we infer that reverie and contemplation were not habitual to him; yet the Parnassus of the poets is a solitary mountain. Be this as it may, it would have seemed at one time that the most emphatic of our elegiac poets was not predestined to sigh away his soul in lugubrious accents. In his youth, when the horizon of his future life was brilliant clouds, he was among the gayest and merriest, hurrying joyfully along the path of life, and gathering the smiling flowers that embroidered its walks. It was not until multiplied chagrins and bitter disappointments had shivered the prism which reflected so bright a tint on the objects of his hopes and fancy, that he gave utterance to those lamentations which conjure up so despairing an image of human nature.

When Young left the university, he was a master of arts, and brought away with him a vast stock of Greek and Latin. But the fire of a fine imagination was not extinguished under the heavier acquisition of his scholastic pursuits; its vivida vis and enthusiasm had survived, and Rosse himself, and his Spanish servant Diego, were asserted to have been witnesses. James, however, was far from being satisfied with the testimony which had been brought forward: he, very properly, despatched a serjeant-at-arms to Rome, who returned with a strong asseveration from Lord Rosse and his servant, that the statement was wholly and entirely false. In addition to this step, the king took the trouble of comparing Lady Exeter's supposed confession with some of her letters, the result of which was, the expression of his decided opinion that the criminating document was a forgery. Having summoned Lady Lake and her daughter into his presence, and explained his reasons for suspicion, he informed them, that, as the charge now rested entirely on their own assertions, he must require the joint testimony of some other party. A chambermaid, one Sarah Swarton, was then produced, who affirmed that she had stood behind a hanging at the entrance of the apartment, and had overheard the countess reading the confession of her own guilt. In addition to this, a document was produced, purporting to be the deposition of one Luke Hutton, that for forty pounds Lady Exeter had hired him to poison her accusers: this man, however, happened opportunely to appear, and denied all knowledge of the affair.

In order to ascertain what degree of credit was to be placed in the sole remaining testimony of the chambermaid, James took an opportunity of riding to Wimbledon, for the purpose of having a personal survey of the scene of action. On inspecting the apartment in which Lady Exeter was said to have made her confession, James discovered that a person standing behind the hangings could not possibly have heard the voice of another, if placed in the situation sworn to by Sarah Swarton: the experiment was severally made by the king and the courtiers who accompanied him. The next step was to summon the housekeeper, by whom, being assured that the same hangings had remained there for thirty years, the king immediately remarked, that they did not reach within a foot of the ground, and could not consequently have concealed any person who endeavoured to hide behind them. "Oaths," said James, "cannot confound my sight."

Previous to the trial of Lady Rosse and her mother for conspiracy, the king sent for Sir Thomas Lake, and advised him to leave his wife and daughter to their fate. Sir Thomas, however, declined doing so, observing that he could not refuse to be a husband and a father. The cause was heard before James in the star chamber, and lasted five days. The king was commencing to produce his evidence, when Lady Rosse anticipated him by confessing her guilt, and thus escaped the penal sentence which she would otherwise have incurred. Lady Lake was fined ten thousand pounds to the king, five thousand to the Countess of Exeter, and fifty pounds to Hutton. Sarah Swarton was sentenced to be whipt at the cart's tail, and to do penance at St. Martin's church. The king compared what had taken place with the circumstance of the transgression of our first parents; Lady Lake he likened to the serpent, her daughter to Eve, and Sir Thomas to Adam. Sir Thomas Lake asserted that the whole affair cost him thirty thousand pounds.*

James would merit far higher praise for discernment, could we bring home to him the credit of having discovered the hidden meaning contained in the famous letter to Lord Mounteagle, which led to the annihilation of the popish plot. Whether, however, this remarkable instance of discrimination is to be attributed to him or to Secretary Cecil, will probably ever remain in doubt.*

The personal accomplishments of James were decidedly inferior to his intellectual acquirements. The portraits of him are less numerous than might have been expected, in consequence of a superstitious repugnance which he entertained to sit for his picture, a weakness which Dr. Johnson informs us, may be reckoned among the infirmitates of the human mind.† In stature James was rather above than below the common size—not ill made, though inclined to obesity; his face full and ruddy; his beard thin; and his hair of a light brown, though latterly it had become partially gray. Sir Anthony Weldon thus describes the king's personal appearance and peculiarities, with which he must have been well acquainted. "He was of a middle stature, more corpulent through his clothes than in his body, yet fat enough, his clothes ever being made large and easy, the doublets quilted for stiletto proof, his breeches in great plaits and full stuffed; he was naturally of a timorous disposition, which was the reason of his quilted doublets; his eyes large, ever rolling after any stranger that came in his presence, insomuch as many for shame have left the room, as being out of countenance; his beard was very thin; his tongue too large for his mouth, which ever made him speak full in the mouth, as if eating his drink, which came out into the cup on each side of his mouth; his skin was as soft as taffetta sarsenet, which felt so, because he never washed his hands, only rubbed his fingers' ends slightly with the wet end of a napkin; his legs were very weak, having had (as was thought) some foul play in his youth before he was born, that he was not able to stand at seven years of age; that weakness made him ever leaning on other men's shoulders." From what we have seen of the king's character, we should rather have attributed the last mentioned peculiarity to a moral, instead of a constitutional weakness.

* In his speech to parliament concerning the plot, the king gives himself the sole credit of the discovery: "When the letter was showed to me by my secretary, wherein a general obscure advertisement was given of some dangerous blow at this time, I did upon the instant interpret and apprehend some dark phrases therein, contrary to the ordinary grammar construction of them, and in another sort, than I am sure any divine, or lawyer, in any university would have taken them to be meant, by this horrible form of blowing us up all by powder; and, therefore, ordered that search to be made, whereby the matter was discovered and the man apprehended." Harl. Misc. vol. iii. p. 8. Again, in the preamble to the act for a public thanksgiving, we find—"The conspiracy would have turned to the utter ruin of this kingdom, had it not pleased Almighty God, by inspiring the king's most excellent majesty with a divine spirit to interpret some dark phrases of a letter showed to his majesty, above and beyond all ordinary construction, thereby miraculously discovering this hidden treason." We can hardly imagine the king making so public a boast, or rather, being guilty of so gross a falsehood, had the credit been due to another; and yet it is curious, in the circular of the Earl of Salisbury, to find the following decisive passage: "We (Salisbury and Suffolk) both conceived that it could not by any other way be like to be attempted than with powder, while the king was sitting in that assembly, of which the lord chamberlain conceived more probability, because there was a great vault under the said chamber, we all thought fit to forbear to impart it to the king until some three or four days before the Sessions."—Winwood, vol. ii. p. 171.

James was extremely indifferent as to dress, and is said to have worn his clothes as long as they would hang together. When a new-fashioned Spanish hat was once brought him, he pushed it away, observing that he neither liked the Spaniards nor their fashions. On another occasion, when an attendant produced for his wear a pair of shoes adorned with rosettes, he inquired whether they intended to make a "ruff-footed dove" of him? He was so regular in his habits and meals, that one of his courtiers observed, that were he to awake after a seven years' sleep, he would not only be able to tell where the king had been on each particular day, but what he had partaken of for dinner.

In his hunting costume, the appearance of James must have been highly ludicrous: Walpole says he hunted in the "most cumbersome and inconvenient of all dresses, a ruff and trouser breeches." Sir Richard Baker, who was knighted by James, informs us that the king's manner of riding was so remarkable, that it could not with so much propriety be said that he rode, as that his horse carried him. James was accustomed to say that "a horse never stumbled but when he was reined."

The king's equestrian ungainliness was the more unfortunate, in one of his exalted rank, as all processions, and journeys of state and convenience, were at this period, with few exceptions, performed on horseback. Even the peers were accustomed to ride to parliament in their robes. Sir Symonds D'Ewes, in his curious journal, gives the following description of one of the royal processions to the house of lords: it is illustrative of the character of James and the manners of the period. "I got a convenient place in the morning, not without some danger escaped, to see his majesty pass to parliament in state. It is only worth the inserting in this particular, that Prince Charles rode with a rich coronet on his head, between the serjeants-at-arms carrying maces, and the pensioners carrying their pole-axes, both on foot. Next before his majesty rode Henry Vere, Earl of Oxford,* Lord Great Chamberlain of England, with Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel,† Earl Marshal of England, on his left hand, both bareheaded. Then followed his majesty with a rich crown upon his head, and most royally caparisoned.

"In the king's short progress from Whitehall to Westminster, these passages following were accounted somewhat remarkable:—First, That he spake often and lovingly to the people, standing thick and threefold on all sides to behold him. 'God bless ye! God bless ye!' contrary to his former hasty and passionate custom, which often in his sudden distemper would bid a p—x or a plague on such as flocked to see him; secondly, Though the windows were filled with many great ladies as he rode along, yet that he spake to none of them but to the Marquis of Buckingham's mother and wife, who was the sole daughter and heir to the Earl of Rutland; thirdly, That he spake particularly and bowed to the Count of Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador; and fourthly, That looking up to one window as he passed, full of gentlemen and ladies, all in yellow bands, he cried out aloud, 'A p—x take ye, are ye there?' at which, being much ashamed, they all withdrew themselves suddenly from the window."

James appears, not only to have merited his reputed character for cowardice, but to have been totally deficient in that tact which occasionally suffices to conceal a deficiency of personal courage. Even the story related of him, that he shuddered at the sight of a drawn sword, appears to be deserving of credit. Sir Kenelm Digby in his Powder of Sympathy, assures us that when James knighted him, he very narrowly escaped having the sword thrust into his eyes: the king turning away his face, in order to avoid the sight of the naked weapon, the Duke of Buckingham was actually obliged to guide his hand to the knight's shoulder. Sir Kenelm attributes this particular weakness to the fright occasioned to his unhappy mother, by the assassination of Rizzio in her presence: she was at the time far gone in her pregnancy with James.

The ridicule which want of courage drew down upon James, was not confined to his own subjects. In France, it was not unusual to distinguish the weak monarch as Queen James, and his high-spirited predecessor as King Elizabeth. Sully tells us, that Henry the Fourth used to style his brother monarch captain at arts and clerk at arms. The following epigram was popular at the period:—

Tandis qu' Elizabeth fut Roy,
L'Anglois fut d'Espagne l'effroy;
Maintenant, devise et caquette,
Regi par la reine Jaquette.

The following translation appears to have been the most ingenious:—

While Elizabeth was England's king,
That dreadful name through Spain did ring;
How altered is the case—ad sa' me!
These juggling days of gude queen Jamie!

In a caricature of the time, James was exhibited with an empty scabbard; and in another as having his sword so firmly in its scabbard, that it was impossible to draw it out.*

There are numerous other instances, of the king's private failings having been lashed by the wits of the period. A lampoon, containing some impudent reflections upon his court, was perused by him with evident indignation. At last he came to the concluding couplet, when his face suddenly lighted up with a smile. The lines which wrought the change were as follows:—

God bless the king, the queen, the prince, the peers,
And grant the author long may wear his ears!

"By my faith, and so he shall for me," said the easy monarch; "for though he be an impudent, he is a witty and pleasant rogue."

James was constitutionally what may be called good-natured; but with the increase of years and political embarrassments, he became fretful, impatient, and suspicious. So melancholy and irritable was he at times, that it required all the efforts of Buckingham and his mother to rouse him from despondency. Sometimes he would break out into the most passionate fits of anger; and though his better nature eventually prevailed, yet the manner in which he expressed his regret was frequently quite as unkingly, as had been the previous exhibition of his rage. On one occasion, happening to require some papers relative to the prince's proposed marriage with a daughter of Spain, he sent for his old and faithful servant, John Gib, a Scotsman, to whom he imagined he had intrusted them. Gib asserting that they had never been in his keeping, and all endeavours to discover them proving vain, the king flew into a violent passion: Gib, in order to assuage his anger, threw himself on his knees at the king's feet, declaring that he was ready to suffer death, should it be ever proved that the papers had been delivered to his custody. James, losing all self-command, was cowardly enough to give his faithful old servant a kick. Gib, instantly, and in natural indignation, rose from his knees, and addressing himself to the king:—"Sir," he said, "I have served you from my youth, and you never found me unfaithful; I have not deserved this insult from you, nor can I bear to live with you after such a disgrace. Fare ye well, sir, I shall never see your face more;" on which he left the royal presence, mounted his horse, and rode to London. Shortly after this the papers were found, and James became alive to the act of groos injustice of which he had been guilty. He was unmeasured in the terms of reproach which he heaped upon himself, and having despatched messengers in the utmost haste after Gib, declared that he would neither eat, drink, nor sleep, till he again beheld the face of his injured follower. Gib having been induced to return, and having been conducted into the royal presence, James, in his turn, fell on his knees before him, imploring his pardon, and expressing his determination not to rise till he had obtained the forgiveness of his servant. For some time Gib modestly declined, but James would on no account be satisfied till the words of pardon had actually been pronounced.

CHAPTER VIII.

The king appears to have entertained a sort of presentiment of his own end. He had been much affected by the deaths of the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton:—"When the branches," he said, "are cut down, the tree cannot long remain." His last illness commenced with a tertian ague, and was followed by a fever, which proved fatal. The courtiers, in order to console him, reminded him of an old proverb, that an ague in the spring was life for a king: he replied, that the proverb was meant for a young king. James, however, stood little in need of consolation; the courage, in which he had formerly been deficient, seemed eminently conspicuous in his death. He prepared himself for his end with a decency and a fortitude which would have been creditable to a braver man, and was not unworthy of the religion which he professed.

We have the authority of his physician, Sir Theodore Mayerne, that the king had been suffering for some time from stone, gout, and gravel: and according to Bishop Goodman, he was guilty of imprudences which were not unlikely to hasten his end. "Truly," says the gossiping prelate, "I think King James every autumn did feed a little more than moderately upon fruits; he had his grapes, his nectarines, and other fruits, in his own keeping; besides, we did see that he fed very plentifully on them from abroad. I remember that Mr. French of the spiceery, who sometimes did present him with the first strawberries, cherries, and other fruits, and kneeling to the king, had some speech to use to him; that he did desire his majesty to accept them, and that he was sorry they were no better, with such like complimentary words; but the king never had the patience to hear him one word, but his hand was in the basket. After this eating of fruit in the spring time, his body fell into a great looseness; which, although while he was young, did tend to preserve his health, yet now, being grown toward sixty, it did a little weaken his body, and going from Theobald's to Newmarket, and stirring abroad when, as the coldness of the year was not yet past almost, it could not be prevented but he must fall into a quartan ague, for recovery whereof the physicians taking one course and the plaister another." His unwieldy size, for his obesity had increased with his years, had rendered such a complication of disorders the more formidable. Besides, he had always conceived such a repugnance to physic, that the doctors, even in his worst attacks, were unable to persuade him to have recourse to it. As his indisposition became more alarming, he retired to Theobald's, which had ever been his favourite residence, and which was shortly to become the scene of his dissolution. The Lord Keeper Williams (a man whose power of amusing others appears to have been considerable) was no sooner acquainted with the king's danger, than he hastened to the royal presence, and remaining by his bedside till midnight, attempted to cheer and console the sick monarch. The following morning there was a consultation of physicians, who gave it as their opinion that his majesty's case was hopeless. When this was intimated to the lord keeper, with the prince's permission, he knelt by the bed of the royal patient:—"he came," he said, "with the message of Isaiah to Hezekiah, to exhort him to set his house in order, for that his days would be but few in the world." "I am satisfied," replied the king calmly, "and I desire you to assist me in preparing to go hence, and to be with Christ, whose mercies I pray for, and hope to find."

Feeling his strength declining, he sent for Prince Charles, whom he retained in conversation for three hours. He solemnly exhorted him to fix his thoughts on religion, to uphold the church of England, and to take the family of the palatine under his protection. The points on which the king admonished his son must have been communicated by the prince himself, since we find, by a letter of the time, that in order that the conversation might be secret, not a single person was admitted within the distance of two or three rooms.

On the Thursday before his dissolution, the king received the sacrament, with which he expressed himself much comforted; and from this period he continued praying and meditating on religious subjects.

The lord keeper never left the sick chamber, nor changed his dress, till the king had breathed his last, but continued by his bedside, endeavouring to make his path easy to another world.

On the Friday night his tongue had become so swollen that it was with difficulty he could make himself understood. A little before break of day, on the Sunday, he expressed a wish to have another interview with Prince Charles, who instantly rose and came in his night dress to the king's bedside. The dying monarch endeavoured to raise himself on his pillow, as if he had something of importance to impart, but by this time his speech was inaudible. In his last moments, however, when the prayer commonly used at the hour of death was concluded, he repeated once or twice the words, Veni, Domine Jesu, and shortly after ceased to breathe, without any appearance of pain. The lord keeper closed the king's eyes with his own hand.

It may not be out of place to speculate for a moment on the nature of those religious feelings, which could enable a pusillanimous monarch to support with dignity and courage the afflictions of disease and the terrors of dissolution. James had naturally the highest reverence for religion; his intentions were generally laudable; and he had from his youth been a constant observer of the external ordinances of the church, and even supported its supremacy with his pen. Unfortunately, however, he was a mere creature of impulse; easily led astray by passion, or the temptation of the moment. With an inherent anxiety to do good, he was constantly committing evil. Still, however, there was the same veneration for the Deity, and the same ardour in his cause. The error or crime of to-day was followed by penitential tears on the morrow, an anomaly which continued to the last moment of his existence. Socrates considers that a disinclination for crime is an apology for its commission. This apothegm reminds us of the murderer's consolation on the scaffold, who expressed his hopes of being saved, on the ground that he had never passed by a church without taking off his hat. Religion, unfortunately, owing to the weakness of human nature, is open to innumerable and strange perversions; and, like many others, James had no doubt fostered illusions which smoothed his path to eternity. The contrivers of the famous gunpowder plot (many of whom were persons really estimable in private life) conceived, that, by a terrible annihilation of some hundreds of their fellow-creatures, they were doing God service, and securing their own eternal happiness: some allowance, therefore, may be made for James, if he placed any reliance on the respect which he had ever intended to pay to religion; and on the credit of having written some ponderous dissertations in its favour.

With regard to ecclesiastical government during his reign, James has certainly proved himself wiser than his generation. Notwithstanding his firm attachment to the interest and doctrines of the church of England, and in spite of the obloquy which was heaped upon him, he was personally well inclined to religious toleration. Possibly he had some speculative notion, of what a more extensive experience has since substantiated, that in order to destroy heresy, it is the worst policy to oppress it. In the history of the world, there does not appear to be any known instance of schism having been destroyed by violence. These remarks, however, on the king's conduct, refer principally to his treatment of the Roman catholic portion of his subjects. Even the fact of the horrible gunpowder treason made but little difference in the line of his religious policy; with a laudable magnanimity he refrained from visiting the sins of the few upon the heads of the many, and continued in the same course of mildness and conciliation to the last. There is a supposition that, in James's toleration of the papists, he had in view the increased indulgences which his own subjects might expect in foreign countries. Again, less laudable motives may be attributed to him. It may be reasonably argued, that he had an object in balancing the power of the Roman catholics against the augmenting influence of the puritans. Possibly, too his apprehensions of personal danger were not without their weight; James must have been well aware of the risk which he incurred should he make himself odious to a daring and relentless party.* It has been supposed, and that not without reason, that the exertions and sufferings of the Roman catholics, in behalf of his unhappy mother, may in some degree have influenced him in his praiseworthy moderation.

There is, however, a more substantial reason why we should not bestow unqualified praise upon James for his religious toleration. It is not generally known, perhaps, that two unhappy creatures were burnt for heresy during his reign. One of these, Bartholomew Legate, a Socinian, is said to have been remarkable for theological learning, and for the blamelessness of his career. James attempted to convert him; but finding him fixed in his persuasions, the bishops declared him to be an intractable heretic, and he was burned to ashes at Smithfield. The other victim was one Edward Wightman, a harmless enthusiast, who had the misfortune to fancy himself Elias. The heresies of Ebion, Cerinthus, Valentinian, Arrius, Macedonius, Simon Magus, Manes, Manicheus, Photinus, and the Anabaptists, names of which the unhappy being had probably never heard, were summed up in the warrant for his execution.

One act of James's life can never be sufficiently commended. During the progresses made through his kingdom, he had noticed the pernicious effects which a puritanical observance of the Sabbath was producing on the health and happiness of the lower classes of his subjects. With the certainty that religious bigotry would be every where arrayed against him, he issued a proclamation, that, after the performance of divine service, his subjects should be allowed to indulge in all legitimate sports and amusements. Without entering into any theological discussion, as to the proper observance of the Lord's day, there are few who will deny to James the real credit which he deserved on this occasion. Surely that monarch stands high among the thrones of the earth, who willingly turns from his own pomps and vanities, to the sufferings and discomforts of the poor and unprotected; and who readily encounters obloquy and discontent, in order to throw a gleam of sunshine over the broad shadows of human wretchedness.

The suspicion, which was very commonly entertained at the time, that James met his death by poison, has either been altogether disregarded, or obscurely hinted at, by our historians. So usual has it ever been to attribute the deaths of princes to foul play, that we must receive with extreme caution any arguments which may be brought forward in support of any such supposition in the present case. That Buckingham and his mother applied remedies to the sick monarch, which were totally unauthorised by the physicians, is a fact beyond the possibility of a doubt. Whether, however, these remedies were of an injurious nature, and intended to destroy existence, is a circumstance not so easy to resolve.

Certain it is that Buckingham was fast declining in the royal favour, and that he had every thing to gain, and nothing to lose, by the king's demise at that particular time. Dr. Eglisiam, one of the royal physicians, accused Buckingham, in print, of having murdered his sovereign; and another of the king's physicians, Dr. Craig, was banished the court for giving utterance to his suspicions. The latter individual was great uncle to Bishop Burnet, who informs us that his father had the account from Craig, and was by him strongly prepossessed with the truth of the accusation. "The king," says Coke, having had an ague, the Duke of Buckingham did, upon Monday the 21st, when in the judgment of the physicians the ague was declining, apply plaisters to the wrists and belly of the king, and also did deliver several quantities of drink to the king, though some of the king's physicians did disallow thereof, and refused to meddle further with the king, until the said plaisters were removed; and that the king found himself worse thereupon, and that drougths, raving, fainting, and an intermitting pulse followed hereupon; and the drink was twice given by the duke's own hands, and a third time refused; and the physicians to comfort him, telling him that this second impairment was from cold taken, or some other cause: 'No, no,' said the king, 'it is that which I had from Buckingham.' " Weldon says, that during the king's illness, he frequently implored the Earl of Montgomery to be careful that he had fair play; and that, on one occasion, when his servants were endeavouring to console him, "Ah," he said, "it is not the ague that afflicts me, but the powder I have taken, and the black plaister they have laid on my stomach." A less suspicious authority is Bishop Goodman, who, while he entirely exculpates Buckingham, evidently believes that his old master met with an untimely end. "I have no good opinion," he says, "of his death, yet I was the last man who did him homage in the extremity of his sickness." Howell, who was at Theobald's at the time of the king's death, in a letter to his father, alludes to the mutterings of the doctors, that a plaister had been applied by the duke's mother, to the "outside of the king's stomach."

Arthur Wilson, another contemporary writer, does not materially differ from the foregoing accounts. "The king," he says, "that was very much impatient in his health, was patient in his sickness and death. Whether he had received any thing that extorted his anguish fits into a fever, which might the sooner stupify the spirits, and hasten his end, cannot be asserted; but the Countess of Buckingham had been tampering with him in the absence of the doctors, and had given him a medicine to drink, and laid a plaister on his side, of which the king much complained, and they did rather exasperate his distemper than allay it: and these things were admitted by the insinuating persuasions of the duke her son, who told the king they were approved medicines, and would do him much good. And though the duke often strove to purge himself for this application, as having received both medicine and plaister from Dr. Remington, at Dunmow, in Essex, who had often cured agues and such distempers with the same; yet they were arguments of a complicated kind, not easy to unfold; considering that whatsoever he received from the doctor in the country, he might apply to the king what he pleased in the court."

It would be curious to ascertain the nature and ingredients of the remedies, which were applied by Buckingham. Bishop Kennett informs us, that he was shown a copy of Dr. Eglisham's pamphlet against Buckingham by the Spanish ambassador, in which Eglisham declared, that neither he nor the other physicians could discover the nature of the plaister. It appears also, by the same authority, that about a week after the king's death, Eglisham being on a visit with Sir Matthew Lister at the Earl of Warwick's house in Essex, situated close to the residence of Dr. Remington, they sent for the doctor, in order to ascertain the nature of the plaister which he had supplied to Buckingham. Remington giving them the information they required, Sir Matthew Lister produced a piece of the plaister which had been applied to the king. On examining it, Remington seemed much surprised, and offered to take an oath that it was not the same which he had sent to the duke. There is a copy of Eglisham's pamphlet in the British Museum, which has been reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany; but there is no trace of the passage alluded to by Kennett. Sanderson, another writer of the time, assures us that the drink given to James, was "a posset of milk and ale, hartshorn, and marygold flowers, ingredients harmless and ordinary." With regard to the plaister, he says, "that although the physicians were justly offended at the duke's interference with their practice, yet that the composition was as harmless as the drink, and that a portion of it was even eat by those who had manufactured it. For some months afterwards, he says, it was open to the examination of the curious.

Eglisham's pamphlet, though undoubtedly curious, is only to be received as evidence, when corroborated by the assertions of other writers. After the king's death he gave such unguarded utterance to his suspicions, as to render it necessary for his own safety that he should fly the kingdom. He retired to Brussels, where he published the tract in question. It had been, in the first instance, submitted, in the form of a petition, to the two houses of parliament; but whether it was actually presented, does not appear. It was afterwards translated into High Dutch, with a view of throwing obloquy upon the royal family of England. The suspicions of Eglisham's veracity are founded on the extreme rancorous feeling which he exhibits towards Buckingham, and some internal absurdities to which we shall hereafter allude. The following passage is more remarkable, from its being borne out, in a great degree, by the evidence of the writers already recited:—"The king being sick of a certain ague, which in the spring was of itself never found deadly, the duke took this opportunity, when all the doctors of physic were at dinner, upon the Monday before the king died, without their knowledge or consent, and offered to him a white powder to take, the which he a long time refused; but overcome with his flattering importunity, at length took it in wine, and immediately became worse and worse, falling into many swoonings and pains, so tormented, that his majesty cried out aloud of this white powder,

'Would to God I had never taken it! it will cost me my life.'

"In like manner, also, the Countess of Buckingham, my Lord of Buckingham's mother, upon the Friday, the physicians being also absent and at dinner, and not made acquainted with her doings, applied a plaister to the king's heart and breast; whereupon he grew faint and short breathed, and in a great agony. Some of the physicians after dinner, returning to see the king, by the offensive smell of the plaister, perceived something to be about him, hurtful to him, and searched what it should be, and found it out, and exclaimed that the king was poisoned. The Duke of Buckingham entering, commanded the physicians out of the room, caused one of them to be committed prisoner to his own chamber, and another to be removed from court; quarreled with others of the king's servants in his sick majesty's own presence so far, that he offered to draw his sword against them in his majesty's sight. And Buckingham's mother, kneeling down before his majesty, cried out with a brazen face, 'Justice, justice, sir, I demand justice of your majesty!' His majesty asked her for what? 'For that which their lives are no way sufficient to satisfy, for saying that my son and I have poisoned your majesty?' 'Poisoned me?' said he; with that, turning himself, swooned, and she was removed.*

"The Sunday after his majesty died, Buckingham desired the physicians who attended his majesty to sign with their own hands a writ of testimony, that the powder which he gave him was a good and safe medicine, which they refused.

"Immediately after his majesty's death, the physician, who was commanded to his chamber, was set at liberty, with a caveat to hold his peace; the others threatened, if they kept not good tongues in their heads.

"But in the mean time the king's body and head swelled above measure, his hair, with the skin of his head, stuck to his pillow, and his nails became loose upon his fingers and toes."

Eglisham, moreover, accused the duke of having caused the death of the Marquess of Hamilton by poison. The following passage is too ridiculous for belief, and goes far to throw an air of fiction over Eglisham's extraordinary narration. The post-mortem appearance of the marquess's body is thus described. "No sooner was he dead, when the force of the poison began to overcome the force of his body, but it began to swell in such a sort, that his thighs were swollen six times as big as their natural proportion, his belly became as big as the belly of an ox, his arms as the natural quantity of his thighs, his neck as broad as his shoulders, his cheeks over the top of his nose, that his nose could not be seen or distinguished; the skin of his forehead two fingers high. He was all over of divers colours, full of waters, some white, some black, some red, some yellow, some green, some blue, and that as well within his body as without.

* Mr. Meade, in a letter to Sir Martin Stuteville, thus alludes to this remarkable scene:—"The Countess of Buckingham, the Tuesday before he [the king] died, would needs make trial of some receipt she had approved; but being without the privacy of the physicians, occasioned so much discontent in Dr. Cragge, that he uttered some plain speeches, for which he was commanded out of the court, the duke himself, (as some say) complaining to the sick king of the word he spake."—Ellis's Orig. Letters, vol. iii. p. 183.

His mouth and nose foaming blood, mixed with froth of divers colours, a yard high."

We are not informed by Dr. Eglisham, why the king's body did not exhibit similar evidences of foul play. Certain it is, that no traces of poison were discoverable. In a letter of the time, from Mr. Joseph Meade to Sir Martin Stuteville, we find that when the body was opened by the physicians, they found "his heart of an extraordinary bigness, all his vitals sound, as also his head, which was very full of brains; but his blood was wonderfully tainted with melancholy; and the corruption thereof supposed the cause of his death." Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who adds his quantum of suspicion to the "potion and plaister," informs us that when the king's skull was opened, the pia mater was so full of brains that they could "scarcely be kept from spilling." There is no allusion, however, in any documents of the time to the least trace of poison having been discovered.

There is another curious tract, in the British Museum, purporting, after the manner of Lucian, to be a conversation in the lower regions between James, the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquess of Hamilton, and Dr. Eglisham. The interview between the murderer and his victims is sufficiently tragical, and would do credit to any provincial theatre in the realm:—

"King James.—Dost thou know me, Buckingham? If our spirits or ghosts retain any knowledge of mortal actions, let us discourse together.

"Buckingham.—Honour hath not now transported me to forget your majesty; I know you to be the umbra or shade of my sovereign, King James, unto whom Buckingham was once so great a favourite. But what ghost of Aristotle is that which bears you company? His pale look show him to be some scholar.

"King James.—It is the changed shadow of George Eglisham, for ten years together my doctor of physic, who, in the discharge of his place, was ever to me most faithful; this other is his and my old friend, the Marquess of Hamilton.

"Buckingham.—My liege, I cannot discourse as long as they are present, they do behold me with such threatening looks; and your majesty hath a disturbed brow, as if you were offended with your servant, Buckingham.

"King James.—I, and the Marquess of Hamilton, have just cause to frown and be offended; hast thou not been our most ungrateful murderer?

"Buckingham.—Who—I my liege? What act of mine could make you to suspect that I could do a deed so full of horror? Produce a witness to my forehead, before you condemn me upon bare suspicion.

"King James.—My doctor, Eglisham, shall prove it to thy face, and if thou hast but any sense of goodness, shall make thy pale ghost blush, ungrateful Buckingham!"

Shortly after this Eglisham steps forward, and with all proper dignity accuses the duke, not only of having poisoned James and the marquess, but of having plotted and contrived the doctor's own departure from the world. Buckingham, staggered by the proofs which are brought against him, at length confesses his crimes, and spouts, as he sweeps from the stage, a sort of dramatic epilogue, of which the following lines are the conclusion:

"You, O good king, were gracious to that man, Whose ghost you see, the Duke of Buckingham.

But I was most ungrateful to my king,
And Marquess Hamilton, whom I did bring
Both to untimely deaths, forgive my sin.
Great king, great marquess, Doctor Eglisham,
All murdered by the Duke of Buckingham.
Forgive me all, and pardon me, I pray;
This being said, the duke's ghost shrunk away."

One of the articles of impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham, in the succeeding reign, was, not for having actually poisoned the king, but for having dared to administer remedies to the sovereign, without the concurrence of the physicians. To say the least, it was a strange and unjustifiable act. Charles, as is well known, to prevent the question of the duke's conduct from coming to an issue, braved the wrath of the commons, and dissolved the parliament. There was another attempt to stigmatise Buckingham as a wholesale poisoner. Eglisham asserts, in his petition to parliament, that at the time of the Duke of Richmond's death, a paper was found in King street, in which Buckingham had inserted the names of several noblemen, all of whom had since died. He adds that his own name came after the Marquess of Hamilton's with a proviso that he should be embalmed. This would be considered as mere nonsense, did it not appear by the evidence of Sir Henry Wotton that some such document really existed, though without doubt it was a forgery. "I had a commission laid upon me," says Sir Henry, "by sovereign command, to examine a lady about a certain filthy accusation, grounded upon nothing but a few names taken up by a footman in a kennel, and straight baptised. It was a list of such as the duke had appointed to be poisoned at home, himself being then in Spain. I found it to be the most malicious and frantic surmise, and the most contrary to his nature, that I think had ever been brewed from the beginning of the world." Wotton speaks of Eglisham as a "fugitive physician," and corroborates a statement made by Sanderson, on the authority of Sir Belthaser Gerbier, that when Eglisham offered to publish a recantation of his scandalous pamphlet, for a certain remuneration, the duke listened to the overture with indignation and disgust. That Buckingham's mother, who was under the influence of the Jesuits, should have been induced to tamper with the king, is not improbable; but that Buckingham himself should have entered into the conspiracy, notwithstanding his many faults, is in utter contradiction to all our preconceived notions of his character.

King James died on the 27th of March, 1625, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign over the kingdom of England. On the 7th of May he was buried at Westminster with proper solemnity. We will conclude our notices of him with Ben Jonson's admirable character of the weak monarch, in his Masque of the Gypsies Metamorphosed. One of the wandering tribe is supposed to discover the king's identity, by her professional knowledge of palmistry:—

"With you lucky bird, I begin,—let me see,
I aim at the best, and I trow you are he;
Here's some luck already, if I understand
The grounds of my art, here's a gentleman's hand.
I'll kiss it for luck's sake. You shall by this line,
Love a horse and a hound, but no part of a swine;*
To hunt the brave stag, not so much for your food,
As the weal of your body, and the health of your blood.

* The abhorrence which James entertained for a pig, has already been mentioned.

You're a man of good means, and have territories store,
Both by sea and by land; and were born, sir, to more;
Which you, like a lord, and the prince of your peace,
Content with your havings, despise to increase:
You live chaste and single, and have buried your wife,
And mean not to marry by the line of your life,
Whence he that conjectures your quality, learns You're an honest good man, and take care of your bairns.
Your Mercury's hilt, too, a wit doth betoken,
Some book-craft you have, and are pretty well spoken:
But stay, in your Jupiter's mount what is here!
A monarch! a king! what wenders appear!
High, bountiful, just; a Jove for your parts,
A master of men, and that reign in their hearts."

ANNE OF DENMARK,

QUEEN OF JAMES I.

A lady remarkable for all the masculine qualities in which her husband was so sadly deficient. Ambitious, bold, enterprising; fond of tumult and grandeur; impatient of control; engaging in all the civil and religious factions of the period; despising her timorous and pedantic husband, and yet vainly endeavouring to govern him and his councils, she failed in her objects from want of capacity, yet saved herself from obloquy by the deepest cunning. James, however subservient he may have been to his passions and his favourite—however deficient in moral and personal courage, was at least no dastard to his wife. With all her turbulence and high spirit, she never obtained the slightest influence over her easy spouse. No two people could be more unlike: the only similarity of character, was in a mutual admiration of masculine beauty.

Thwarted in her ambitious views, and piqued at being compelled to yield to a man whom she so thoroughly despised, her violence and hatred exceeded all bounds. She was in the habit, at Edinburgh, of forcing herself into the king's presence, for the mere purpose of ridiculing him, and diverting herself at his expense. His life is even said to have been in the utmost danger from her violence, while he remained in Scotland. The worst trait in her character was her endeavour to prejudice her children against their father. The contempt of his parent, with which she inspired Prince Henry, was probably, in a great degree, the origin of James's want of natural affection for his son.

After his accession to the throne of England James almost entirely separated himself from his ungovernable wife. Peyton says, that though he sometimes visited her through compliment, he never "lodged with her a night for many years." Notwithstanding, however, their nocturnal estrangement, James, in his Edict on Duels, continues speaking of her as our dearest bed-fellow. He was indeed ever anxious to impress his subjects with a notion of his uxoriousness. Osborne mentions an instance when he himself was present, on which occasion James, before proceeding on one of his hunting expeditions, took a sort of public farewell of his queen. "Taking leave of her at her coach-side, by kissing her sufficiently to the middle of her shoulders, for so low she went bare all the days I had the fortune to know her." Weldon says, that James was ever best when farthest from his queen.

Her manners, on her first arrival in Scotland, were any thing but suited to enliven her husband's court, or to conciliate the people among whom she came to reside. The writer of a letter among the Cecil Papers thus speaks of her at this period:—"Our queen carries a marvelous gravity, quhilk, wth her patriall solitariness, contrar to y^e humor of our pepell hath bannised all our ladys clein from her." The queen's manners afterwards improved. Lady Arabella Stuart in a letter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, dated from the Court at Woodstock, gives her the highest praise for courtesy, and remarks that she was in the habit of speaking kindly to the people whom she happened to meet in her way. This statement is corroborated by another letter from Sir Dudley Carleton to Sir Thomas Parry, in which the writer observes, "The queen lieth this night at Sir John Fortescue's, where the king meets her. She giveth great contentment to the world in her fashion and courteous behaviour to the people.

Of the merits of Queen Anne's personal appearance we know very little. The portraits we have seen of her were drawn at a late period of her life, and principally indicate a masculine character, and display a tawdry and tasteless style of dress. The beauty of queens is seldom left uncelebrated; and as historians are silent on the present occasion, there is reason to suppose that there was little room for panegyric. Peyton alone styles her, "A body of a goodly presence, beautiful eyes, and strong to be joined with a prince young and weak in constitution; a union unsuitable for a virago to couple with a spiny and thin creature." Osborne's praise is somewhat dubious:—"Her skin," he says, "was more amiable than the features it covered, though not her disposition, in which report rendered her very debonnaire." Bishop Goodman remarks that there was little in her person to make his majesty uxorious.

Anne was a bigoted catholic, a fact not generally dwelt upon by historians. It is strange, that Horace Walpole, a curious researcher, should have been long ignorant of this important circumstance. Speaking of the Bacon Papers, he says, there is "one most extraordinary passage, entirely overlooked, and yet of great consequence to explain the misfortunes into which her descendants afterwards fell. The Pope sends her beads and reliques, and thanks her for not communicating with heretics at her coronation." Sully, however, was not only acquainted with the fact, but evidently dreaded her influence, as regarded the predominancy of the Spanish interests and the advancement of the Roman Catholic religion. He says, that when following the king from Scotland, it was believed she was coming to England, in order to add her personal influence to the Spanish faction; a circumstance which so disturbed the king, that he sent the Earl of Lennox to oppose her progress, though he was unable to persuade her to return. The Spaniards, indeed, whose interests she adhered to, in opposition to those of France, appear to have rested their hopes of destroying the protestant faith in England, principally on her influence and exertions. She endeavoured to instil her prejudices, in favour of Spain and the pope, into the mind of her son, Prince Henry. Sully says, that none doubted but that she was inclined to declare herself "absolutely on that side;" and that in public she affected to have the prince entirely under her guidance. In a letter from Sir Charles Cornwallis to the Earl of Salisbury, she is even stated to have told the Spanish ambassador, that he might one day see the Prince of Wales on a pilgrimage to St. Jago.

Time and experience appear at length to have convinced her of the inflexibility of her husband's disposition, and of her own incapacity for meddling in state affairs. With the exception of some occasional interference, in the rise or downfall of a favourite, she seems to have contented herself with entertaining the king and his court with balls and masques. "The arrival of the queen in London," says Sully, "did not occasion all that disorder which had been apprehended; the discontented found her not to be what they had conceived. It seemed as though her sudden change of situation and country had made as sudden change in her inclinations and manners: from an effect in the elegances of England, or from those of the royal dignity, she became disposed to vanities and amusements, and seemed wholly engaged in the pursuit of pleasure. She so entirely neglected or forgot the Spanish politics, as gave reason to believe she had, in reality, only pretended to be attached to them."

King James had quitted Edinburgh for his new dominions on the fifth of April, 1603; and in June following, accompanied by her two eldest children, Prince Henry and the Princess Elizabeth, the queen prepared to follow him. James, either willing to gratify her taste for show, or desirous that his wife should appear among his new subjects with all due magnificence, not only gave the strictest orders for her honourable reception, but even commanded some of the late queen's jewels to be transmitted to her, before the former had been laid in the grave. On the fifteenth of April we find him writing to his ministers:—"Touching the jewels to be sent for our wife, our meaning is not to have any of the principal jewels of state to be sent so soon or so far off; but only such as, by the opinion of the ladies attendant about the late queen our sister, you shall find to be meet for the ordinary appareling and ornament of her; the rest may come after when she shall be nearer hand. But we have thought good to put you in mind, that it shall be convenient that besides jewels you send some of the ladies of all degrees who were about the queen, as soon as the funeral be past, or some others, whom you will think meetest and most willing and able to abide travel, to meet her as far as they can at her entry into the realm, or soon after; for that we hold needful for her honour: and that they do speedily enter into their journey, for that we would have her here with the soonest. And as for horses, litters, coaches, saddles, and other things of that nature, whereof we have heretofore written, for her use, and sent to you our cousin of Worcester, we have thought good to let you know that the proportion mentioned in your particular letter to us shall suffice in our opinion for her. And so you may take order for the sending of them away with the ladies that are to come, or before, as you shall think meetest." The queen arrived at York on the 11th of June; and having remained there some days, proceeded to East Neston, the seat of Sir George Farmer, where she was joined by the king.

For her splendid entertainments, those magnificent masques which made the "nights more costly than the days," she has been often and sufficiently celebrated. They appear, however, to have been conducted with but little attention to decorum. The Countess of Dorset mentions in her memoirs, that there was "much talk of a masque which the queen had at Winchester, and how all the ladies about the court had gotten such ill names, that it was grown a scandalous place; and the queen herself was much fallen from her former greatness and reputation she had in the world." Peyton's censure is far stronger:—"The masques," he says, "and plays at Whitehall were used only as incentives for lust, therefore the courtiers invited the citizens' wives to those shows on purpose to defile them. There is not a chamber nor lobby, if it could speak, but would verify this."

Whatever share the queen may have had, in effecting a kind understanding between the courtiers and the citizens' wives, it is certain that she herself was far from being averse to the tender passion. Carte tells us that she took a great delight in making the king jealous, and with this view, took liberties which were very improper, and were the cause of some excitement at court. It is to be feared, however, that Anne had less her husband's jealousy at heart than her own gratification. According to the chronicles or scandal of the time, she was far from being satisfied with the cold attentions and ungainly form of her pedantic spouse. The first person on whom the queen is reported to have fixed her affections was the brave, the beautiful, and unfortunate Earl of Murray. This is the "Bonnie Earl" of Scottish song; a name dear to those whose hearts have ever kindled with poetry, or sympathised with misfortune. A well-known ballad of the period concludes with an allusion to the queen's attachment:—

O the bonny Earl of Murray!
He was the queen's love.

The earl is also celebrated in the still popular ballad of Childe Waters.

James has been accused of having sacrificed the earl's life to his jealousy of the queen. This supposition we should be extremely inclined to doubt, had not our suspicions been already aroused by the circumstances attending the tragical fate of the Gowries. Murray was accused, whether wrongfully or justly is not known, of having abetted the Earl of Bothwell in his famous attack upon the king's person in Scotland; James, instead of making use of legitimate means to insure the apprehension of the suspected earl, commissioned the Earl of Huntley, Murray's hereditary and deadly enemy, to bring him into his presence. Murray was not exactly the man to submit tamely to be made the prisoner of his feudal foe. A shot from his castle killed one of Huntley's followers. The storming party became furious and succeeded in burning the fortress. Murray, finding further opposition hopeless, endeavoured to effect his escape by rushing through the flames: unfortunately, however, his long hair caught fire, which enabled his enemies to follow him in the darkness to the rocks by the sea-shore, among which he probably expected to find a hiding-place. He defended himself as long as he was able, but fell at last covered with wounds. One Gordon, of Buckie, who had been the first to strike him, insisted that Huntley should implicate himself in the odium, by joining in the bloody work, and stabbing his defenceless enemy before he died. Huntley consented, and stabbed Murray in the face. The dying earl fixed his eyes on his hereditary foe:—"You have spoiled," he said, "a better face than your own." Huntley had actually alighted from his horse to perform the dastardly act. Murray's friends refused to bury him till they had avenged his death.

Huntley, after the execrable deed, continued for some time in real or affected concealment.

During his flight he applied for refuge and hospitality at Lord Sinclair's castle of Ravenscraig. Lord Sinclair told him that he was welcome, but that he would have been much more welcome if he had passed on. However, notwithstanding this rough reception, Lord Sinclair entertained him kindly, and conducted him in safety to the Highlands. Huntley, shortly afterwards, returned to Edinburgh, where he escaped with a brief imprisonment.

A suspicion certainly rests upon James. In the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, are preserved the MS. annals of Sir James Balfour, Lyon King at Arms, who was living at the time, and who inserts among his papers the following curious annotation:—"The seventh of February this year, 1592, the Earl of Murray was cruelly murdered by the Earl of Huntley, at his house in Dnmbrissel, in Fifeshire; and with him Dunbar, sheriff of Murray. It was given out and publicly talked, that the Earl of Huntley was only the instrument of perpetrating this fate, to satisfy the king's jealousy of Murray, whom the queen, more rashly than wisely, some few days before, had commended in the king's hearing with too many epithets of a proper and gallant man."

The story is in some degree corroborated by Oldmixon. "I have it," he says, "from the best authority, that the king conceived a mortal hatred against the Earl of Murray for an expression of his wife Queen Anne, who, looking out at a window and seeing that lord entering the court, said he was the handsomest man she ever saw. 'What,' said the king, 'handsomer than I?' and swore he would have his life."

A supposition has long existed that the unfortunate John, Earl of Gowrie was a favoured lover of Queen Anne. There is, however, every reason to believe, that it was not the earl, but his younger brother, Alexander Ruthven, the sharer of his tragical fate, on whom the queen's affections were in reality fixed. More than one writer has endeavoured to trace the secret history of the Gowrie conspiracy from the existence of this romantic amour. They assert that the whole plot was a mere counterfeit, contrived by James himself, in order to revenge himself by the destruction of his rival. This supposition, though contrary to the king's well known character for timidity, is nevertheless consonant with his ideas and system of king-craft; and though it requires confirmation, is not altogether unsupported by correlative circumstances.

The following story, the authority for which appears to rest entirely on traditional report, was inserted in Cant's notes on "the Muse's Threnody," and is related by Pinkerton in his Essay on the Gowrie Conspiracy:—"The queen, it appears, in a moment of affection, had presented Alexander Ruthven with a riband, which some time before had been given to her by the king, and which Ruthven, in his gallantry, hung round his neck. One fine summer day, the young courtier, being in the royal garden at Falkland, threw himself under the shade of a tree, where he fell fast asleep. The weather being extremely sultry, had induced him to leave his neck and bosom uncovered. James, happening to pass by, paused for a moment to look at the sleeping Adonis, and perceived the fatal riband which he had so recently presented to his queen. He was exceedingly disconcerted, and instead of continuing his walk, returned to the palace. His movement, however, was observed by a young lady of the court (supposed to be Lady Beatrice Ruthven, the sleeper's sister,) who instantly tore the riband from her brother's neck, and rushing with it into the queen's presence, requested her majesty to place it in a drawer, observing hurriedly that the motive of her proceeding would shortly be discovered. As the young lady retired by one door, the king entered by another, and desired the queen, who was in the sixth month of her pregnancy with Charles the First, to produce the riband which he had lately given to her. Anne, without the slightest discomposure, drew it from the drawer in which she had just deposited it, and placed it in the king's hands. James examined it for some time, observing as he returned it, "Evil take me, if like be not an ill mark." That Alexander Ruthven, and not his brother Lord Gowrie, was the object of the queen's regard, is confirmed by a letter from Sir Henry Nevill, dated London 15th November, 1660:—"Out of Scotland," he writes, "we hear there is no good agreement between the King of Scots and his wife, and many are of opinion, that the discovery of some affection between her and the Earl of Gowrie's brother, (who was killed with him,) was the truest cause and motive of all that tragedy." Peyton, on the other hand, in his Divine Catastrophe of the House of Stuart, while he accuses James of the guilt of Gowrie's murder, asserts that it was the earl himself who was the queen's paramour.—"After Huntley's death," he says, "the queen found others to satisfy her unruly appetite; as namely, the Earl of Gowrie, a lord of a comely visage, good stature, and of an attracting allurements; who, upon King James's suspicion of often society with the queen, converted to the poison of hatred the friendship and love of the earl; causing Ramsay, after Earl of Holderness, with others, to murder Gowrie in his own house; giving it out for a state, that the earl, with others, would have killed him; and to make his falsehood appear odious in shape of truth, appointed the fifth of August a solemn day of thanksgiving for his supposed delivery; and in this mocked the God of heaven." There is little doubt, however, that Peyton is wrong in his identity.

This writer is remarkably free in his allusions to the queen's gallantry. He mentions one Beely, a Dane, (who had accompanied Anne from her own country,) as having been particularly distinguished by her favours. This modest individual had the assurance to inform Peyton, "in great secrecie," that he was the undoubted father of King Charles. Peyton's evidence is suspicious, whenever, as is the case in this last incident, it happens to be unsupported by the testimony of others. He mentions as the queen's last favourites, two brothers of the name of Buchanan, to whom she equally distributed her smiles. The catastrophe of this fraternal intrigue is somewhat startling. Peyton says that they fell out for her love, fought a duel, and killed one another.

If the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in his interesting life of himself, had afforded fewer instances of personal vanity, we should have imagined that the queen had entertained a feeling, somewhat warmer than friendship, for that handsome and gallant philosopher. Lord Herbert, after mentioning that Richard, Earl of Dorset, had paid him the compliment of secretly obtaining a copy of his picture, from the hands of one Larking, who had painted the original, thus evidently alludes to her majesty's predilection:—"But a greater person," he says, "than I will here nominate, got another copy from Larking; and placing it afterwards in her cabinet, gave occasion to those who saw it after her death, of more discourse than I could have wished." In another place he adds:—"And now in court a great person sent for me divers times to attend her, which summons though I obeyed, yet God knoweth I declined coming to her as much as conveniently I could without incurring her displeasure." Her mother remonstrated with her on the impropriety of her conduct, through the medium of her brother Ulric Duke of Holstein. The interference, however, appears to have excited her anger, without in the least reforming her morals.

In the latter period of her life, the queen seems voluntarily to have resigned the vanities of the world, and to have exchanged the frivolities of Somerset House and Whitehall, for the peaceful seclusion of Hampton Court and Greenwich.—Queen Anne died at Hampton Court on the first of March, 1619, shortly after taking a last farewell of her favourite son Prince Charles. Sanderson says, "A lingering sickness and fulness of humours brought her to a dropsy, and for her recovery, she some years before frequented the Bath, with continual physic." Camden places her age at forty-five, which would make her only fifteen at the time of her marriage. On the fifth of the same month, we are informed that her entrails were placed in a sexangular box or case, and interred by her servants in Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster. On the ninth, her body was conveyed at night to Somerset House, formerly the temporary resting-place for the remains of the great, between the chamber of death and their last home. Within less than three weeks after her decease, we find the king enjoying himself at a horse-race at Newmarket. The queen was finally interred at Westminster on the 13th of May, 1619.

Such is the importance which the vulgar attach to rank, that a remarkable constellation, which appeared in the heavens shortly before her death, was considered as prophetic of that event; as if nature would trouble herself with unusual phenomena at the mere demise of a silly and lascivious woman. Rushworth says,—"The common people, who were great admirers of princes, were of opinion that the blazing star rather betokened the death of the queen, than that cruel and bloody war which shortly after happened in Bohemia, and other parts of Germany." Howel also says, in one of his amusing letters,—"Queen Anne is lately dead of a dropsy, which is held to be one of the fatal events that followed the last fearful comet. She left a world of brave jewels behind; but one Piero, an outlandish man, who had the keeping of them, embezzled many, and is run away. She left all she had to Prince Charles, whom she ever loved best of all her children; nor do I hear of any legacy she left at all to her daughter in Germany."

Peyton details some loathsome particulars respecting the illness which preceded her death. He informs us, that Dr. Upton, who had married his near kinswoman, and who appears to have attended the queen professionally in her last illness, assured him on his death-bed, that her majesty was enccinte; and that her dissolution was caused by the remedies which she had taken, in order to procure destruction to her unborn infant. The doctor, moreover, expressed his conviction to Peyton, in his last extremity, that his own mortal sickness had been unfairly brought about, in consequence of his having been the depository of this important secret. The queen, by other authorities, is stated to have died of the dropsy; a disease which, from its external character, might alone be supposed to have given rise to the scandal above alluded to, had not Peyton stated his authority, and detailed the circumstances with so much colour of truth.

Such are the particulars which we have been enabled to collect, respecting a lady to whom our principal historians have attached but little importance. Rapin says nothing of her character, and Hume dismisses her with remarkable brevity, as a "woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues." Eschard, on the contrary, who probably adopted the panegyric of Arthur Wilson, speaks of her in the highest terms: "She died," he says, "to the deep concern of all good men and loyal subjects, leaving behind her the name of a peaceable and dutiful wife, and a virtuous and pious queen." Little doubt, however, can exist, that this dutiful wife and pious queen, was a bigoted papist and a turbulent virago. It is sufficient, that the same writer speaks of James as "a very melancholy widower," when we find the easy monarch publicly enjoying himself at a horse-race, not many days after the breath had departed from the body of his queen.

One word may fairly be said in favour of Anne of Denmark. She had the taste and the feeling to be a kind friend and sincere admirer of the great Sir Walter Raleigh. The following letter, praying the Duke of Buckingham to intercede for Sir Walter's life, is preserved in the British Museum; and besides its internal interest, exhibits what slight influence the queen must have possessed over her husband:

ANNA R.,

My kind Dog,*

If I have any power or credit with you, I pray you let me have a trial of it at this time, in dealing sincerely and earnestly with the king, that Sir Walter Raleigh's life may not be called in question. If ye do it so that the success answer my expectation, assure yourself that I will take it extraordinary kindly at your hands, and rest one that wisheth you well, and desires you to continue still, as you have been a true servant to your master.

To the Marquiss of Buckingham.

A few of the queen's letters to her husband, from the originals in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, have recently been published. They commonly commence, "My heart," and are generally brief, playful, and commonplace.

Having said so much that is adverse to the queen's character, it may be right to mention (which we shall do as briefly as possible) the words of those writers who have endeavoured to rescue her name from obloquy. Sir Anthony Weldon styles her a "very brave queen, who never crossed her husband's designs; nor intermeddled with state affairs." Harris says, that though she died without much lamentation from the king, "she was not unbeloved by the people." The praise which Arthur Wilson bestows on her is still higher:—"She was in her great condition a good woman, not tempted from that

* With this familiar phrase Anne usually commences her correspondence with Buckingham. The following letter is curious from the still more familiar manner in which she speaks of her husband.

My kind Dog,

I have received your letter, which is very welcome to me. You do very well in lugging the sow's ear, and I thank you for it, and would have you do so still upon condition that you continue a watchful dog to him, and be always true to him. So wishing you all happiness, height she stood on to embroil her spirit much with things below her (as some busy-bodies do), only giving herself content in her own house with such recreations as might not make time tedious to her. And, though great persons' actions are often pried into, and made envy's mark, yet nothing could be fixed upon her that left any great impression, but that she may have engraven upon her monument a character for virtue." These writers, however, because they hated and abused the king, appear to have thought it incumbent on them to eulogise his queen. Sir Henry Wotton, who might have been expected to have said more, in his panegyric of King Charles, contents himself with calling her "a lady of a great and masculine mind." If these encomiums, however, be considered as merely applicable to Anne, during the period she was queen of England, it is not so easy to controvert them. In a negative point of view, she was neither factious to her husband, nor did she embroil herself with politics; but it was for the excellent reason that she was excluded from all access to the one, and all interference with the other. That she was tolerably popular, is not to be wondered at. The public had no reason to lay their grievances to her charge: of her restless passions and disappointed ambition they knew nothing: to her inferiors, her manners appear latterly to have been courteous and conciliating; besides, her entertainments were frequent and splendid, and, with the vulgar, magnificence is the surest precursor of popularity.

The queen's principal residence was at Somerset House, at that period called Denmark House, in honour of the country which gave her birth. Her children were Henry, Prince of Wales; Robert, Margaret, and Sophia, who died young; Charles, who succeeded to the throne, and Elizabeth, married to the Elector Palatine. Sophia was born at Greenwich, 22d June, 1606, and survived her birth but three days. She was buried near the tomb of Queen Elizabeth, in Henry the VII.'s chapel. Mary was also born at Greenwich. Fuller tells us that no one ever remembered the ceremony of baptism to have been celebrated with so much pomp. James used to say, with more humour than reverence, that he did not pray to the Virgin Mary, but for the virgin Mary. This princess also died in her infancy, and was buried at Westminster.

HENRY PRINCE OF WALES.

The darling of his contemporaries; the Marcellus of his age; justly beloved and regretted as one of those princes who have been remarkable for the precocity of their talents and their untimely ends. With a taste for all that adds grace to society, or dignity to human nature; with every quality that might have been expected to form both a great and a good king; uniting a love of literature and science with a chivalrous thirst for military reputation (that graceful combination which formed the brilliant characters of such men as Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Sir Kenelm Digby, and the Admirable Crichton); mingling a Christian temper with a Roman virtue; with all the pleasant characteristics, and none of the irregularities of youth; it is not to be wondered that the historian lingers fondly over the page which records the brief but beautiful career of Henry Prince of Wales.

Prince Henry, the eldest son of James the

First and Anne of Denmark, was born at Stirling on the 19th of February, 1594. Lord Zouch was deputed by Queen Elizabeth to congratulate the happy parents on the birth of their heir. A brief account of a royal christening, in the sixteenth century, especially as an archbishop has condescended to detail it, may not be uninteresting. On the day appointed for the ceremony, the infant was brought from its own apartment to the queen's presence chamber, in which a state bed was prepared for its reception. As soon as the foreign ambassadors were arrived, the Countess of Mar, with the assistance of other ladies, took the prince from his bed, and delivered him to the Duke of Lennox, by whom he was formally presented to the ambassadors. The procession then marched to the chapel in the following order, and it is not a little amusing to observe the way in which the rude and warlike Scottish nobles were employed on the occasion:—first went Lord Hume, carrying the ducal crown of Rothsay; then Lord Livingston, bearing the "towel or napkin," Lord Seaton carrying the basin, and Lord Semple the "Laver." Next followed the English ambassador, the Earl of Sussex, who, as having the place of honour awarded to him, bore the royal baby in his arms. The prince's train was supported by Lords Sinclair and Urquhart, and above him was a canopy sustained by four Scottish gentlemen of distinction. On the arrival of the procession at the door of the chapel, the king rose from his seat and received the ambassadors at the entrance of the choir: the infant was then presented to the Duke of Lennox, who delivered him over to the nurse. The ambassadors having been ceremoniously conducted to the seats which had been prepared for them, "every chair having a tassel board covered with fine velvet," the service was performed by Cunningham, Bishop of Aberdeen. As soon as the ceremony was concluded, the procession returned in the same order to the royal apartments, and the prince was again laid upon his bed of state. The Lyon herald then proclaimed his titles as follow:—Henry Frederick, Knight and Baron of Renfrew, Lord of the Isles, Earl of Carrick, Duke of Rothsay, Prince and Steward of Scotland. Gold and silver were thrown out of the window among the populace, and at night there was a splendid banquet, at which many knights were created. Plays and tilting were not wanting, and the rejoicings lasted for some days.

Henry, at his birth, had been committed to the charge of the Earl of Mar, in whose family was vested the hereditary guardianship of the king's children. The Countess of Mar, who had formerly been the king's nurse, was installed in the same capacity to his son. Whatever may have been James's motives in depriving the queen of the care of her child, it is certain that she was far from submitting tamely to the loss. She not only attempted every legitimate means to regain possession of the prince, but endeavoured to tamper with the chancellor and others of the council, in order to effect her object. The dispute excited much ill feeling between the royal parents, and raised the king's anger to the highest pitch. He accordingly wrote the following letter to the Earl of Mar, by which he established him still more firmly in his office of guardian. It sufficiently exhibits the king's irritation, and his total independence of his wife:—

"My Lord of Marre,

"Because in the surety of my son consisteth

my surety, and I have concredited unto you the charge of his keeping, upon the trust I have of your honesty, this I command you out of my own mouth, being in the company of those I like, otherwise for any charge or necessity that can come from me, you shall not deliver him; and in case God call me at any time, see that neither for the queen, nor estates their pleasure, you deliver him till he be eighteen years of age, and that he command you himself.

"Striveling, 24th of July, 1595."

The prince's extraordinary character was early displayed. As a child, he was never seen to weep, and appeared indifferent to pain. On an occasion of his receiving a severe fall from another boy, we are told that he neither "whined nor wept." When little more than five years of age, a son of the Earl of Mar, somewhat younger than himself, fell out with one of the royal pages and "did him wrong." The prince instantly reproved his playfellow. "I love you," he said, "because you are my lord's son and my cousin; but, if you be not better conditioned, I will love such an one better,"—naming the child whom the culprit had misused.

His tutor was Adam Newton, a good scholar and a strict disciplinarian, exactly the sort of person James was likely to select. Probably Newton was not sparing in his chastisements. On one occasion, when the prince was about to strike the ball, while playing at goff, a stander-by exclaimed, "Beware, sir, that you do not hit Mr. Newton." The prince desisted from the stroke, at the same time observing, with a smile, "If I had done so, I had but paid my debts." Another story is related by Mr. D'Israeli, in the Curiosities of Literature, descriptive of the relative position of the prince and the tutor: we must allow him to tell it in his own agreeable manner. "Desirous of cherishing the generous spirit and playful humour of Henry, his tutor encouraged a freedom of jesting with him, which appears to have been carried at times to a degree of momentary irritability on the side of the tutor, by the keen humour of the boy. When Newton, playing at shuffleboard with the prince, blamed him for changing so often, and, taking up a piece, threw it on the board and missed his aim, the prince smilingly exclaimed, 'Well thrown, Master;' on which the tutor, a little vexed, said, 'He would not strive with a prince at shuffleboard.' Henry answered, 'Yet you gownsmen should be best at such exercises which are not meet for men who are more stirring.' The tutor, a little irritated, said, 'I am meet for whipping of boys.' 'You vaunt, then,' retorted the prince, 'that which a ploughman or cart-driver can do better than you.' 'I can do more,' said the tutor, 'for I can govern foolish children.' On which the prince, who, in his respect for his tutor, did not care to carry the jest further, rose from table, and in a low voice to those near him, said, 'He had needs be a wise man who could do that.'"

In order to stimulate him in his studies, the king one day hinted, that if he did not take more pains, his younger brother Charles would outstrip him in learning. Newton some time afterwards reminding the prince of his father's remark, Henry asked him if he really thought his brother would prove the superior scholar. The tutor answering, that he had considerable fears on the subject,—“Well, then,” said the prince, with ready wit, “I will make Charles archbishop of Canterbury.”

On the 2d of July, 1603, when only nine years old, he was invested, at a solemn feast of St. George, at Windsor, with the Order of the Garter. His companions in this honour were the Duke of Lennox, and the Earls of Southampton, Mar, and Pembroke. Even at this early age, his "quick, witty answers, princely carriage, and reverend obeisance at the altar," are said to have been the admiration of the bystanders.

On the 4th of June, 1610, he was created Prince of Wales, the king having previously knighted him, without which honour, it seems, he was incapable of sitting at dinner with the sovereign.

His military taste was early displayed. When asked what musical instrument he most delighted in, his answer was, "a trumpet." The French ambassador coming one day to take leave of him, inquired if he could deliver any message from him to the king his master? "Tell him," said the young prince, "the manner in which you see me employed:"—he was amusing himself with practising with the pike.

As early as the year 1606, Henry the Fourth of France appears to have had an insight into, and to have regarded with anxiety, the extraordinary character of his young namesake. The French ambassador, Antoine le Fevre de la Boderie, had directions to treat him with particular respect—a remarkable compliment to a boy of twelve years old. The ambassador writes in a letter to France, "He is a prince who promises very much, and whose friendship cannot but be one day of advantage." Henry had sent the Dauphin a present of some dogs; the ambassador recommends in return, that the latter should send over "a suit of armour well gilt and enamelled, together with pistols and a sword of the same kind;" and, he says, "if he add to these a couple of horses, one of which goes well, and the other a barb, it will be a singular favour done to the prince."

Henry, young as he was, seems to have entertained a project of retrieving the national credit, by the recovery of Calais from the French. When in 1607, the Prince de Joinville returned to France, Henry sent over an engineer in his train, who had secret orders to examine all the fortifications of that town, and especially those of Rix-bane. He lost no opportunity of cultivating the acquaintance of the most celebrated officers in Europe, and especially those of Upper and Lower Germany. It was also his custom to walk considerable distances on foot, in order that he might enure himself to long and harassing marches.

In naval affairs he took almost an equal interest: it appears, indeed, to have been principally at his instigation, that, in the year 1612, two ships, the Resolution and Discovery, were sent out, with a view to the discovery of a north-west passage to China: the expedition, however, was not the first of its kind. This taste of the prince enables us to relate an instance of his strong sense of justice and powers of appreciating talent.

His love of the sea had made him acquainted with the famous Phineas Pett, so celebrated for his genius in naval architecture. Pett was at one time on the point of being crushed by the envy and rival interests of other competitors in his line. There persons so far attained their object as to bring Pett to an examination, at which the king presided in person, when charges were preferred against him of professional incompetency, and of having made use of inferior materials in the construction of his ships. During this investigation, of which Pett has himself given an account, (which will be found in the Archæologia,) he was compelled to remain the whole time on his knees, and, in this dispiriting posture, to combat the frivolous charges which were brought against him. "I was, at length," he says, "almost disheartened and out of breath, but the prince's highness, standing near me, from time to time encouraged me as far as he might without offence to his father, labouring to have me eased by standing up, but the king would not permit it." When the king, at length decided in Pett's favour, Henry cried out enthusiastically, "Where are those perjured fellows that dare abuse the king's majesty with their false accusations? Do not they worthily deserve hanging!" James, alluding to the nature of one of the charges, wittily observed, "that the cross-grain appeared to be in the men and not in the timber." Pett shortly after this was employed to build a ship of war, which was called "the Prince," after Henry. The prince, to show his regard for Pett, and his respect for his talents, carried his fascinating sister, afterwards the queen of Bohemia, to visit the ingenious shipwright at his humble residence; an honour which appears completely to have gained the hearts of the worthy Pett and his wife.

His amusements were generally of a martial character, but his great delight was in tennis. The pursuits of the English Marcellus are thus described by Mons. de Boderie, in a letter to France, dated 31st October, 1606. "He is a particular lover of horses, and what belongs to them, but is not fond of hunting; and when he goes to it, it is rather for the pleasure of galloping than that which the dogs give him. He plays willingly enough at tennis, and at another Scot's diversion very like mall; but this always with persons older than himself, as if he despised those of his own age. He studies two hours a day, and employs the rest of his time in tossing the pike, or leaping, or shooting with the bow, or throwing the bar, or vaulting, or some other exercise of that kind, and he is never idle. He shows himself likewise very good-natured to his dependants, and supports their interests against any persons whatever, and pushes what he undertakes for them or others with such a zeal as gives success to it. For, besides his exerting his whole strength to compass what he desires, he is already feared by those who have the management of affairs, and especially the Earl of Salisbury, who appears to be greatly apprehensive of the prince's ascendancy; as the prince on the other hand, shows little esteem for his lordship."—Henry excelled in dancing, but seldom practised it unless strongly pressed.

His tact was remarkable even when very young. A certain patriotic Welshman, asserting in the king's presence that he could produce 40,000 men in the principality, who were ready to sacrifice their lives for the prince, against any king in Christendom, James with some jealousy inquired, "To do what?" Henry instantly averted the alarm by answering playfully, "To cut off the heads of 40,000 leeks." The instances of his wit are not few. A musician having delighted the company with some music which he had composed at the moment, was requested to play it over again. "I could not," said the performer, "for the kingdom of Spain; for this were harder than for a preacher to repeat word by word a sermon that he had not learned by rote." A clergyman standing by, expressed his opinion that this need not be impossible. "Perhaps not," replied Henry, "for a bishopric." When a mere child, he happened to be entertained in a nobleman's house in the country, in which parody and bad fare were the order of the day.—His attendants were loud in their complaints, of which the prince took no notice at the time. The lady of the mansion, however, happening the next morning to pay him a visit of respect, discovered him amusing himself with a volume containing prints, to one of which he was paying particular attention. It was descriptive of a company seated at a banquet: "Madam," said the young prince, "I invite you to a feast." "To what feast?" she inquired. "To this feast," replied Henry. "What," said the lady, "would your highness only invite me to a painted feast?" "No better, madam," said the prince, looking significantly into her face, "is to be found in this house."

He had the greatest esteem for Sir Walter Raleigh; and once observed, alluding to the latter's long imprisonment in the tower, that "no king but his father would keep such a bird in such a cage." He had a fine taste for the arts, and made a magnificent collection of books, medals, statues, coins, &c.; Evelyn says his cabinet was superior to any at home, and to the generality abroad: it was lost to the royal family in the civil wars. He knew how to distinguish genius, and courted the society of the learned. Archbishop Williams, shortly after taking orders, happened to preach before the court at Royston. "He acquitted himself so well," says Ambrose Philips, "that his majesty was pleased to speak much in his commendation; and the prince, not content to let him go off with hungry praise, looking upon him as an honour to Wales, assured him that he would not be unmindful of his great merits. But he dying untimely, the father bestowed that preferment on him which the son intended."

He held his court at St. James's Palace, which was set apart for his residence. Here he frequently entertained the young and the brilliant of both sexes, and kept about his person a number of young gentlemen whose spirit and tastes assimilated with his own. A great proof of his popularity is the manner in which his court was attended. Possessing but little or no political influence, and having but few opportunities of rewarding his friends, his court was nevertheless far more frequented than that of the king himself. So jealous was James of this circumstance, that he once made use of the remarkable words, "Will he bury me alive?" Though pleasure was not excluded, his establishment was governed with discretion, modesty, and sobriety, and with an especial reverence for religious duties. It may here be observed that, in 1610, his household amounted to four hundred and twenty-six persons, of whom two hundred and ninety-seven were in the receipt of regular salaries.

We are informed by his faithful follower, Sir Charles Cornwallis, that though the most beautiful women of the court and city were invited to his entertainments, yet that he could never discover the slightest inclination on the prince's part to any particular beauty. He admits, however, the existence of reports that the prince's heart had not been always unsusceptible. There seems reason indeed to believe that Henry was the unsuccessful rival of Somerset, for the affections of the lovely and profligate Lady Essex. It is stated in the Aulicus Coquinarie as a "notorious truth," that he made love to the Countess of Essex, "before any other lady living." Arthur Wilson tells us that, thinking to please the prince, one of the courtiers presented him with Lady Essex's glove, which he had accidentally picked up. The prince instantly rejected it, observing disdainfully that he "scorned it, since it had been stretched by another." Certainly the young prince bore Somerset any thing but good will. On one occasion he is said to have either struck, or offered to strike, him with his racket. Essex, however, had been the playfellow of Henry, which might, in some degree account for the prince's enmity towards a man who had so deeply injured his friend by debauching his wife. Still there is a doubt hanging over the prince's purity in this affair: Sir Symonds D'Ewes states, that the Earl of Northampton, Lady Essex's uncle, incited her to win the prince's affections, and that he was the first upon whom she bestowed her favours.

There was an intention to marry Prince Henry to the Infanta Major, or eldest daughter of the King of Spain. Sir Charles (afterwards Lord) Cornwallis, was sent to Madrid to negotiate on the subject; but he met with so little encouragement that the project fell to the ground. His MS. account of the treaty, related in a letter to Lord Digby, is preserved in the Harleian collection. The match appears to have been far from agreeable to the prince, who had the greatest repugnance to allying himself with a papist.

The prince's affection, indeed for the Church of England, was only equaled by his aversion to the Church of Rome; a fact the more remarkable, since his mother had early sought to tamper with his religious principles, and used every means to reconcile him to the Romish persuasion. Bishop Burnet says, he was so zealous a protestant, that, after the failure of the Spanish match, when James was desirous of marrying him to a popish princess, (either the archduchess, or a daughter of Savoy,) he wrote a letter to the king, praying him, if it was intended thus to dispose of him, that he might be married to the youngest princess of the two, for he should then have more hopes of her conversion: he requested also that whatever liberties might be allowed her in the exercise of her faith, they should be conducted in the most private manner possible. The original of this letter was shown to the bishop by Sir William Cook, and was dated less than a month previous to the death of the prince. His affection for protestantism was regarded as of such importance, that the Puritans looked upon him as their future saviour, and even discovered his prototype in the Apocalypse; a construction, from whence they argued that he was to become the avenger of protestantism, and the destroyer of the Romish church. According to Harrington, the following indifferent distich was extremely popular at the time—

Henry the Eighth pulled down the abbeyes and cells,
But Henry the Ninth shall pull down bishops and bells.

So deep a feeling of religion in one so young, and so attached to the stirring interests of life, is indeed remarkable. He was strict in his attendance at divine worship, and was accustomed to retire three times a day to his private devotions.

Sir Charles Cornwallis says, that had the prince lived, it was his intention to select one of the most learned and experienced of his chaplains, whose advice he proposed to follow in all matters of conscience.

He had the greatest horror of an oath. Osborne says he never swore himself, nor retained those about him who did. At each of his residences, St. James's, Richmond, and Nonsuch, a box was kept, in which were deposited the fines collected from those members of his household who were heard to swear; the proceeds of which were distributed among the poor. Coke informs us, that his father used to relate several stories respecting the young prince. He was once out hunting, when the stag, harassed by the chase, happened to cross a road while a butcher and his dog were passing. The dog killed the stag, but the carcass was too heavy for the butcher to carry off, as he wished to do. The huntsmen coming up endeavoured to incense the prince against the man. Henry, however, merely observed that it was not the butcher's fault but the dog's. "If your father had been here," they said, "he would have sworn so, that no man could have endured it." "Away," retorted Henry, "all the pleasure in the world is not worth an oath."

He hated flattery and dissimulation, vanity and ostentation, and regarded with contempt the ephemeral sycophants of his father's court. He was extremely temperate and abstemious, except in the "article of fruit," in which, according to Birch he liked to indulge. His temper is stated by his biographers, to have been almost always mild and even. It appears, however, to have been more than once ruffled in the excitement of his favourite game of tennis.

An instance of the prince falling out with Somerset at this pastime has already been alluded to: Codrington, in his life of Robert Earl of Essex, the prince's early companion, mentions another occasion of his warmth of temper, under similar circumstances. Henry and the young earl were amusing themselves in the tennis-court, when a dispute took place on some point in the game: Essex persisting on his rights, the prince at last grew so angry as to call the earl the son of a traitor, alluding to the catastrophe of his father, the spoiled victim of Elizabeth. Essex, growing furious in his turn, struck the prince on the head with his racket so severely as to draw blood. The king sent for the earl; but, on being acquainted with the real circumstances of the affair, dismissed him unpunished. James told the prince, that the boy who had just struck him would not hereafter be remiss in striking his enemies. Essex afterwards grew to be the famous parliamentary general.

The prince's rapid progress in his studies, his military genius, and extreme popularity with all ranks of people, excited a painful feeling of jealousy in the mind of his father. So deep indeed was the prejudice, that it appears to have destroyed all natural affection for his offspring. Burnet says, the prince was rather feared than loved by his father. Once, on the downs at Newmarket, when James and his son had bidden one another farewell, in order to retire to their respective homes, it was remarkable that all the principal persons followed the prince, leaving the king almost entirely to be escorted by servants. Arceus, the court-fool, with an ill-timed joke, pointed out the circumstance to his master; at which the king is said to have been so much affected as to shed tears. Arceus, however, for his officiousness, was, for some time afterwards, tossed in a blanket wherever he could be met with: by which party the punishment was inflicted does not appear, but in all probability by the prince's. The king, observes Osborne, was much annoyed to find that all the worth which he had imagined to belong to himself, was wholly lost in the hopes which the people entertained of his son.

The prince's person is minutely described by Sir Charles Cornwallis: "He was of a comely, tall, middle stature, about five feet and eight inches high, of a strong, straight, well-made body, with somewhat broad shoulders, and a small waist, of an amiable, majestic countenance, his hair of an auburn colour, long faced, and broad forehead, a piercing grave eye, a most gracious smile, with a terrible frown." His face was supposed to bear a resemblance to that of Henry the Fifth. Ben Jonson took advantage of the flattering compliment which this circumstance enabled him to pay to the prince, on the occasion of a pageant presented before the king on his progress through London in 1603. The prophet Merlin, after recounting the heroic deeds of his kingly ancestors, thus alludes to the prince's resemblance to the hero of Agincourt.

Yet rests the other thunderbolt of war,
Harry the Fifth, to whom in face you are
So like, as Fate would have you so in worth.

Prince Henry's career was destined to be as brief as it was brilliant. He died on the 6th of November, 1612, after a long illness, which he bore with exemplary piety and resignation. He had frequently expressed his indifference about death, and regarded length of days as an unenviable boon: "It was to small purpose," he said, "for a brave gallant man, when the prime of his days were over, to live till he were full of diseases." In the Aulicus Coquinariae, there is an interesting account of the progress of his last illness;—"In the nineteenth year of his age, appeared the first symptoms of change, from a full round face and pleasant disposition, to be paler and sharper, more sad and retired; often complaining of a giddy heaviness in his forehead, which was somewhat eased by bleeding at the nose; and that suddenly stopping, was the first of his distemper, and brought him to extraordinary qualms, which his physicians recovered with strong waters."

"About this time, several ambassadors extraordinary being despatched home, he retired to his house at Richmond, pleasantly seated by the Thames river, which invited him to learn to swim in the evenings after a full supper, the first immediate pernicious cause of stopping that gentle flux of blood, which thereby putrefying, might engender that fatal fever that accompanied him to his grave. His active body used violent exercises; for at this time being to meet the king at Bever in Nottinghamshire, he rode it in two days, near a hundred miles, in the extremity of heat in summer; for he set out early, and came to Sir Oliver Cromwell's, near Huntingdon, by ten o'clock before noon, near sixty miles, and the next day betimes to Bever, forty miles."

"There, and at other places, in all that progress, he accustomed himself to feasting, hunting, and other sports of balloon and tennis, with too much violence."

"And now returned to Richmond in the fall of the leaf, he complained afresh of his pain in the head, with increase of a meagre complexion, inclining to feverish; and then for the rareness thereof called the new disease; which increasing, the 10th of October he took his chamber, and took counsel with his physician, Dr. Hammond, an honest and worthy learned man. Then removes to London to St. James's, contrary to all advice; and (with a spirit above indisposition) gives leave to his physician to go to his own home."

"And so allows himself too much liberty in accompanying the Palsgrave, and Count Henry of Nassau (who was come hither upon fame to see him), in a great match at tennis in his shirt, that winter season, his looks then presaging sickness. And on Sunday, the 25th of October, he heard a sermon, the text in Job, 'Man that is born of a woman, is of short continuance, and is full of trouble.' After that he presently went to Whitehall, and heard another sermon before the king, and after dinner, being ill, craves leave to retire to his own court, where instantly he fell into sudden sickness, faintings, and after that a shaking, with great heat and headache, that left him not whilst he had life."

The Archbishop of Canterbury and Dr. Melborn, Dean of Rochester, constantly attended at his bedside, and prayed with him during his illness. Cornwallis says, that "he bore his sickness with patience, and as often recognition of his faith, his hopes, and his appeals to God's mercy, as his infirmity, which afflicted him altogether in his head, would possibly permit." He died at St. James's at the age of eighteen years, eight months, and seventeen days. His body, having been embalmed, was interred in Westminster Abbey.

His death had been foretold by Bruce, an eminent astrologer of the period, who, however, at the instigation of the Earl of Salisbury, was banished for his discrimination. Before quitting England, the astrologer sent to Salisbury, assuring him that his words would prove but too true, though the earl himself would not live to see it. His prediction turned out correct. The prince died in November, six months after Salisbury's dissolution. To falsify this story, it has been argued that Bruce retired voluntarily abroad; and also, (supposing the prediction to have been really made), that it required no great prophetic powers to calculate that the earl's shattered frame would in all probability yield to the prince's youth, and apparently vigorous constitution.

The untimely deaths of promising young princes are frequently attributed to unfair means, and Prince Henry's among the number, is said to have been occasioned by poison. Certainly the suspicion was more than whispered at the time. One of his chaplains actually preached a sermon at St. James's (which was afterwards printed), wherein he alluded so openly and feelingly to the manner in which the prince was cut off, as to melt his congregation into tears, and to procure his own dismissal from court. Arthur Wilson says, there were strange rumours at the time, some attributing the prince's decease to poisoned grapes, and others to a pair of gloves which had been similarly tampered with. When Henry was dying, Sir Walter Raleigh sent him a cordial from the Tower, which he said would infallibly cure him unless his malady was the effect of poison. The prince took the cordial, but not recovering, the queen is said to have laid so much stress on Sir Walter's proviso, as to have believed to the last that her son had met with foul play. It has been suspected that John Holles, Earl of Clare, comptroller of the prince's household, was the depositary of some important secret, relative to the death of his young master. His sudden emancipation from a prison to a peerage appears to have given rise to this notion, besides the undue importance which was attached to some lines written in the earl's pocket-book, beginning—

Actæon once Diana naked spied
All unawares, yet by his dogs he died.

Supposing, however, that the argument in favour of Henry's being poisoned is at all tenable, the individual on whom we should naturally be inclined to fix the guilt is undoubtedly Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, afterwards a convicted murderer in the case of Overbury, a man openly held in contempt and dislike by the prince, and whose utter ruin was sure to follow, in the event of Henry's succession to the throne: besides these circumstances there existed the well-known rivalry for the affections of Lady Essex. Burnet says: "Colonel Titus assured me that he had from King Charles the First's own mouth, that he was well assured Prince Henry was poisoned by the Earl of Somerset's means." Lord Chief Justice Coke hinted openly in court, that Overbury was made away with to prevent a discovery of Somerset's share in the prince's death; an imprudence which lost Coke the king's favour, and eventually his place.* Wilson and other writers also allude to the dark suspicions which were entertained of Somerset's guilt.

There has existed another horrible surmise, that the son's life was cut short by the jealousy of the father. Hume says,—"the bold and criminal malignity of men's tongues and pens spared not even the king on the occasion." Arthur Wilson openly hints his suspicious, though, with affected and ingenious delicacy, he talks of them as a subject for his fears, and not for his pen. Rapin very properly remarks, in noticing this unnatural aspersion, that the proofs should be "as clear as the sun," before they are accepted as evidence.

With reference to the general question as to the manner of the prince's death, it is right to add, that the physicians who attended him during his illness, and who examined his body after his decease, gave it as their unanimous opinion that he was not poisoned; and Sir Charles Cornwallis expresses his opinion that the rumours to a contrary effect were without foundation. Bishop Goodman, in his Memoirs, has an interesting passage on the subject:—"That Prince Henry," he says, "died not without vehement suspicion of poison, this I can say in my own knowledge. The king's custom was to make an end of his hunting at his house in Havering, in Essex, either at the beginning or in the middle of September. Prince Henry did then accompany him. I was beneficed in the next parish, at Stapleford Abbots. Many of our brethren, the neighbour ministers, came to hear the sermon before the king, and some of us did say, looking upon Prince Henry, and finding that his countenance was not so cheerful as it was wont to be, but had heavy darkish looks, with a kind of mixture of melancholy and choler,—some of us did then say, that certainly he had some great distemper in his body, which we thought might proceed from eating of raw fruit, peaches, musk-melons, &c. A while after we heard that he was sick, his physicians about him, none of his servants forbidden to come to him; he spake to them when he knew he was past hopes of life; he had no suspicion himself of poison; he blamed no man; he made a comfortable end, and when he was opened, as I heard, there were found in his stomach some remnants of grapes which were not digested. The surgeons and physicians found no sign or likelihood of poison." The physicians, in support of their opinion, drew up on paper the result of their post-mortem examination, in which they minutely described the appearance of the prince's body. It has, however, justly been remarked, that though this medical detail gives no reason to believe that poison was administered, yet that it affords no direct proof to the contrary.

* Kennett, vol. ii. p. 669, note. Lord Dartmouth, in a note on the anecdote of Bishop Burnet above quoted, makes the following remark. "If he was poisoned by the Earl of Somerset, it was not upon the account of religion, but for making love to the Countess of Essex; and that was what the lord chief justice meant, when he said at Somerset's trial, 'God knows what went with the good Prince Henry, but I have heard something.'"—Burnet, vol. i. p. 19.

What probably threw so painful a suspicion upon the king, was the command he gave, that the Christmas festivities should proceed as usual: moreover, he issued an indecent order that no mourning should be worn for his deceased son. It has been attempted to disprove this fact, by asserting that, at the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, which shortly followed, both the king and his daughter were dressed in black. We do not know what may have been the king's costume on the occasion, but Sir James Finett, a nice observer, and master of the ceremonies to the court, distinctly says, that the princess was "apparelled in white," and, moreover, alludes to the splendid jewels that were worn by the king himself. A similar order had been issued by James at the demise of Queen Elizabeth. Sully, the French ambassador to England, informs us that, after having been at the expense of providing mourning habits for his suite, he was compelled to change their apparel, in order that he might not mortally offend James,—and yet his mission was principally that of condolence.

We may conclude the memoirs of this extraordinary young prince with the character drawn of him by his treasurer, and affectionate follower, Sir Charles Cornwallis:—"He was courteous, loving, and affable; his favour, like the sun, indifferently seeming to shine upon all; naturally shame-faced and modest, most patient, which he showed both in life and death. Quick he was to conceive any thing; not rash, but mature in deliberation, and constant having resolved. True of his promise, most secret even from his youth, so that he might have been trusted in any thing

* Dr. Lingard, in his estimate of Prince Henry's character, is certainly unfair, and, I believe, incorrect. "The young prince, faithful to the lessons which he had formerly received from the mother, openly ridiculed the foibles of his father, and boasted of the conduct which he would pursue, when he should succeed to the throne. In the dreams of his fancy he was already another Henry V., and the conqueror of his hereditary kingdom of France. To those who were discontented with the father, the abilities and virtues of the son became the theme of the most hyperbolic praise; the zealots looked on him as the destined reformer of the English church; some could even point out the passage in the Apocalypse which reserved for him the glorious task of expelling Antichrist from the papal chair. With the several matches prepared for him by his father, it were idle to detain the reader; his marriage, as well as his temporal and spiritual conquests, was anticipated by an untimely death, which some writers have attributed to poison, some to debauchery, and others, with greater probability, to his own turbulence and obstinacy. In the pursuit of amusement he disregarded all advice. He was accustomed to bathe for a long time together after supper; to expose himself to the most stormy weather, and to take violent exercise during the greatest heats of summer," &c. The vein of sarcasm which runs through this passage, and the impression it was intended to leave, are too apparent to require any comment. In the present instance, however, the idolised champion of protestantism could scarcely expect to be a favourite.

that did not force a discovery, being of a close disposition, not too easy to be known, or pried into; of a fearless, noble, heroic, and undaunted courage, thinking nothing impossible that ever was done by any. He was ardent in his love to religion. He made conscience of an oath, and was never heard to take God's name in vain. He hated popery, though he was not unkind to the persons of papists. He lived and died mightily, striving to do somewhat of every thing, and to excel in the most excellent. He greatly delighted in all rare inventions and arts, and in all kinds of engines belonging to the wars, both by sea and land. In the bravery and number of great horses; in shooting and levelling of great pieces of ordnance; in the ordering and marshalling of arms; in building and gardening, and in all sorts of rare music, chiefly the trumpet and drum; in limning and painting, carving, and in all sorts of excellent and rare pictures which he had brought unto him from all countries."

A contemporary versifier thus celebrates the loss of Prince Henry.

Lo, where he shineth yonder
A fixed star in Heaven,
Whose motion here came under None of the Planets seven.
If that the Moon should tender
The Sun her love, and marry,
They both could not engender
So sweet a star as Harry.

It has been argued, from the prince's martial tastes and ardour for military fame, that to whatever height he might have raised the glory of his country, it was unlikely he would have added to its happiness. Surely, however, there was an innate rectitude of purpose, by which in after years, the irregularities of the head would have been made subservient to the qualities of the heart.

ELIZABETH QUEEN OF BOHEMIA.

The queen of Bohemia appears to have merited all the encomium, the admiration, and the romantic interest, with which her contemporaries regarded her. Few women, indeed, have been gifted in a greater degree with all that is considered most lovely in the female character. Lively in her manners, affectionate in her disposition, and beautiful in her person; throwing a charm and a refinement over the social intercourse of life; she yet possessed, with all these qualities, a strength of mind which never became masculine; talents which were never obtrusive, and a warmth of heart which remained with her to the end. Forced from the lap of luxury and the splendours of a court, to become a wanderer, and almost a beggar, on the earth, though bowed down by the blasts of misfortune, she bent meekly and submissively to the storm. In prosperity modest and unassuming; in adversity surmounting difficulties and dignifying poverty, her character was regarded with enthusiasm in her own time, and has won for her the admiration of posterity.

Elizabeth, the only surviving daughter of James the First and his queen, was born at the palace of Falkland, in Scotland, on the 19th of August, 1596. Till her seventh year she had been successively under the care of Lord Livingston and the Countess of Kildare. In 1603 she was transferred to the charge of John the first Lord Harrington, and his lady, two of the most amiable and respectable characters at the court of James. With the incidents of her childhood we are little acquainted; there seems, however, to have existed the strongest attachment between her and her amiable brother Prince Henry; and, indeed, their tastes and characters were not very dissimilar. When removed from his society to be placed under Lord Harrington's roof, the little princess sent to her brother the following brief but eloquent epistle:—

My dear and worthy Brother,

I most kindly salute you, desiring to hear of your health; from whom, though I am now far away, none shall ever be nearer in affection than your most loving sister,
ELIZABETH.

There is extant another charming letter, addressed by the young princess to her brother, which it is impossible not to insert.

Worthy Prince and my dearest Brother,

I received your most welcome letter and kind token by Mr. Hopkins, highly esteeming them as delightful memorials of your brotherly love. In which, assuredly (whatever else may fail), I will ever endeavour to equal you, esteeming that time happiest when I enjoyed your company, and desiring nothing more than the fruition of it again; that as nature hath made us nearest in our love together, so accident might not separate us from living together. Neither do I account it the least part of my present comfort, that though I am deprived of your happy presence, yet I can make these lines deliver this true message, that I will ever be during my life your most kind and loving sister,
ELIZABETH.

To my most dear brother the prince.

Among the original letters to King James from his family, preserved in the advocate's Library in Edinburgh, are several in French, Italian, and English, from the princess to her father. James seems to have taken a considerable pleasure in receiving these juvenile compositions from his children; and it was probably owing to her knowledge of this taste that we find several letters from the princess's own children, after she had become Queen of Bohemia, preserved in this collection, and affectionately addressed to their royal grandsire. One childish epistle from her son, Frederick Henry, is amusing enough to record:

Sr,

I kiss your hand. I would fain see yo^r Ma^{ty}. I can say nominativus [hic, hæc, hoc, and all five declensions, and a part of pronomen, and a part of verbum. I have two horses alive, that can go up my stairs, a black horse and a chesnut. I pray God to bless your Ma^{ty}.

Yo^r Ma^{ty}'s obedient Grandchild,

To the king.

FREDERICK HENRY.

On the 16th of October, 1612, arrived in England, for the purpose of seeking the princess in marriage, Frederick the Fifth, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria and Silesia, and Elector, Cup-bearer, and High Steward of the empire; a man of a handsome, though melancholy countenance, and weak, good-natured, and penurious in his character; as unworthy of such a wife as James was of such a daughter.

Queen Anne, probably on account of the palatine's being a protestant, was extremely averse to the match, and endeavoured, by ridiculing him and his pretensions, to laugh her daughter out of the partiality which she had conceived. Coke says, "she used contemptuously to style the princess—'Goodwife Palsgrave.'—'I would rather,' retorted the princess, 'be the palsgrave's wife, than the greatest papist queen in Christendom.'"

Frederick was affianced to his future bride, on the 27th of December, 1612, in the banqueting-house at Whitehall, and in the presence of the king, seated in state, and of the assembled court. The palsgrave was first led in, attended by Prince Charles and several of the nobility, and clad in a black velvet cloak adorned with gold lace. Then followed the princess, in a black velvet gown, "semé of crosslets, or quaterfoiles, silver; and a small white feather in her head, attended with ladies." Shortly after entered the king, who being seated under the canopy of state, the palsgrave and the princess stepped forward, and stood together on a rich Turkey carpet which had been prepared for the purpose. Sir Thomas Lake then read formally in French, from the book of common prayer,—'I, Frederick, take thee Elizabeth to my wedded wife,' &c.; which was repeated verbatim by the palsgrave. The same form having been gone through by the princess, the Archbishop of Canterbury pronounced the benediction:—"The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, bless these espousals, and thy servants," &c. It is a remarkable circumstance that this marriage was asked by the publication of the bans in the chapel royal.

The palsgrave, at this period, appears to have distinguished himself by a liberality for which he was afterwards far from being celebrated. Mr. Chamberlain writes to Sir Ralph Winwood, 9th January, 1612:—"The prince palatine, (for so he is now styled, and since this contract is usually prayed for in the church among the king's children) was very royal in his presents this new-year's-tide, giving to the Lord and Lady Harrington in golden and gilt plate to the value of 2000*l.*; to their servants 400*l.*; to all the women about the Lady Elizabeth, 100*l.* apiece, and a medalia with his picture; to her waiters as much, and to her chief gentleman usher a chain of 150*l.*; to Mrs. Dudley a chain of pearls and diamonds of 500*l.*; to the prince a rapier and pair of spurs set with diamonds; to the king a bottle of one entire agate, containing two quarts, esteemed a very rare and rich jewel; to the queen a very fair cup of agate and a jewel; and lastly, to his mistress, a rich chain of diamonds, two very rich pendant diamonds for her ears; and above all, two pearls, for bigness, fashion, and beauty, esteemed the fairest that are to be found in Christendom; inasmuch that the jewels bestowed only on her are valued by men of skill above 35,000*l.* He was purposed to show the like bounty to the king and queen's servants and officers, but the king directly forbade it. The queen is noted to have given no great grace nor favour to this match; and there is doubt will do less hereafter, for that upon these things Schomberg that is chief about him) is said to have given out that his master is a better man than the King of Denmark; and that he is to take place of him in the empire, at leastwise of a greater king than he, the king of Bohemia. The marriage is set down for Shrove-Sunday, against which time, it is said, the lords and ladies about the court have appointed a mask upon their own charge: but I hear there is order given for 1500*l.* to provide one upon the king's cost, and 1000*l.* for fireworks."

The marriage ceremony was finally performed in the banqueting-house at Whitehall on the 14th of February, 1713, and appears to have been

when he began the world, his heart was new and peculiarly susceptible to each impression. Thus constituted, a person will not go far without meeting Love on his road; and Young soon discovered it in the charming smile and piquant grace of Anna Bowley, to whom he offered a timid homage, which was accepted without hesitation. The society in which his fair one moved, necessarily became the centre of his universe, and the ladies that composed it possessed in him a most devoted and assiduous cavalier.

One fine summer evening he escorted them to the river-side, not then so thickly built upon as now. It was the middle of summer, and the hour was that delightful one when the wings of the breeze bring coolness with them to refresh all nature, which was languid and exhausted by the heat of one of those oppressive days which ever and anon give us a taste of the fervid hours of a torrid clime. Bustle and activity prevailed around; the river was instinct with life and motion, and a thousand boats, gallantly equipped and manned, furrowed its broad bosom; a thousand confused sounds floated in the air; and the John Bull of the olden time seemed to be in the full enjoyment of his proverbial merriment—that picturesque John Bull of the second quarter of the eighteenth century, in cocked hat and laced cravat, embroidered and bright-coloured coat, knee-breeches, and high-quartered shoes.

Young enjoyed the scene with a poet's eye, and found ample materials for the indulgence of his satirical turn, when one of the ladies proposed that they should all go to Vauxhall, as it was a public night. The proposition was received with acclamation, and a wherry was soon freighted with the joyous company. By way of amusing his fair friends, Young drew from his pocket a flute, on which he excelled, and his notes were so perfect, that a crowd of boats soon gathered around; among others, was one filled with young officers, which pulled hastily up, and took a station alongside that of the musician. As Young only played for the gratification of his company and himself, he did not choose to be made a public spectacle; so he soon ceased, and returned the flute into its case. One of the officers took offence at this; and, thinking that his game was sure with a young man in a clergyman's dress, and whose aspect was anything but martial, he ordered the player to produce his flute and begin anew. Young shrugged his shoulders at this piece of impertinence, but took no further notice of it; it was followed by threats and curses, which had no greater effect upon the person against whom they were directed. The officer, who was very angry that his orders were disobeyed, and his menaces despised, directed his rowers to close with the boat of the refractory musician, and swore that he would fling him into the Thames, unless he immediately began playing. The alarm of the ladies was intense, and seeing that the soldier was about putting his threat into execution, they entreated Young to yield to the exigency; but the indignant flutist still resisted.

"Edward!" exclaimed a soft voice at his side; "will you do nothing to oblige me?"

"Do you wish me, Anna, to submit to the degrading insolence of such a brute?"

"Yes, I do; I beg it, if you have any regard for me."

Young drew out his flute without another word, and played several gay airs, whilst the triumphant soldier beat time with ostentation, applauded vehemently, and looked round as if to impress upon the auditors the idea of his irresistible importance.

The company soon after reached Vauxhall, where the parties separated. But although Young's exterior was calm, he felt a deep resentment for the insult to which he had been subjected in his mistress's presence. Her accents had soothed his wrath, but it could not extinguish the desire of vengeance, and of making his oppressor ridiculous in his turn; so he determined not to lose sight of the aggressor, and to take the first opportunity, when he was alone, of speaking to him. An occasion soon offered, when he coolly addressed him—

"Sir," said he, "you have got an awkward habit of speaking too loudly."

"Ah!" rejoined the other, "that's because I make a point of being obeyed at the first word."

"But that depends upon your hearers; and I have a different opinion."

"Have you? and yet it seems that just now——"

"O, but you must know why I submitted to your rudeness."

"Well, what is your wish now sir?"

"To give you to understand that if I produced my flute, it was not to gratify you, but solely to oblige the ladies under my escort, and who were frightened at your long sword and loud oaths; but they are not here now; so——"

"You know this is a challenge, and your cloth——"

"Why should it? You have affronted me, and owe me satisfaction."

The soldier smiled disdainfully as he said—"As you please, sir; you shall be satisfied. When and in what place shall it be?"

"To-morrow, at daybreak, in Battersea fields, without seconds, as the affair only concerns you and me, and my profession compels me to have some regard to the proprieties of society."

"Be it so; what are your arms?"

"The sword," replied the juvenile member of the church militant. The conditions being thus arranged, the young men joined their respective parties.

On the following morning they were both punctual to their appointment. The officer had drawn his rapier, when Young produced a large horse pistol from beneath his cloak, and took a steady aim at his antagonist.

"What do you mean?" asked the astonished soldier; "have you brought weapons to assassinate me?"

"Perhaps; but that will depend upon yourself. Last night I played on the flute; this morning it is your turn to dance."

"I would die first; you have taken an unworthy advantage of this stratagem."

"As you did yesterday of the ladies' presence; but come, captain, you must begin your minuet."

"I shall do nothing of the kind, sir; your conduct is most ungentlemanly."

"No strong language here, captain; dance at once, or I will fire."

These words, which were uttered with much earnestness, and accompanied with a corresponding gesture, produced the effect desired. The officer, finding himself in a retired place, and at the mercy of a man whom he had grievously offended, and who seemed determined to exact reparation after his own fashion, did as he was desired, and stepped through the figure of a minuet, while Young whistled a slow and appropriate measure.

When it was finished, Young said—"Sir, you have danced remarkably well; much better, in its way, than my flute-playing. We are now even; so, if you wish, we will begin another dance, in which I will be your vis-à-vis." Saying which, he drew his sword.

But the dancer very justly thought he had received a proper lesson, and more favourably appreciating the man he had so wantonly insulted, thought it would be better to have him for a friend than an enemy. He therefore held out his hand to Young, who shook it cordially; and in perfect harmony, and arm-in-arm, they quitted the spot which might have been fatal to one of them, but had, fortunately, only served to give and take a lesson in dancing. THE HA' BIBLE.

Chief of the Household Gods

Which hallow Scotland's lowly cottage homes!

While looking on thy signs

That speak, though dumb, deep thought upon me comes—

With glad yet solemn dreams my heart is stirr'd,
Like childhood's, when it hears the carol of a bird!

The mountains old and hoar—

The chainless winds—the streams so pure and free—

The God-enamell'd flowers—

The waving forest—the eternal sea—

The eagle floating o'er the mountain's brow—

Are teachers all; but O! they are not such as thou!

O! I could worship thee!

Thou art a gift a God of love might give;

For love and hope and joy

In thy Almighty-written pages live!

The slave who reads shall never crouch again;

For, mind-inspired by thee, he bursts his feeble chain!

God unto thee I kneel,

And thank thee! Thou unto my native land—

Yea to the outspread Earth—

Hast stretch'd in love thy everlasting hand,

And thou hast given earth, and sea, and air—

Yea all that heart can ask of good and pure and fair!

And, Father, thou hast spread

Before men's eyes this charter of the free,

That all thy book might read,

And justice, love, and truth and liberty,

The gift was unto men—the giver God!

Thou slave! it stamps thee man—go spurn thy weary load!

Thou doubly precious book!

Unto thy light what doth not Scotland owe?

Thou teachest age to die,

And youth in truth unsullied up to grow!

In lowly homes a comforter art thou—

A sunbeam sent from God—an everlasting bow!

O'er thy broad and ample page

How many dim and aged eyes have pored?

How many hearts o'er thee

In silence deep and holy have adored?

How many mothers, by their infants' bed,

Thy holy, blessed, pure, child-loving words have read!

And o'er thee soft young hands

Have oft in trothful plighted love been join'd,

And thou to wedded hearts

Hast been a bond—an altar of the mind!

Above all kingly power or kingly law!—

May Scotland reverence aye—the Bible of the Ha'!

REVIEW OF BOOKS.

Beleké's German, and Sophocles's Greek Grammar.—On our table are grammars in three languages, French, German, and Greek, respectfully soliciting the public notice. As far as the two last are concerned, we are sure of doing the public a service by complying with the request.

It is a question whether the confusion of tongues at Babel may not have been—instead of a malediction—a kind dispensation of Providence, having the intent of multiplying human advantages and pleasures—opening new sources of mental cultivation, colloquial enjoyment, profit and reputation to makers and teachers of grammars, and, moreover, the improvement of public spirit and social affections. It is wonderful how saucy and patriotic men grow upon this subject of languages. Many a one will fight for his mother tongue as valiantly as for his natural mother. Father Bouhours, a Jesuit, and one of the French oracles in criticism, in a dialogue between two gentlemen of literary taste, discourses as follows about the French; deriding the Spanish for its pomp, the Italian for its finical effeminacy:—"The French," he says, (see Hallam, vol. iv. 290,) "has the secret of uniting brevity with clearness, and with purity and politeness. The Greek and Latin are obscure where they are concise; the Spanish is always diffuse. The Spanish is a turbid torrent, often overspreading the country with great noise. The Italian, a gentle rivulet, occasionally given to inundate its meadows; the French, a noble river, enriching the adjacent lands, but with an equal majestic course of waters that never quits its level. Spanish, again, he compares to an insolent beauty, that holds her head high, and takes pleasure in splendid dress; Italian, to a painted coquette, always attired to please; French, to a modest and agreeable lady, who, if you may call her a prude, has nothing uncivil or repulsive in her prudery. Latin is the common mother; but while Italian has the sort of likeness to the Latin, which an ape bears to a man, in French we have the dignity, politeness, purity, and good sense of the Augustan age. If we would speak the French well, he says, we should not try to speak it too well. It detests excess of ornament; it would almost desire that words should be, as it were, naked; their dress must not be more than necessity and decency require. Our pronunciation, he affirms, is the most natural and pleasing of any; the Chinese, and other Asiatics, sing; the Germans rattle (rallent); the Spaniards spout; the Italians sigh; the English whistle; the French alone can properly be said to speak; which arises, in fact, from our not accenting any syllable before the penultimate. The French language is best suited to express the tenderest sentiments of the heart; for which reason our songs are so impassioned and pathetic, while those of Italy and Spain are full of nonsense. Other languages may address the imagination, but ours alone speaks to the heart, which never understands what is said in them." These are pretty generally the French opinions of their own and the language of other nations. Nothing, unless the partridge and whip-poor-will speaks English in Paris. This is the Pere Bouhours, who institutes a serious enquiry in one of his chapters, under the following title: Un Allemand, peut-il avoir de l'esprit?

Mr. Beleké, who has been for several years Professor in Mount St. Mary's College, claims, notwithstanding Father Bouhours, a very high rank for his vernacular German. This language, which till lately, was studied only to communicate with our Pennsylvania Dutch, is becoming a branch of polite education, and a grammar so recommended by all our best judges, as that of Mr. Beleké, must prove an acceptable offering to the public. We had long a foolish prejudice against this language, having heard it only on a hipsy-saw, or at the tail of a Lancaster wagon, and more frequently upon the lips of a Dutch frau, an acquaintance, hen-pecking her husband. We have seen him often subjected to this infliction for an hour together, and do not recollect that any softening vowel came ever to the relief of this worse than Russian cacophony—in her fiercer notes, more guttural than a gobling turkey, and in softer humours, argute and stridulous as the katy-did. But the same tune is not the same on different instruments—not the same quirring on the strings of Paganini, and ground upon the cat-gut of the hurdy-gurdy. We now hear German, daily, upon the tongue of a dark-browed maid of Vienna, and without knowing a word of its meanings, subscribe implicitly to the native sweetness of the German—we sing the palinodia, and hang out a white flag to Mr. Beleké.

A Greek Grammar by Sophocles—by Mr. Sophocles. (Πάσαι.) How that old Sophocles, of the buskins, would have stared at Μιστρε Σοφοκλεις—Mr. Sophocles, however, is a real live Greek, and has written one of the best Greek grammars extant, by the testimony of the North American Review, and of Dr. Woolsey, Professor of Greek in Yale College—of which, with all due respect we now cordially subjoin our confirmation.

THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE RUSTIC.—Anthony Collins, who has generally been considered a Freethinker, one day met a plain countryman going to church. "Where are you going?" said the philosopher. "To church, sir." "What to do there?" "To worship God, sir." "Pray is your God great or little?" "He is both, sir." "How can that be?" "He is so great that the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, and he is so little that he can dwell in my heart." Collins afterwards declared, that this simple observation of the countryman had more effect upon his mind than all the volumes he had perused, written by the learned doctors.

A resident on the banks of the Tees having lost his wife, a neighbour dropped in to condole with him, and, to his surprise, found him hard at work emptying a bowl of broth, little less capacious than a washhand basin. "Oh, Tommy Tommy!" exclaimed the comforter, "is this all thou cares for thy poor wife that's dead and gone?" Tommy dropped his spoon, and, looking up with tears in his eyes and broth on his beard, replied, "Ralph, Ralph! aw've been cryin' all t' marnin', and when aw've supped my broth aw'll be cryin' agyan—what maar would thou hev?"

AN AMOROUS PUN.—"Who is that lovely girl?" exclaimed the waggish Lord Norbury, riding in company with his long-eared friend, Counsellor Granarty. "Miss Glass," replied the knavish barrister. "Glass?" reiterated the facetious judge;—"by the love which man bears to woman, I should often become intoxicated could I place such a glass to my lips?" The counsellor fell from his horse in a fit of apoplexy, and did not completely recover till he had been thrice bled in the right arm.

THE BIBLE.

"The English translation of the Bible had been several times revised, or remade since the first edition by Tyndal & Coverdale. It finally assumed the present form under James I. Forty-seven persons, in six companies, meeting at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge, distributed the labour among them; twenty-five being assigned to the Old Testament, fifteen to the New, seven to the Apocrypha. The rules imposed for their guidance by the king, were designed, as far as possible, to secure the text against any novel interpretation; the translation called the Bishop's Bible being established as the basis, as those still older had been in that; and the work of each person or company being subjected to the review of the rest. The translation, which was commenced in 1607, was published in 1611.

"The style of this translation is in general so enthusiastically praised, that no one is permitted either to qualify or even explain the grounds of his approbation. It is held to be the perfection of our English language. I shall not dispute this proposition; but one remark as to matter of fact cannot reasonably be censured, that in consequence of the principle of adherence to the original versions, which had been kept up ever since the time of Henry VIII. it is not the language of James I. It may, in the eyes of many, be a better English, but it is not the English of Daniel, or Raleigh, or Bacon, as any one may easily perceive. It abounds, in fact, especially in the Old Testament, with obsolete phraseology, and with single words long since abandoned, or retained only in provincial use. On the more important question, whether this translation is entirely, or with very trifling exceptions, conformable to the original text, it seems unfit to enter. It is one which is seldom discussed with all the temper and freedom from oblique views which the subject demands, and upon which, for this reason, it is not safe for those, who have not had leisure or means to examine it for themselves, to take upon trust the testimony of the learned. A translation of the Old Testament was published at Douay, in 1609, for the use of the English Catholics.

"The style of preaching before the reformation had been often little else than buffoonery, and seldom respectable. The German sermons of Tauler, in the fourteenth century, are alone remembered. For the most part, indeed, the clergy wrote in Latin what they delivered to the multitude in the mother tongue. A better tone began with Luther. His language was sometimes rude and low, but persuasive, artless, powerful. He gave many useful precepts, as well as examples, for pulpit eloquence. Melancthon, and several others, both in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as well in the Lutheran as the reformed church, endeavoured, by systematic treatises to guide the composition of sermons. The former, however, could not withstand the formal, tasteless, and polemical spirit that overspread their theology. In the latter, a superior tone is perceived. The sermons of Donne have sometimes been praised in later times. They are undoubtedly the productions of a very ingenious and very learned man; and two folio volumes, by such a person, may be suspected to supply favourable specimens. In their general character they will not appear, I think, much worthy of being rescued from oblivion."

JEREMY TAYLOR.

"The sermons of Jeremy Taylor are of much higher reputation; far, indeed, above any that had preceded them in the English church. An imagination essentially poetical, and sparing none of the decorations which, by critical rules, are deemed almost peculiar to verse; a warm tone of piety, sweetness, and charity; an accumulation of circumstantial accessories whenever he reasons, or persuades, or describes; an erudition pouring itself forth in quotation, till his sermons become, in some places, almost a garland of flowers from all other writers, and especially from those of classical antiquity, never before so redundantly scattered from the pulpit, distinguish Taylor from his contemporaries by their degree, as they do from most of his successors by their kind. His sermons on the Marriage Ring, on the House of Feasting, on the Apples of Sodom, may be named, without disparagement to others which, perhaps, ought to stand in equal place. But they are not without considerable faults, some of which have just been hinted. The eloquence of Taylor is great, but it is not eloquence of the highest class; it is far too Asiatic, too much in the style of Chrysostom and other declaimers of the fourth century; by the study of whom he had probably vitiated his taste; his learning is ill placed, and his arguments often as much so; not to mention that he has the common defect of alledging nugatory proofs; his vehemence loses its effect by the circuitry of his pleonastic language; his sentences are of endless length, and hence, not altogether unmusical, but not always reducible to grammar. But he is still the greatest ornament to the English pulpit up to the middle of the seventeenth century; and we have no reason to believe, or rather much reason to disbelieve, that he had any competitor in other languages.

"The devotional writings of Taylor, several of which belong to the first part of the century, are by no means of less celebrity or less value than his sermons. Such are the Life of Christ, the Holy Living and Dying, and the collection of meditations, called the Golden Grove. A writer as distinguished, in works of practical piety, was Hall. His Art of Divine Meditation, his Contemplations, and, indeed, many of his writings, remind us frequently of Taylor. Both had equally pious and devotional tempers; both were full of learning, both fertile of illustration; both may be said to have imagination and poetical genius, though Taylor let his predominate a little more. Taylor is also a little more subtle and argumentative; his copiousness has more variety. Hall keeps more closely to his subject, dilates upon it more tediously, but more appositely. In his Summons there is some excess of quotation and far-fetched illustration, but less than in those of Taylor. These two great divines resemble each other, on the whole, so much, that we might, for a short time, not discover which we were reading. I do not know that any third writer comes close to either. The Contemplations of Hall are among his most celebrated works. They are prolix, and without much of that vivacity or striking novelty we meet with in the devotional writings of his contemporary, but are perhaps more practical, and generally edifying."—Hallam.

LINES ON LEAVING EDINBURGH.

BY L. H. SISOURNEY.

The tinge is on thy brow, sweet land,
The tinge is on thy brow;
For Autumn rends away the crown
That summer gave but now.
I journey to a greener clime,
Where England's oaks appear;
Yet, oh! the tear is on my cheek,
For thee, Edina dear.
There may perchance be richer realms,
Where pride and splendour roll;
But thou hast aye the wealth of heart
That wins the stranger's soul.
There may perchance be those who say
That Scotia's hills are dear;
Yet still the tear is on my cheek,
For thee, Edina dear.
And when, my pilgrim wanderings o'er,
I seek my forest land;
And, by my ingleside once more,
Shall clasp the kindred hand,—
And tell my listening children tales
Of lands of foreign fame,
Their grateful tears with mine shall flow
At dear Edina's name.

FERGUSON.

In the "Scottish Journal," a paper published weekly in New York, by J. G. Cumming, there have appeared lately some "Recollections of Ferguson." Poor Ferguson! doomed to struggle against adverse circumstances, yet has left a name dear to his countrymen. We annex the last number of these recollections. To the emigrants from Scotland we with pleasure recommend the Journal, as a work which will afford them much gratification at a small price.

O Ferguson! thy glorious pars!
Ill suited law's dry, musty arts!
My curse upon your whunstone hearts!
Ye Embrugh gentry!

BURNS.

I visited Edinburgh, for the first time, in the latter part of the autumn of 1773, about two months after I had sailed from Boston. It was on a fine calm morning—one of those clear sunshiny mornings of October, when the gossamer goes sailing about in long cottony threads, so light and fleecy, that they seem the skeleton remains of extinct cloudlets; and when the distant hills, with their covering of gray frost rime, seem, through the clear cold atmosphere, as if chiseled in marble. The sun was rising over the town through a deep blood-coloured haze—the smoke of a thousand fires; and the huge fantastic piles of masonry that stretched along the ridge, looked dim and spectral through the cloud, like the ghosts of an army of giants. I felt half a foot taller as I strode on towards the town. It was Edinburgh I was approaching—the scene of so many proud associations to a lover of Scotland; and I was going to meet, as an early friend, one of the first of Scottish poets. I entered the town. There was a book stall in one corner of the street; and I turned aside for half a minute to glance my eye over the books.

"Ferguson's Poems!" I exclaimed, taking up a little volume. "I was not aware they appeared in a separate form. How do you sell this?"

"Just like a' the ither booksellers," said the man who kept the stall—"that's nane o' the buiks that come down in a hurry:—just for the marked selling price." I threw down the money.

"Could you tell me any thing of the writer?" I said. "I have a letter for him from America."

"Oh, that'll be frae his brither Henry, I'll wad; a clever chield, too, but owre fond o' the drap drink, maybe, like Rob himsel. Baith o' them fine humane chields though, without a grain o' pride. Rob takes a stan' wi' me sometimes o' half an hour at a time, an' we clatter owre the buiks; an', if I'm no mista'en, yon's him just yonder—the thin pale slip o' a lad wi' the broad brow. Ay, an' he's just comin' this way."

"Anything new to-day, Thomas?" said the young man, coming up to the stall. "I want a cheap second-hand copy of Ramsay's 'Evergreen'; and like a good man as you are, you must just try and find it for me."

Though considerably altered, for he was taller and thinner than when at college, and his complexion had assumed a deep sallow hue—I recognised him at once, and presented him with the letter.

"Ah! from brother Henry," he said, breaking it open, and glancing his eye over the contents. "What!—old college chum, Mr. Lindsay!" he exclaimed, turning to me. "Yes, sure enough; how happy I am we should have met! Come this way—let us get out of the streets."

We passed hurriedly through the Canongate, and along the front of Holyrood-house, and were soon in the King's Park, which seemed, this morning, as if left to ourselves.

"Dear me, and this is you yourself!—and we have again met, Mr. Lindsay!" said Ferguson—"I thought we were never to meet more. Nothing, for a long time, has made me half so glad. And so you have been a sailor for the last four years. Do let us sit down here in the warm sunshine, beside St. Anthony's Well, and tell me all your story, and how you happened to meet with brother Henry."

We sat down, and I briefly related, at his bidding, all that had befallen me since we had parted at St. Andrew's, and how I was still a common sailor, but, in the main, perhaps, not less happy than many who commanded a fleet.

"Ah, you have been a fortunate fellow," he said; "you have seen much and enjoyed much; and I have been rusting in unhappiness at home. Would that I had gone to sea along with you!"

"Nay, now, that won't do," I replied. "But you are merely taking Bacon's method of blunting the edge of envy. You have scarcely yet attained the years of mature manhood, and yet your name has gone abroad over the whole length and breadth of the land, and over many other lands besides. I have cried over your poems three thousand miles away, and felt all the prouder of my country for the sake of my friend. And yet you would fain persuade me that you wish the charm reversed, and that you were just such an obscure salt-water man as myself!"

"You remember," said my companion, "the story of the half man, half marble prince of the Arabian tale. One part was a living creature, one part a stone; but the parts were incorporated, and the mixture was misery. I am just such a poor unhappy creature as the enchanted prince of the story."

"You surprise and distress me," I rejoined. "Have you not accomplished all you so fondly purposed—realised even your warmest wishes? And this, too, in early life. Your most sanguine hopes pointed to but a name, which you yourself, perhaps, was never to hear, but which was to dwell on men's tongues when the grave closed over you. And now the name is gained, and you live to enjoy it. I see the living part of your lot, it seems instinct with happiness; but in what does the dead, the stone part consist?"

He shook his head; and looked up mournfully in my face; there was a pause of a few seconds. "You, Mr. Lindsay," he at length replied, "you who are of an equable, steady temperament, can know little, from experience, of the unhappiness of the man who lives only in extremes; who is either madly gay or miserably depressed. Try and realise the feelings of one whose mind is like a broken harp—all the medium tones gone, and only the higher and lower left; of one, too, whose circumstances seem of a piece with his mind; who can enjoy the exercise of his better powers, and yet can only live by the monotonous drudgery of copying page after page in a clerk's office; of one who is continually groping his way amid a chill melancholy fog of nervous depression, or carried headlong, by a wild gaiety, to all which his better judgment would instruct him to avoid; of one who, when he indulges most in the pride of superior intellect, cannot away with the thought that that intellect is on the eve of breaking up, and that he must yet rate infinitely lower in the scale of rationality than any of the nameless thousands who carry on the ordinary concerns of life around him."

I was grieved and astonished, and knew not what to answer. "You are in a gloomy mood to-day," I at length said; "you are immersed in one of the fogs you describe; and all the surrounding objects take a tinge of darkness from the medium through which you survey them. Come, now, you must make an exertion, and shake off your melancholy. I have told you all my story, as I best could, and you must tell me all yours in return."

"Well," he replied, "I shall, though it mayn't be the best way in the world of dissipating my melancholy. I think I must have told you, when at college, that I had a maternal uncle of considerable wealth and, as the world goes, respectability, who resided in Aberdeenshire. He was placed on what one may term the table-land of society; and my poor mother, whose recollections of him were limited to a period when there is warmth in the feelings of the most ordinary minds, had hoped that he would willingly exert his influence in my behalf. Much, doubtless, depends on one's setting out in life; and it would have been something to have been enabled to step into it from a level-like that was occupied by my relative. I paid him a visit shortly after leaving college, and met with apparent kindness. But I can see beyond the surface, Mr. Lindsay; and I soon saw that my uncle was entirely a different man from the brother whom my mother remembered. He had risen, by a course of slow industry, from comparative poverty, and his feelings had worn out in the process. The character was case-hardened all over; and the polish it bore—for I have rarely met a smoother man—seemed no improvement. He was, in brief, one of the class content to dwell for ever in mere decencies, with consciences made up of the conventional moralities, who think by precedent, bow to public opinion as their god, and estimate merit by its weight in guineas."

"And so your visit," I said, "was a very brief one?"

"You distress me," he replied. "It should have been so; but it was not. But what could I do? Ever since my father's death, I had been taught to consider this man as my natural guardian; and I was now unwilling to part with my last hope. But this is not all. Under much apparent activity, my friend, there is a substratum of apathetical indolence in my disposition; I move rapidly when in motion; but when at rest, there is a dull inertness in the character, which the will, when unassisted by passion, is too feeble to overcome. Poor, weak creature that I am! I had sitten down by my uncle's fireside, and felt unwilling to rise. Pity me, my friend—I deserve your pity—but, oh, do not despise me!"

"Forgive me, Mr. Ferguson," I said; "I have given you pain, but surely most unwittingly."

"I am ever a fool," he continued; "but my story lags; and, surely, there is little in it on which it were pleasure to dwell. I sat at this man's table for six months, and saw, day after day, his manner towards me becoming more constrained, and his politeness more cold; and yet I staid on till at last my clothes were worn threadbare, and he began to feel that the shabbiness of the nephew affected the respectability of the uncle. His friend, the soap-boiler, and his friend, the oil merchant, and his friend, the manager of really magnificent.* The heart of the good Sir John Finnet, the master of the ceremonies, evidently warms, as he describes minutely the gorgeous dresses, and the "draughts of ippocras out of a great golden bowl." "The bravery," he adds, "and riches of that day were incomparable; gold and silver laid upon lords' ladies' and gentlewomen's backs, was the poorest burthen: pearls and costly embroideries being the commonest wear. The king's and queen's and prince's jewels only, were valued that day by his majesty himself at nine hundred thousand pounds sterling."†

The appearance of the bride has been minutely and fondly described by more than one writer of the period. She was arrayed in white, the emblem of innocence; her long hair, as the ornament of virginity, falling in full length down her back. On her head was a crown of pure gold, ornamented with pearls and diamonds; and supporting her train were twelve young ladies, also clothed in white, and so adorned with jewels, that we are told her passage looked like a milky way. During her progress to the chapel royal, she was supported by two single men, her brother, Prince Charles, on the right, and the Earl of Northampton on the left. On her return, she was escorted by two married noblemen, the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Nottingham. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

They took leave of the king and queen at Rochester, in the middle of April, and attended by several of the nobility of both sexes, arrived at Flushing on the 27th of that month, from whence they passed in considerable magnificence to Heidelberg. The elector seems to have parted, not in the best humour with his father-in-law. At the instigation of his uncle, the Duke de Bouillon, he had solicited the enlargement of Lord

* It is said in a letter of the time,—“The Lady Wotton was reported to have a gown that cost fifty pound the yard the embroidering; and the Lord Montague bestowed fifteen hundred pound in apparel upon his daughters.”—Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 434.

Grey from the tower. The king, apparently far from pleased, declined complying with this request. He told him that when he came to Germany, the elector might depend on his not interceding for any of his prisoners. The palsegrave complained to the Archbishop of Canterbury, that, instead of treating him as his son-in-law, the king “used him rather like a youngling, or childish youth, not to be regarded.”

James, it seems, was anxious that his son-in-law should receive an academical entertainment from the University of Cambridge, and accordingly we find them surfeiting him for a considerable period with pedantry, yet not without respect.

However unimportant in other respects, as a further illustration of the amiable character of Elizabeth, it may not be uninteresting to insert the following letter. It was addressed by her, on the eve of her quitting England, to the Lord Mayor and Wardens of the Merchant Tailors' Company, and shows how warmly she could interest herself in favour of an old retainer:—

My Lord,

I have not been forward to wring you with requests. As this is the first, so is it likely to be the last, especially in this kind.

That which I am to move you and your company is for this; I am given to understand that the cook belonging to your hall, being an old man, is not so well able as he hath been to do you service, but, by reason of his impotency, driven to commit the same to another: in regard whereof, for that I have known the bearer hereof, John Warde, to be sufficient for the operation of such a place, having had experience of his honesty and discreet consideration, doing me service in the house where I have lived since my coming into England, I am willing to commend him unto you for the cook of your hall, to be accepted when that old man shall leave his place by death or otherwise resign it. I presume my letter shall carry that respect with your lordship that to enlarge it with more inducements shall be needless. If I may hear before I leave this place, that John Warde doth rest assured of your favours in this behalf, it shall settle an affection in me to continue your friend,

ELIZABETH.

The manner in which the palsegrave eventually plunged his subjects in war, and risked his patrimonial dominions, for the sake of the mere empty title of king;—the circumstances under which his electoral title was transferred to the dukedom of Bavaria, and he himself became an expatriated wanderer, and a pensioner upon England, are too minutely detailed in history to require repetition.

These were the circumstances, however, which exhibited in a stronger light the more brilliant qualities of Elizabeth's character. When Count Thurm gallantly offered to prolong the defence of the citadel of Prague till she had reached a place of safety; “Never,” was her reply, “shall there be more devastation than is necessary for my sake: sooner would I die where I am, than be remembered by a curse.” Nothing could exceed the unrepining dignity with which she bore her misfortunes, and few have been more afflicted. Kirkton, in his history of the Church of Scotland, speaks of her existence as the “most unhappy of any woman in the world.” She had been driven from her husband's kingdom, and from the splendours and comforts to which she had been born, into exile and positive want. Neal dwells on her “starving condition,” and she is even spoken of as “reduced to the utmost beggary,” and as “wandering frequently in disguise as a mere vagrant.” In one year she lost her father, who was also her benefactor, and her eldest son, Frederick; the latter by a miserable end. He was crossing Hærlæm-Mere with his father, in the common passage boat, (the penurious palsegrave having selected that conveyance in order to save a small sum,) when the vessel, which was overladen with goods, unfortunately overset. The palsegrave saved himself by swimming, but the young prince, clinging to the mast, became entangled in the rigging, and the next morning was found half drowned, half frozen to death. With the vulgar-minded, to be poor is to be contemptible. At Antwerp, in the true spirit of vulgarity, the most illustrious woman of her time was depicted as an Irish beggar, a child hanging behind her back, and the king, her father, carrying her cradle.

Still, however, there were those who were able to appreciate merit and feel for misfortune. In the low countries she was so beloved as to be styled “the Queen of Hearts.” In England she was not forgotten. There was the strongest feeling in favour of this unfortunate princess, and an ardent anxiety that James would take an active and decided part to procure the restitution of the palatinate. The forlorn situation of a princess of England was considered as a national disgrace; and mingling their anxiety for the protestant interests with their ardour in her cause, the people of England would have poured forth to a war with the empire as they would have gathered to a crusade. The following extract from a letter of the period will afford some idea of the enthusiasm which was excited by her character and distress:—“The lieutenant of the Middle Temple played a game this Christmas time, whereat his majesty was highly displeased. He made choice of the civilest and best-fashioned gentlemen of the house to sup with him: and being at supper, took a cup of wine in one hand, and held his sword drawn in the other, and so began a health to the distressed Lady Elizabeth, and having drunk, kissed the sword, and laying his hand upon it, took an oath to live and die in her service; then delivered the cup and sword to the next, and so the health and ceremony went round.

One of Elizabeth's most ardent admirers was the famous Sir Henry Wotton. The following exquisite verses are the more remarkable, as being written by a man whose fame rested so little on his poetical talent: they are addressed—“To his mistress, the Queen of Bohemia.”

You meaner beauties of the night,
That poorly satisfy our eyes,
More by your number than your light;
You common-people of the skies,
What are you when the sun shall rise?

You curious chanters of the wood,
That warble forth Dame Nature's lays,
Thinking your voices understood
By your weak accents; what's your praise
When Philomel her voice shall raise?

You violets that first appear,
By your pure purple mantles known,
Like the proud virgins of the year,
As if the spring were all your own,
What are you when the rose is blown?

So, when my mistress shall be seen,
In form and beauty of her mind,
By virtue first, then choice, a queen;

Tell me if she were not design'd
The eclipse and glory of her kind.*

Elizabeth was herself a poetess, and is known to have been the author of a copy of verses, which will be found both in the Nugæ Antiquæ and Park's Noble Authors. The sentiments are those of an amiable and a graceful mind, and though the versification is indifferent, the whole is at least equal as a composition to any of the poetical effusions of her pedantic father. The three concluding stanzas have the most merit, and may be taken as a specimen of her muse.

O! my soul, of heavenly birth,
Do thou scorn this basest earth:
Place not here thy joy and mirth,
Where of bliss is greatest dearth.

From below thy mind remove,
And affect the things above;
Set thy heart and fix thy love
Where the truest joys shall prove.

To me grace, O Father! send,
On thee wholly to depend,
That all may to thy glory tend;
So let me live, so let me end.

The Elector Palatine died of a fever, while in exile at Mentz, November 29, 1632. From this period Elizabeth resided principally at the Hague, where she was eventually joined by the royal family of England, when the civil commotions had banished them from their country. Her adviser and supporter during her widowhood was William, the first Earl of Craven, who carefully watched over her affairs, and regarded her with an affection which almost amounted to enthusiasm. The world believed that they were married, and the suspicion appears to have been not unfounded. At all events, she could not have united herself to a kinder, a braver, or a better man.

Shortly after the Restoration she accepted an invitation from her nephew, Charles the Second, and returned to her native country on the 17th of May, 1661. She first took up her residence in Lord Craven's house in Drury Lane, an interesting mansion only recently demolished,† whence

* Reliquæ Wottonianæ, p. 379. There are other versions of this beautiful trifle, but the discrepancies are not material. It may be remarked, however, that Dr. Wright, in the Parnassus Biceps, inserts two additional stanzas, as the first and concluding one, of which the merit is indifferent and the authenticity doubtful. The disputed stanzas are as follows:—

Ye glorious trifles of the East,
Whose estimation fancies raise,
Pearls, rubies, sapphires, and the rest
Of precious gems; what is your praise
When as the diamond shows his rays?

The rose, the violet, and the whole spring
May to her breath for sweetness run,
The diamond's darkened in the ring,
When she appears the moon's undone,
As at the brightness of the sun.

See Walton's Lives: London, 1825, p. 472, note.

† It had formerly been called Drury House, having been the residence of the ancient family of the Druries, and was famous as the spot where the adherents of the ill-fated Essex plotted against Queen Elizabeth. The house was rebuilt by Lord Craven. Pennant tells us that in searching after it, he discovered a sign, the head of the Queen of Bohemia, "his admired mistress," which proved its identity. In Pennant's time it was an inn. The same writer remarks on the following curious coincidence: "It is singular that this lane, of later times so notorious she removed on the 8th of February, 1662, to Leicester House, where she died only five days afterwards, February 13, 1662, in the sixty-sixth year of her age. Osborne, no great respecter of princes, has given her character in the brightest colours. He tells us that "her misfortunes were as singular evidences of the instability of fortune, as in prosperity she had herself afforded of civility and goodness." He informs us also that her conduct was so blameless throughout, that even the papists were at a loss where to search for blame. That character must be indeed exemplary, on which political, and even religious, rancour is unable to fix reproach.

Elizabeth delighted in the society of learned men, among whom we are pleased to find Sir Henry Wotton her friend, and Francis Quarles her cup-bearer. Indeed, the gallant Provost of Eaton is all enthusiasm when he speaks of her. He styles her, with no less poetry than justice, a "princess resplendent in the darkness of fortune."

The following letter to Lord Finch, which is for the first time printed, will afford some notion of Elizabeth's playful humour:—

My Lord,

I assure you your letter was very welcome to me, being glad to find you are still heart-whole, and that you are in better health, if your cough is gone. As for your appetite, I confess your outlandish meats are not so good as beef and mutton. I pray you remember how ill pickled herring did use you here, and brought you one of your one hundred and fifty fevers. As for the Countess, I can tell you heavy news of her, for she is turned Quaker, and preaches every day in a tub. Your nephew George can tell you of her quaking; but her tub-preaching is come since he went. I believe at last she will become an Adamite. I did not hear you were dead; wherefore I hope your promise not to die till you let me know it; but you must also stay till I give you leave to die, which will not be till we meet a shooting somewhere, but where that is God knows best. I can tell little other news here: my chief exercise being to jaunt betwixt this and Schieveling, where my niece has been all this winter. I am now in mourning for my brother-in-law the Duke of Simmeren's death. My Lady Stanhope and her husband are going, six weeks hence, into France to the waters of Bourbon, which is all I will say now, only that I am ever

Your most affectionate friend,

Hague, March 4.

ELIZABETH.

I pray you remember me to your lady and to my Lord of Winchelsea.

To the Lord Finch.

Elizabeth bequeathed her pictures, her books, and her papers to Lord Craven, who had ever been faithful and ever kind. That she was married to that nobleman, though it has been generally credited, has never been actually proved. He was thirteen years her junior; notwithstanding which disparity the feeling which actuated his attentions appears to have been something deeper than friendship. After her decease he is for intrigue, should receive its title from a family name, which, in the language of Chaucer, had an amorous signification,—

Of bataille and of chevalrie,
Of ladies' love and Druerie,
Anon I wol you tell."

Pennant's London, p. 145.

said to have resided principally at Combe Abbey, from its having been the scene of his beloved mistress's childhood.

It would be improper to dismiss our notice of the Queen of Bohemia, without a brief account of her presumed husband, and faithful servant, Lord Craven. He was the son of Sir William Craven, Knight, Merchant Tailor, who served the office of Lord Mayor of London in 1611. Early in life he had achieved a reputation in arms under Gustavus Adolphus, and Henry prince of Orange, which probably led, 12th of March, 1626, to his being created Baron Craven. During the civil wars, having fought bravely and suffered severely in the royal cause, at the Restoration, he was raised by Charles II. 15th of March, 1663, to be Viscount and Earl Craven. In 1670, he succeeded the great Duke of Albe-marle as Colonel of the Coldstream Guards: he was also a member of the Privy Council to Charles II. and his brother James. To the last, his life was as useful to his fellow-creatures, as his character was brave, generous, and open. He voluntarily remained in London during the time of the great plague, and built a lazaretto for the sick, behind what is now called Golden Square, but which then consisted of open fields. Pennant says, "he braved the fury of the pestilence with the same coolness that he fought the battles of his beloved mistress, Elizabeth, or mounted the tremendous breach at Creutzenach:" and Dr. Gumble, his contemporary, informs us, that he "freely chose to venture his life upon a thousand occasions in this afflicted time, in the midst of the infected; provided nurses and physicians for them that were sick, and out of his own purse expended vast sums of money, to supply the necessities of such as were ready to perish: an honour beyond all his gallantries and brave exploits in Germany and elsewhere."

In the same spirit of philanthropy, whenever a fire broke out in London or its vicinity, so eager was he in his exertions, and so immediately was he ever on the spot, that it was said that, "his horse smelt a fire as soon as it happened." It is remarkable, considering the earl's well-known exertions on such occasions, that, in 1718, his splendid mansion at Hampstead-Marshall, should have been destroyed by fire.

Whether at home or abroad, no one was more generally loved or universally respected. Handsome and gallant in his youth, he was through life, agreeable, benevolent, and kind-hearted. If Elizabeth really accepted him as her husband, what more can be said, than that she showed her judgment and her taste. In his attachment there was something almost amounting to romance. A soldier in early life, he was in his heart a soldier to the last. When, at the accession of James II. it was proposed to take away his regiment from the old courtier, "They might as well," he said, "take away my life, for I have nothing else to divert myself with." Notwithstanding his military tastes, the researches of the Royal Society, and the decoration of his own garden, continued, to extreme old age, to be the sources of pleasure and improvement.

A character so amiable may bear to have a single weakness recorded. It is related of him, at the court of Charles the Second, that he had a failing of whispering in the ears of the principal politicians at court, as if to leave an impression among the bystanders that he was the depository of some state secret. It was on this account that Lord Keeper Guilford used to style him "Earwig." Charles II. was once much amused with seeing the Earl of Dorset, whose high breeding made him a patient listener, undergoing the infliction of Lord Craven's whispering. When they parted, the king inquired of Dorset what he had been listening to. "My Lord Craven," said the earl, "did me the honour to whisper, but I did not think it good manners to listen." Lord Craven died 9th of April, 1697, at the age of eighty-eight.

LADY ARABELLA STUART.

Though nearly allied to the throne of England and an object of jealousy to its possessors, it is remarkable how little is really known of the character of this unfortunate lady. By one writer, she is said to have been as little remarkable for beauty as for the qualities of her mind. By others, her beauty and her genius have been highly extolled. Evelyn places her in his catalogue of learned women, and Philips among his modern poetesses. Lodge in particular speaks of "her good sense, refined education, elegance of manners, and kindness of disposition." Let us, however, draw our own inferences from these contradictory statements, and we shall, perhaps, arrive at the truth. Certain it is, that though she became the object on which ambition centered its views, she was too sensible to be caught in the golden net which was spread for her. That she was artless and feminine in her disposition;—that if she did not excel, she at least was not deficient in mental and personal accomplishments;—that her life was unhappy, and her end miserable; these are nearly all the particulars that can now be told of a character to which so much importance was once attached.

Lady Arabella was first cousin to James the First, being the daughter of Charles Stuart, fifth earl of Lennox, who was brother to Henry Lord Darnley, the king's father, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Cavendish, of Hardwick. James derived his claims to the throne of England, from being the great-grandson of Margaret, daughter of Henry the Seventh. Lady Arabella was her great-granddaughter, by the queen's second marriage with Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, whose daughter, lady Margaret Douglas, was married to Matthew earl of Lennox, grandfather to the subject of the present memoir. Lady Arabella was born about the year 1577, and was educated in London under the care of her grandmother, Margaret countess of Lennox, who was first cousin to Queen Elizabeth.

Lady Arabella was too closely allied to the throne for her own happiness. Through life she was little more than a prisoner at large, whose every movement was watched and suspected. She was undoubtedly a person of considerable importance in the political intrigues of the period. The papists, encouraged by the unsettled state of the English succession, were anxious to unite her to a foreign prince of their own persuasion. The pope had thoughts of marrying her to a prince of the house of Farnese, with a view, if possible, of afterwards raising her to the throne of England. The duke of Savoy was also mentioned as a suitable consort. The famous plot for which Broke and others suffered on the scaffold, and Raleigh, Grey, and Cobham, were sentenced to imprisonment, had for its object the elevation of Arabella to the throne, and her marriage with an English nobleman.

portunities of entering into the marriage state. James had been desirous of uniting her to her cousin the Duke of Lennox, but being opposed by Elizabeth, the project fell to the ground. The lady herself appears to have been extremely anxious to enter into the matrimonial state, and twice suffered imprisonment in the attempt. Previously to her clandestine match with Seymour, she had been on the eve of marriage with a son of the Earl of Northumberland; but the attempt becoming known to Elizabeth, she experienced a different kind of confinement to that which a married lady might have anticipated.

One of Elizabeth's methods of keeping James in proper subserviency, was by opposing the claims of Arabella Stuart to those of the Scottish monarch. When the latter was about twelve years of age, the queen pointed her out to the wife of the French ambassador:—"Do you see that little girl?" she said: "simple as she looks, she may one day sit in this chair of state and occupy my place." Elizabeth neglected her young relation, if she did not actually ill-treat her. When the queen died, Lady Arabella's near relationship caused her to be specially invited to the funeral. She declined the honour, observing that, as "her access to the queen had not been permitted in her life-time, she would not after her death be brought upon the stage for a public spectacle. Her affinity to the blood-royal rendered her no less an object of jealousy with James. He seems to have been in dread lest she should throw herself on the protection of Spain—a step which the existing state of politics might have rendered of unpleasant importance. It appears, however, by the letters of the time, that as long as the political horizon was tolerably clear, and while there was no suspicion of her entering into the marriage state, she was not unkindly treated at the court of James. At one time the king paid her debts, presented her with a service of plate of the value of two hundred pounds, and made an important addition to her income.

The lady Arabella's last and accepted lover was Sir William Seymour, afterwards earl and marquess of Hertford. The progress and catastrophe of their affection is not without a tincture of romance. We must remember that her lover was afterwards that same Hertford so distinguished for his gallantry and loyalty during the civil wars,—the same Hertford, who, when his royal master was condemned to the scaffold, with Lindsey, Southampton, and the duke of Richmond, accused himself, in his capacity of privy councillor, of being alone guilty of what was laid to the king's charge, and requested, with those noblemen that he might die in the place of his sovereign. After the bloody catastrophe was over, he was one of those who accompanied the dead body of Charles, when it was borne in silence and almost in secrecy, to its last home. He had been the governor of Charles the Second, was a knight of the garter, and chancellor of the University of Cambridge. At the restoration, Charles II. rewarded his services by restoring to him the dukedom of Somerset, which had been forfeited by the attainder of his great-grandfather, the magnificent protector. The manner in which Charles conferred the boon does honour to his heart. He spoke gratefully of Hertford's services in open parliament: "If," he said, "I have done an extraordinary act, it was done for an extraordinary person; one who has deserved so much both from my father and myself."

The love of such a man gives dignity to romance. The intercourse between Seymour and lady Arabella was first discovered in 1609, on which they were summoned before the privy council and severely reprimanded. The lady's character having suffered by the disclosure, in order to retrieve it, they were privately married; this event having been allowed to transpire, Seymour was sent to the tower, and the lady Arabella confined in the house of Sir Thomas Parry at Lambeth, from whence she was afterwards removed to Highgate, under the charge of Sir James Croft. On Seymour's entering the tower, Melvin, who was a prisoner there on account of his religious prejudices, sent him the following distich. The trifle is not without its merit, but the play on the latin words renders its translation impracticable:—

During their imprisonment the lovers found means to communicate; but their correspondence being discovered, it was determined to send the lady to Durham, a measure which would probably have effectually prevented any subsequent intercourse. Nothing now remained, therefore, but the hope of escape, to effect which every thing had been duly concerted, and on a certain day, a vessel appointed to be in readiness in the Thames. Seymour, leaving his servant in his bed to prevent suspicion, disguised himself in a black wig and a pair of black whiskers, and following a cart that had been directed to bring firewood to his apartments, walked unquestioned out of the western entrance to the tower. A boat was in waiting for him at the tower wharf, in which he rowed to the part of the river where he expected to meet his bride; but finding that she had sailed without him, he hired another vessel for forty pounds to convey him to Calais, where he eventually arrived in safety.

In the mean time, the lady Arabella, having disguised herself in male attire, "drawing over her petticoats a pair of large French-fashioned hose, putting on a man's doublet, a peruke which covered her hair, a hat, black cloak, russet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her side," managed to elude the vigilance of her keepers, and under the charge of a Mr. Markham, set out from Highgate on her perilous expedition. They walked some distance to a little inn, where a person attended with horses. She was, even at this early period, so overcome with fatigue and anxiety, that the ostler observed, as he held her stirrup, that the young gentleman would scarcely hold out till he arrived in London. Her spirits, however, revived with her increased prospects of escape. At Blackwall she found two female attendants with all the necessary conveniences of female apparel; and, having entered with them into a boat, proceeded to the part of the river where she expected to be joined by her husband. At Tilbury Fort the boatmen became so fatigued, as to be obliged to go on shore to refresh themselves, leaving the unfortunate fugitive in the greatest trepidation from the fear of being betrayed. About a mile beyond Lee they discovered and embarked on board the vessel which was waiting for them. Arabella herself was extremely anxious to run all risks, and to remain till the fate of her husband had been ascertained: but being overcome by the fears and importunities of her attendants, she eventually allowed the vessel to set sail without him.

The flight of Arabella was the first which was discovered, and orders were immediately sent to the tower to guard Seymour with increased vigilance. On entering his lodging, however, the truth soon became apparent. The king was much disturbed by the event, and issued a proclamation for their arrest. A fast-sailing vessel, which lay in the Downs, was ordered to put to sea directly; first proceeding to the Dover roads, and then scouring the coast towards Dunkirk. Unfortunately, the pursuit was successful; and though the pinnace which conveyed lady Arabella fired thirteen shots before she would strike, she was eventually brought to and the fugitive reconducted to London. She expressed herself less afflicted at her own fate, than overjoyed at the escape of her husband.

Her examination and committal to the tower shortly followed. Here she wore out a miserable existence, and is even said to have ended her days in madness; an assertion, however, not sufficiently borne out by facts. Walpole observes, that her latest letters, though they "do not prove that she had parts, betray no appearance of madness." In one of them she subscribes herself "the most sorrowful creature living." Another supposition also existed, that her death was caused by poison; a conjecture as malicious as it was unfounded. Her body was examined after death, in the presence of several eminent physicians, who gave it as their unanimous opinion that she died of a chronic distemper; her end having been hastened, partly by her own neglect, and partly by her aversion to medicine. She died on the 27th of September, 1615, more than four years after her unfortunate attempt to escape.

It is difficult to credit that a man of Seymour's character should have been captivated by a woman, who possessed no accomplishments either of person or mind. Besides, Lady Arabella was a great favourite with her relation, the highly gifted Prince Henry, who, as Birch tells us, "took all occasions of obliging her." This fact alone might lead us to a favourable opinion of her intellectual powers. It is not impossible also but that she had some claim to personal advantages; at least, if we may argue from a copy of verses sent to her by William Fowler, secretary, and master of the requests to James's queen. This production, which is most ingeniously absurd, concludes with the following lines:—

O graces rare! which time from shame shall save,
Wherein thou breath'st (as in the sea doth fish,
In salt not saltish,) exempt from the grave
Of sad remorse, the lot of worldling's wish.
O ornament both of thyself and sex,
And mirror bright, where virtues doth reflex!"

Lady Arabella was buried in Westminster Abbey, in the same vault with Mary Queen of Scots and Henry Prince of Wales, but without any memorial of her resting-place. Camden says her funeral was conducted in the night, without pomp. An epitaph was written for her by Richard Corbet, Bishop of Norwich. The production is far from remarkable for poetical talent, and the third and last lines are obscure:

How do I thank thee, Death, and bless thy power,
That I have pass'd the guard, and 'scaped the Tower!
And now my pardon is my epitaph,
And a small coffin my poor carcass hath;
For at thy charge, both soul and body were Enlarged at last, secured from hope and fear;
That amongst saints, this amongst kings is laid,
And what my birth did claim, my death has paid.

Ballard informs us that her coffin was at one time so shattered and broken, that her skull and body might be seen. Seymour appears to have regarded his wife's memory with affection. It may be taken as an evidence of it, that he called one of his daughters by his second marriage with Frances, daughter of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, by the name of Arabella Seymour.

LODOWICK STUART,

DUKE OF RICHMOND.

A nobleman whose name is never mentioned without enology. James the First regarded him with personal affection, and seems fully to have appreciated in him those talents and that strong sense, of which, however, the monarch unfortunately neglected to avail himself. Had he invested him with half the power which he lavished on Somerset and Buckingham, it would have been far better for his own interests and the happiness of his realm.

The duke was related not very distantly to the sovereign. He was the younger son of Esme Stuart, Duke of Lennox, and great nephew to Matthew Earl of Lennox, the king's grandfather. James created him Duke of Richmond, and a Knight of the garter, and appointed him Lord Steward of the Household. He was three times married: first, to Sophia, daughter of William Earl of Ruthven; secondly, into the family of Campbell; and lastly, to Frances, daughter of Viscount Howard, of Bindon. In 1604, he was sent ambassador into France, where he appears to have been well received by the French court.

His death, which was singular and sudden, took place on the 12th of February, 1625. The duke was to have attended his majesty in state at the opening of a new parliament. The king missing him in his place, and making some inquiries as to the reason of his absence, a messenger was instantly despatched to the duke's residence, requiring his attendance. The duchess, who fancied that she had left him asleep, was induced to open the curtains of his bed, and was horror-struck to discover her husband a corpse. The king appears to have been much affected at the circumstance, and paid an unusual compliment to the duke's memory, by proroguing the parliament for a week. The duchess is said to have communicated to her intimate friends a private and remarkable reason, for believing the duke was in perfect health but a few hours previously to his death.

FRANCES HOWARD,

DUCHESS OF RICHMOND.

Beauty, folly, vanity, and eccentricity, appear to have constituted the character of this remarkable woman. It is singular that she was the granddaughter of two dukes, each of whom lost his life on the scaffold. Her father was Thomas, Viscount Howard, of Bindon, second son of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, the lover of Mary Queen of Scots. Her mother was the eldest daughter of Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who fell a victim to the malice of Wolsey and his own ambition. The lady herself was the third wife of the respectable Duke Lodowick, whose brief memoir has just been introduced.

The first husband of Frances Howard was one Prannell, the son of a wealthy vintner of London. Under what circumstances the loveliest and proudest women of her time, and the granddaughter of the two greatest subjects in England, became the wife of a citizen, it has been found impossible to explain. Prannell, however, died in December, 1599, leaving her a young, childless, and beautiful widow. Sir George Rodney, a gentleman of the west of England, became shortly afterwards her professed and ardent admirer. She at first gave him encouragement, but the Earl of Hertford paying her his addresses, influenced perhaps by ambition, she jilted the unfortunate knight and married the earl. Rodney, unable to endure the pangs of love and jealousy, hastened to Amesbury, in Wiltshire, whither Hertford had carried his beautiful bride. Shutting himself up in a private room in the inn, according to Arthur Wilson, he wrote with his own blood some affecting verses descriptive of his misery and bereavement, after which he threw himself on his sword and died on the spot. The verses said to have been composed by Rodney on this occasion, are preserved in the British Museum, and may possibly be authentic. The singularity of the circumstances must be the apology for their insertion.

What shall I do that am undone!
Where shall I fly, myself to shun!
Ah me! myself myself must kill,
And yet I die against my will.
In starry letters I behold
My death in the heavens enroll'd.
There find I writ in skies above,
That I, poor I, must die for love.
'T was not my love deserved to die,
Oh no, it was unworthy I;
I for her love should not have died,
But that I had no worth beside.
Ah me! that love such woes procures,
For, without her, no love endures.
I for her virtues her do serve—
Doth such a love a death deserve?

Hertford does not appear to have repented of his choice, for he subsequently settled a jointure on his countess of five thousand pounds a year. In his lifetime, she was very fond of boasting of her high extraction, and of the two dukes her grandfathers. However, if the earl happened to enter the room, he used to give her pride a check, by asking—"Frank, Frank, how long is it since you were married to Prannell?"

Duke Lodowick fell in love with her while she was yet Countess of Hertford, and used to watch her motions in disguise; "sometimes in a blue coat and basket-hilt sword," as well as in other costumes. Scandal, however, appears to have taken no liberties with her name, and at Hertford's death, the duke gratified her ambition by making her his wife.

Her marriage with a near relation to the sovereign, excited her pride beyond all bounds; and becoming a third time a widow, she entertained a hope of captivating the old king, and filling the place of his deceased queen. The arrogant beauty actually announced her determination never to eat at the table of a subject, or to marry again beneath the rank of majesty; and though neither James, nor any other monarch, was gallant enough to tender her his hand, she persevered in her resolution to the last.

She delighted in state and notoriety, and endeavoured by every manner of artifice to obtain a character for splendour and generosity. At the christening of one of the Queen of Bohemia's children, she caused a report to be propagated that she had forwarded a magnificent present of plate to that princess. An inventory of the different articles was even handed about at the time, but the donation existed only in air. The duchess affected sanctity as well as state; and in the letters of the time, there are frequent allusions to the ghostly conferences maintained at her house. On the 1st of March, 1634, Mr. Garrard writes to the Earl of Strafford,—“The Duchess of Richmond droops very much of late; she keeps her state of sermons and white staves, but hath been a good while not able to hear one sermon, or come amongst the company.” Archbishop Laud, in his crusade against Puritanism, was ungallant enough to interfere with her grace's establishment, and effectually put a stop to this private preaching.

Her vow never to sit at table with a subject, was turned to an ingenious use. Her house was always frequented by the principal persons of the court, on which occasions her hall was filled with menials, and her tables groaned with dishes. But these, it seems, were empty, and as soon as the visitors had departed, the duchess sat down alone to an extremely moderate repast.

From the probability that her early marriage with Prannell was a mere love-match, and from the eccentric manner in which the duke endeavoured to gain her affections, there is reason to believe that she had more romance in her composition than common sense. The death of the duchess is said to have taken place in 1679, from which there is every reason to believe that she must have attained the age of an hundred at the time of her demise.

MARY VILLIERS,

COUNTESS OF BUCKINGHAM.

The mother of the magnificent favourite whose history more properly belongs to the next reign;—a busy, intriguing, masculine, and dangerous person; not deficient in personal beauty, but rendered odious, from what we can learn of her character, by every possible irregularity of mind. She is principally remarkable as having been the mother of the great duke.

The peerages, ever complaisant, speak of her as having been “the daughter of Anthony Beaumont, of Glenfield, in the county of Leicester, Esq.” Her own importance at the court of James, and the grandeur which was achieved by her family, may render her actual origin a matter of interest. Roger Coke, in his “Detection of the Court of England,” informs us, on the authority of his aunt, who was connected by marriage with the Villiers family, that she was a kitchen-maid in old Sir George Villiers's establishment; that he became enamoured of her, and persuaded his lady to place her about her own person; and adds, that after the death of his wife, Sir George presented her twenty pounds to improve her dress, which appears to have produced so wonderful an effect, that shortly afterwards he married her. Weldon styles her, “A gentlewoman whom the old man fell in love with and married.”

Arthur Wilson's account is somewhat different. The old knight, he informs us, was on a visit to his kinswoman, Lady Beaumont, at Cole-horton, in Leicestershire, where he found a “young gentlewoman of that name, allied, and yet a servant to the family,” who caught his affections, and whom he afterwards took for his wife. Her name was undoubtedly Beaumont, and, however distantly, she was certainly connected with the Leicestershire family of that name. Her kinspeople do not appear to have been gifted with over much morality. One Coleman, a clerk to Sir Thomas Beaumont, had very liberal favours conferred upon him both by Lady Beaumont and her daughters. He was mean enough to boast of his success, on hearing which, Sir Thomas brought him before the Star Chamber, where he was sentenced to be pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned for life. Forman, the celebrated astrologer, assured Coleman's friends that the culprit would manage to elude the punishment. The prediction proved correct. The sentence was directed to be carried into effect in Leicestershire, whither the culprit was attended by two keepers, who, as well as himself, journeyed on horseback. Coleman, who had induced the keepers to allow him to ride without shackles, seized a convenient opportunity, when he stabbed the horses of his companions, and escaped on his own. There are some amusing circumstances connected with Forman's insight into the affair, but they are scarcely fit for insertion.

Sir George Villiers died in 1606, leaving his young widow with an income of only two hundred pounds a year. She was twice married after his death, first to Sir William Rayner, of whom we know nothing, and secondly to Sir Thomas Compton, whom Coke styles a rich country grazier, adding, that she married him in order to make up her own deficiency of fortune. Of this Compton an amusing anecdote has been related. He is represented as an insignificant, mean-spirited man, who allowed himself to be generally laughed at and insulted, and more particularly by one Bird, “a roaring captain,” who seems to have been his arch-tormentor, and was incessant in his provocations. Compton's friends, however, eventually so wrought on his peaceful nature, (telling him that he had better die at once, than endure such a system of persecution,) that he was induced to send Bird a challenge. The latter, as the individual challenged, had the choice of place and weapons; accordingly, he selected swords and a saw-pit, intimating to Compton's second that his object in selecting the place, was to prevent the possibility of his principal running away. The combatants actually met in a saw-pit, when Bird, contemptuously flourishing his sword over his head, began to jeer at Compton, a much smaller man than himself, on the new light in which he was presenting himself. The latter, perceiving his adversary's weapon in the air, ran under it, and passing his own sword through Bird's body, killed him on the spot.

The unexampled rise of her son was a new era in her existence. It raised her from an impoverished country lady to be the proud manager of a court. On the 1st of July, 1618, she was created by letters patent Countess of Buckingham in her own person, an unusual kind of distinction, of which the last example was in the days of Queen Mary.

The countess did not leave her family in the background, and if beauty be deserving of rank, the honours which were conferred on them were not ill bestowed. Besides the splendid rise of her fortunate son, she lived to see her eldest son, Viscount Purbeck; her third, Earl of Anglesea; and her daughter, Countess of Denbigh. Of the two half brothers of the duke, the sons of Sir George Villiers by his first wife, Audrey Sanders, William was one of the first baronets, and from Sir Edward, President of Munster, are descended the Viscounts Grandison and the Earls of Clarendon and Jersey. “The king,” says Arthur Wilson, who never cared much for women, “had his court swarming with the marquis's kindred, so that the little ones would dance up and down the private lodgings like fairies, and it was no small sap that would maintain all those suckers.” Bishop Goodman, also, in his Memoirs, alludes to the alteration in the king's habits and feelings: “The king,” he says, “did usually send for the nurse and the duke's children into his own bed-chamber, and there play with them many hours together. And the king being once with the children, news was brought him that there was an ambassador come to speak with him, whereupon he willed the nurse to stay there with the children, and when he had spoken with the ambassador, he would come again to her. This the nurse herself told me.”

This change in the customs and appearance of James's court, appears to have amused others besides Goodman and Wilson. Weldon says: “Little children did run up and down the king's lodgings like rabbits started about their burrows. Here was a strange change, that the king who formerly would not endure his queen and children in his lodgings, now you would have judged that none but women frequented them; nay, that was not all, but the kindred had all the houses about Whitehall, as if they had been bulwarks and flankers to that citadel.” By the author of the Aulicus Coquinariae, they are styled “a race handsome and beautiful,” an hereditary advantage, if we may judge by many a fair face of later times.

About the year 1622, the countess was banished the court, as was supposed, for her attachment to the Roman Catholic religion. It appears, however, by a letter of the time, that she owed her dismissal to a far different cause. A chain, valued at 3000*l.*, which had belonged to Anne of Denmark, had been presented by the king, at the instigation of Prince Charles, to the Duchess of Lennox, and by the prince himself placed round the lady's neck. The Countess of Buckingham was not a little annoyed at so great an honour, and so valuable a present, having been conferred on another. The next day she actually sent a messenger to the duchess, affirming that the king had especial reasons for wishing to regain possession of the chain, which he would replace by some other article no less valuable, and desiring that it might be returned accordingly. “The messenger,” writes Dr. Meade, “who went in the king's name, and not hers, being sounded by the amazed duchess, whether himself had heard that order from the king, or not, at last confessed he was sent by the countess, who had it from his majesty. Whereupon the duchess bid him tell the countess, that she would not so much dishonour the prince who brought it, as to suffer it to be carried back by any hand but his, or her own; for if his majesty would have it, she would carry it herself; which the next day she performed, desiring to know wherein she had offended his majesty. The king, understanding the business, swore he was abused; and the prince told him that he took it for so great an affront on his part, that he would leave the court if she stayed in it; with no small expression of indignation. My author for this was Sir William Bourser, of Uppingham.”

The countess, undoubtedly, had great influence over her all-powerful son, and is reported to have been the actual dispenser of the immense patronage which ostensibly flowed from his hands. She had no objection to a bribe. Henry Montague, Earl of Manchester, is said to have obtained the office of Lord Privy Seal at her hands, for a large sum. The White Staff had been conferred on him at Newmarket, where there is a great scarcity of timber. A friend, alluding to these circumstances, pleasantly inquired of the earl, "if wood were not extremely dear at Newmarket." She had a hand in all transactions both of church and state, and the suppliants for her son's favour in the first instance addressed themselves to her. In allusion to this influence, as well as to her being a Roman Catholic, Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, with more wit than reverence, thus expresses himself in one of his despatches to his own court:—"There was never more hope of England's conversion to the Romish faith than now; for here there are more prayers offered to the mother than the son." Lord Keeper Williams, also, then Dean of Westminster, is said to have been indebted to her influence for the Bishopric of Durham and the custody of the Great Seal. Indeed, there rests a suspicion that the existence of a tender familiarity between them was the secret of his rise.

Her belief in the tenets of the church of Rome was considered of some importance in her lifetime, since on this foundation rested the hopes of the papists of converting the duke her son. Previous, however, to her open and dangerous confession of being a proselyte, Buckingham, aware of the odium which such a disclosure would entail upon himself, exerted his utmost influence to bring her back to her original principles. James, moreover, never averse to polemical controversies, entered warmly into this laudable endeavour. One Fisher, a Jesuit, had already brought her to the eve of an open declaration. In opposition, therefore, to the arguments of the zealous father, the duke brought forward Dr. Francis Wright, Divinity Lecturer at St. Paul's, and celebrated for his controversial dexterity, who consented to encounter the Jesuit in the lady's presence, and overthrow his arguments against the Protestant Church. One or two conferences accordingly took place, at one of which the king was himself present. Dr. White's arguments appear to have produced but slight influence on the countess. In Buckingham, however, they were remarkable as having adventitiously excited an interest in his own spiritual welfare. He took the doctor into his favour, and on the Sunday following the last conference, received the sacrament at Greenwich.

The countess is accused of having tampered with the life of her sovereign. We have nothing to add to what has already been adduced in the Memoir of King James.

Buckingham was attached to his mother with all her faults, and could not endure that she should be treated with disrespect. Henrietta Maria, in the ensuing reign, had promised on some occasion to visit the countess in her apartments, but from some unavoidable cause was prevented from keeping her appointment. The arrogant favourite entered the chamber of his queen; and after some expostulation, told her in plain terms, that "she should repent it." Henrietta naturally retorting with some indignation, the duke reminded her "that there had been queens in England who had lost their heads." In all probability the quarrel had a deeper origin than a mere neglect in the payment of a visit.

The countess died on the 19th of April, 1632, at her apartments in the Gate-house, Whitehall, which opened into King Street, Westminster. She was buried with considerable pomp in St. Edmund's chapel, situated in the south aisle of Westminster Abbey.

THOMAS SACKVILLE,

EARL OF DORSET.

The Earl of Dorset was more remarkable from his literary accomplishments than his political talent. He was distinguished, however, for a strong sense, an unimpeachable integrity, and a cautious prudence, which perhaps are more to be coveted than genius itself. These qualities, added to the antiquity of his family, and the large fortune he inherited from his father, not only procured his elevation to the peerage, but caused him to be employed in several delicate transactions, wherein none but a very sensible and loyal man would have been trusted. It is singular that he sat among the peers who condemned Thomas Duke of Norfolk to the scaffold: that he was Lord High Steward at the trial of the unfortunate Essex; and that he was not only one of the commissioners appointed to try Mary Queen of Scots, but was selected to communicate to that princess the fatal intelligence that her days were numbered.

The earl was the eldest son of Sir Richard Sackville, who had been in some degree a favourite with Elizabeth, and was indeed related to the queen through the Boleyns. His son was born at Buckhurst, in Sussex, in 1536, received his education at the Universities both of Oxford and Cambridge; was afterwards entered at the Inner Temple, and was elected for the county of Sussex in the first parliament of Elizabeth. On the 8th of June, 1567, he was created Lord Buckhurst by Elizabeth, and on the 13th of March, 1604, Earl of Dorset, by James the First. Besides having been employed successively as ambassador to France and the United Provinces, and having been joined in several important commissions, he was Lord High Treasurer, a Knight of the Garter, and Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

He wrote several poems, besides being, with Thomas Norton, the joint author of "Gorboduc," the first respectable tragedy in the English language. It was acted by the gentlemen of the Inner Temple, before the queen at Whitehall on the 18th January, 1561. This play, notwithstanding its acknowledged merit, was singularly scarce, within the century after it was written; Shakspeare's glorious plays and Johnson's exquisite masques having annihilated common genius. Dryden and Oldham, in the succeeding age, amused themselves with ridiculing Dorset's dramatic effort; which, however, it has been proved they could never have read, for each of them speaks of Gorboduc as a woman; this tragedy is reprinted in the last edition of Dodsley's Collection of Old Plays. Pope was a great admirer of Lord Dorset's muse, and does credit to the purity of his style, and that freedom from bombast, which was the great fault of our early tragic writers. He styles him the best poet between Chaucer and Spencer.

Dorset, in his younger days, had been remarkable as a man of pleasure and a spendthrift. His vast hereditary fortune had at one time nearly passed through his hands; and in his appointment to the treasurership, he afforded a by no means solitary instance of an individual who had wantonly squandered his own fortune, being entrusted with the purse of the public. This is not mentioned as a matter of reproach; since, whatever may have been his early faults, no man ever administered the public revenues with more credit to himself, or advantage to his country. The incident which occasioned the earl's reformation is curious. His necessities obliging him to borrow a sum of money, he applied to a wealthy alderman for his assistance. Happening one day to call at the citizen's house, he was allowed to remain a considerable time unnoticed and alone. This indignity, to which his misconduct compelled him to submit, so wrought upon his feelings, that he resolved from that moment to alter his mode of life. It may be added that he conscientiously adhered to his resolution.

The earl died suddenly at the council board, on the 19th of April, 1608. In the heat of argument he rose from his seat; and as he drew some papers from his bosom, exclaimed vehemently, "I have that here which will strike you dead." He fell down at the moment, and died almost immediately. The queen was present when he expired. His funeral took place in Westminster Abbey, where he was buried with great solemnity, the Archbishop of Canterbury preaching his funeral sermon on the occasion. His body is said to have been afterwards removed, according to a request in his last will, to the parish church of Withiam, in Sussex.

ROBERT CECIL,

EARL OF SALISBURY.

The minister of two sovereigns, and the founder of Theobalds and Hatfield. With a genius almost equal to that of his father, the great Lord Burleigh, he possessed a wonderful knowledge of human character, and that insinuating art, which, while it worms out the secrets of others, preserves its own object in the dark. Artifice and dissimulation are unpopular qualities: and when practised by the statesman in his public capacity, are too apt to affect his character in private life. Such was the lot of Salisbury. Party feeling has added its withering curse, and the name of the greatest politician of his time is seldom mentioned without obloquy. Still, however, it would be difficult to discover a single instance where the wisdom of his administration can justly be called in question. The appointments which he made were admirable; as high treasurer he gave vigour to an exhausted exchequer, and in a corrupt age afforded proof that he was incorruptible. Temptations which even the great Bacon was unable to resist, were by him disregarded. There have been many worse men, and few wiser ministers, than Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.

He was born on the 1st of June, 1563, and was early initiated into public life. Lloyd, in his Worthies, styles him a "courtier from his cradle." In June, 1591, he was knighted by Elizabeth, and on the 13th of May, 1603, was created by James, Lord Cecil of Essingden; and on the 20th of August, 1604, Viscount Cranbourne. He was the first viscount who ever wore a coronet. On the 4th of May, 1605, he was raised to the earldom of Salisbury. It would be out of place to enter here into the details of his political history. Besides his state appointments, he was a Knight of the Garter, and Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. He was married to Elizabeth, daughter of William Brook, Lord Cobham, who died in child-bed, in 1591.

The earl was deformed in his body, but his face is described as handsome. Lloyd says, "for his person he was not much beholden to nature, though somewhat for his face, which was the best part of his outside." He was cheerful and good-humoured: he delighted in all mirthful meetings, and had a laudable taste for magnificence. Gallantry, in the courtly cabinet of Elizabeth, was almost considered as a kind of duty, and the young secretary was not unmindful of his part. The following passage is from a letter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, dated 18th September, 1592:—"I send your lordship here inclosed some verses, compounded by Mr. Secretary, who got Hales to frame a ditty unto it. The occasion was, as I hear, that the young Lady Derby, wearing about her neck in her bosom a picture which was in a dainty tablet, the queen espying it, asked what fine jewel that was. The Lady Derby was curious to excuse the showing of it; but the queen would have it; and opening it and finding it to be Mr. Secretary's, snatched it away, and tied it up in her shoe, and walked long with it there; then she took it thence and pinned it to her elbow, and wore it some time there also, which Mr. Secretary being told of, made these verses, and had Hales to sing them in his chamber. It was told her majesty, that Mr. Secretary had rare music and songs; she would needs hear them; and so this ditty was sung, which you see first written. More verses there be likewise, whereof some or all were likewise sung. I do boldly send these things to your lordship, which I would not do to any one else; for I hear they are very secret. Some of the verses argue that he repines not, though her majesty please to grace others, and content himself with the favour he hath." The poetry has escaped the industry both of Park and Walpole.

His admiration of women was excessive, and carried to unfortunate lengths. It is frequently alluded to in the lampoons of the day. Sir Symonds D'Ewes speaks of him as a "good statesman and no ill member of the commonwealth, though an ill Christian in respect of his unparalleled lust, and hunting after strange flesh." Bishop Goodman, also, evidently admits the accusation to be deserved. This taste has been occasionally supposed to be connected with the cause of his death.

No one understood better the character of King James, or availed himself of that knowledge with greater dexterity. "Knowing the king to be fearful," says Bishop Goodman, "he did often possess him with jealousies and dangers, and then he in his wisdom would prevent them, and so ingratiate himself with the king." In the same spirit was his transfer of Theobalds to his sovereign: though he received in exchange lands far exceeding it in value, he had the ingenuity to persuade his master that he was obliging him by the act.

The system of acquiring information through the means of spies was practised by him to a great extent. He employed them at all the principal courts in Europe, and paid large sums for the intelligence which he received. His subtlety and sagacity were fully appreciated by his master King James, with whose notions of king-craft they fully coincided. With that monarch these were the qualities of a master mind. He used to style Salisbury, and even commenced his letters to him as "his little beagle." Antonio Perez, secretary to the King of Spain, used to style him Robertus Diabolus, Robert the Devil.

The earl had wisely anticipated the favour of James in the lifetime of Elizabeth, and had long corresponded with that prince as to the best means of securing his accession to the English throne. Had the circumstance become known to the queen, it would undoubtedly have ended in his utter ruin. On one occasion she was on the very verge of being enlightened on the subject. She happened to be taking the air on Blackheath, when a state courier passed by the carriage with despatches. Ascertaining that he came from Scotland, she demanded his papers, which were delivered to Cecil, who was in his coach at the time. The secretary trembled for his secrets, but his admirable presence of mind preserved him. He did not hesitate a moment in breaking open the despatches, for delay might have awakened suspicion; but having done so, he told the queen that they looked and "smelt ill-favourably," a circumstance which, from his knowledge of her character, he was well aware would effectually arrest her curiosity.* Sir Henry Wotton relates the above story, adding that Cecil gained a considerable time by inquiring among the bystanders for a knife. Sir Henry mentions incidentally that the bearer of the despatches blew a horn to announce his approach. It is singular perhaps that this custom should have continued to the present day. Salisbury, it may be remarked, draws no very agreeable picture of his situation either as a minister or a favourite. He passed his time, he tells us, "in trouble, hurrying, feigning, suing, and such like matters, knowing not where the winds and waves of the court might bear him." There is an instructive moral in this unvarnished sentence, proceeding as it does from the envied minion of two successive monarchs.

A kind of mystery has always hung over the painful circumstances of Salisbury's end. The scandalous chroniclers of the period have invested it with peculiar degradation. Weldon remarks,—"With all his great honours and possessions, and stately houses, he found no place but the top of a mole-hill, near Marlborough, to end his miserable life; so that it may be said of him and truly, he died of a most loathsome disease, and remarkable, without house, without pity, without the favour of that master who had raised him to so high an estate." Osborne echoes the story as told by Weldon, asserting that the earl died on Salisbury plain in his coach, and that his death was caused by a loathsome disease. The doctor, he adds, who attended him, was an empiric, and only famous for the cure of such disorders.

A great part of this story it is not very difficult

* Wilson, p. ii. The story is somewhat differently related by Bishop Goodman, in his Memoirs:—"The correspondency," he says, "held with the King of the Scots was ever sent by the French post and not by Berwick, for he knew that the queen being most wise, was ever jealous and suspicious of such correspondency; and no doubt but she had her spies to discover it. And her majesty one day walking in Greenwich Park, heard the post blow his horn; whereupon she caused the post to be brought unto her, and willed him to lay down his packet of letters, for that she would peruse them. The news was brought to the secretary, who instantly hastens and kneels before the queen, and humbly beseecheth her majesty not to disgrace him in that manner, for that all men would conceive it to be out of a jealousy and suspicion of him, which would much tend to his dishonour and disgrace, whereby he should be disabled to do her majesty that good service which otherwise he might; and seeing that never any prince did the like, and that it might be a warning and discouragement to other servants. Whereupon the queen was over-entreated to desist, and no doubt but by the entreaty of the ladies and others there present."—Bishop Goodman's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 32.

to disprove. As far, however, as regards the particular disease alluded to, it is right to add that it is hinted at by more than one writer, and in several pasquinades, of the period. The following seem to be the true circumstances of Salisbury's last illness and death:—His laborious attention to state affairs had brought on a consumption of the lungs, which, added to a scorbutic affection, had continued to waste and afflict him for many years. To these we may add an immoderate passion for fruit. "Being crooked in body," says Bishop Goodman, "the veins have not that current passage, and, therefore, such bodies are usually neither healthful nor long-lived: hereunto I may add that he was given to eating of fruits, especially grapes, and that very immoderately; if some shall further add the fruits of wantonness, I take no notice thereof." His physicians had recommended a journey to Bath, but finding his residence there productive of no advantage, he expressed a wish to return and die in his own home. On his way to London he was taken so ill, that having fainted in his litter, it was thought most expedient to place him in his coach, and convey him to Marlborough. He died at the house of a Mr. Daniel in that town. His son, Lord Cranbourne, Lord Clifford, his son-in-law, and several of his friends were with him at the last, and so far was he from having forfeited the king's favour, that James had visited the earl's sick bed more than once before his departure for Bath, and had given minute directions that he should be attended with unremitting care. A report coming from Bath that the minister was in a likely way to recover, James despatched Lord Hay to him with a diamond ring, to which he added a message, "that the favour and affection he bore him, was, and should be ever, as the form and matter of that ring, endless, pure, and most perfect."

A very interesting account of the earl's last sickness was drawn up by his chaplain, the Rev. John Bowles, of which the following are the most remarkable passages:—"On Saturday, May 23, we went to Marlborough, where my lord was very ill and ready to faint. In the chamber we had prayers. Afterwards my lord was undressed, went to bed, and slept ill.

"On Sunday, May 24, the lords commanded me to preach at the church. After sermon we came into his chamber, where we found him very weak, and no posture could give him ease. We went to prayer. And though my lord's weakness was very much, yet with a devout gesture standing up on his crutches, he with affection, repeated the material parts and passages of the prayer. And all the rest of the time till we went to dinner, all his speech was nothing but, O Jesus! O sweet Jesus! and such short ejaculations as the weakness of his body did give him leave.

"After dinner Dr. Poe did rise, and I came unto him. My lord's head lay upon two pillows upon Master Townsend's lap. Ralph Jackson was mending the swing that supported him. 'So,' saith he, 'let me up but this once.' Then he called to Dr. Poe for his hand, which having, he gripped somewhat hard, and his eyes began to settle, when he cried, 'O Lord,' and so sank down without groan, or sigh, or struggling. At the same instant I joined in prayer with him, that God would receive his soul and spirit, which short words being suddenly spoken by me, he was clean gone, and no breath nor motion in him." The same story is related of Salisbury after his death, as has been reported of Oliver Cromwell, that from some singular process of decomposition, his body "purged" through the leaden coffin in which it was confined. By some writers his death is said to have been caused by that most horrible of visitations, the Herodian disease.

His memory was generally regarded with detestation. This feeling is easily accounted for by the immense fortune which he had amassed; his enclosures of Hatfield chase; some unfounded reports of oppression, and his unaccountable treatment of Raleigh; besides, the death of Essex had been neither forgotten nor forgiven by the people. Yet even his enemies speak warmly of his incorruptible honesty. Osborne gives him credit for superior probity, and Sir Symonds D'Ewes speaks of him, as having supplied the expenses of the crown without impoverishing the subject:—what can a lord treasurer do more? Thomas, Earl of Dorset, one of those men whose good word is valuable, mentions Salisbury with the highest encomiums in his will. He bequeaths him his "rich chain of gold, with a George set with rubies and diamonds: likewise a garter of purple velvet, with two chains of gold on each side, set with twelve diamonds, and one great diamond in the middle of the buckle; and several other jewels."

The death of the earl took place on the 24th of May, 1612. His remains were conveyed to Hatfield, where they were interred with considerable magnificence.

ROBERT CARR,

EARL OF SOMERSET.

It was a strange infatuation which induced James the First to select his ministers for the beauty of their persons, and the fashion of their clothes. But this weakness amounted to criminality, when he entrusted the honour of his country, and the welfare and happiness of his people, to a grasping, illiterate, and heartless minion. Buckingham, it is true, had many faults; but Somerset appears to have been deficient even of a single virtue.

The instances are not few, where men have been raised by mere accident to unbounded power. In the first rank of these stands Robert Carr. He was descended from a respectable Scottish family, and had spent some years in France acquiring the necessary qualifications of a courtier. Some writers have asserted, that he had been a favourite of James, in Scotland, and at the coronation was made a knight of the bath. This is not the fact. Carr had certainly been a royal page before the accession of James to the throne of England: he was, however, a mere child at the time, and many years must have elapsed before his re-introduction at court, in 1609. Harris says, that he was dismissed from his post of page, but this appears solely to rest on the authority of that party writer. "He then," continues the same authority, "went into France, from whence, returning, through accident, he was taken notice of by James." This memorable accident occurred under the following circumstances:—At a splendid tilting match at Whitehall, Carr had been selected by his countryman, Lord Hay, to present his shield and device to the king. As he rode up the lists, in the execution of this duty, his horse became unmanageable, and threw him before the king's face. James, struck with the beauty of his person, and concerned at the severity of the accident, for his leg had been broken by the fall, gave directions that he should be conveyed to the palace, and carefully attended by the royal surgeons. As soon as the tilting was over, the king paid him a visit. He returned the next day, and, indeed, as long as the confinement lasted, was daily in the habit of passing an hour or two in the chamber of the unfortunate invalid. On his recovery, for which James was exceedingly impatient, he was made a knight, and a gentleman of the bed-chamber. The king even turned school-master on the occasion, for he endeavoured to instil into his new favourite the rudiments of government, and a knowledge of the Latin tongue. Probably Carr was not an apt scholar. When made a privy councillor, Peyton says, that "he furnished his library only with twenty play-books and wanton romances, and that he had no other in his study."

The rising of the new star was watched with the utmost anxiety. The harpies of the court had flocked in such numbers to his sick chamber, that a restraint was obliged to be laid on their visits, lest his recovery should be retarded by their attentions. He shortly became the disposer of all the important places about the court, as has been said of a greater man, Cardinal Wolsey:—

To him the church, the realm, their powers consign,
Through him the rays of regal bounty shine;
Still to new heights his restless wishes tower;
Claim leads to claim, and power advances power;
Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
And rights submitted, left him none to seize.

The last line it is hardly fair to apply to Carr. Unlike his successor, Buckingham, however, we are told that he did not actually expel those who were in office, but had the decency to wait for the common course of events, before he conferred their places upon his own creatures.

In 1612 he was created Lord Carr, of Bransprath, and Viscount Rochester, and advanced to be lord high treasurer of Scotland. Shortly afterwards he was made a knight of the garter. In 1614 he was created Earl of Somerset, and appointed lord chamberlain of the household, and at the death of Salisbury he became first minister.

Somerset has, at least, the negative merit of being fully aware of his own inexperience and incapacity. He selected for his adviser the famous Sir Thomas Overbury, a man of a strong mind and considerable genius, but irascible in his nature, and afterwards rendered insolent by success. They had previously lived on terms of affection with each other. "Such," we are told, "was the warmth of their friendship, that they were inseparable. Carr could enter into no scheme, nor pursue any measure without the advice and concurrence of Overbury, nor could Overbury enjoy any felicity but in the company of him he loved; their friendship was the subject of court conversation, and their genius seemed so much alike, that it was reasonable to suppose no breach could ever be produced between them." As long as Overbury continued in favour, and his advice was followed, the king's affairs were not ill managed, and the favourite remained tolerably free from obloquy. Indeed, the incessant calls of pleasure left Somerset but little leisure for the transaction of state affairs.

The conduct of the favourite at this period was certainly discreet and even praiseworthy. He agreeably disappointed the English courtiers by exhibiting no partiality for his Scottish connections. We are told that he had but one friend and one servant of that nation. His manners also were invariably flattering and conciliating. He was civil to the scholar and liberal to the soldier. Such a line of conduct naturally rendered him popular, for mankind are easily enslaved by the attentions of the great.

Had Somerset been half as prudent in the choice of his mistress, as he had been in the selection of his friend, his lot would have been happier, and his name brighter with posterity. On the 5th of January, 1606, were married Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, the son of Elizabeth's favourite, and Frances Howard, daughter of Thomas, Earl of Suffolk; a bridegroom of fourteen to a bride of thirteen. In a letter of the period we have a curious account of the nuptial rejoicing on the occasion. "The bridegroom," says the writer, "carried himself as gravely and gracefully as if he were of his father's age. He had greater gifts given him than my lord of Montgomery had, his plate being valued at 3000*l.*, his jewels, money, and other gifts at 1000*l.* more. But to return to the mask. Both Inigo, Ben and the actors, men and women, did their parts with great commendation. The conceit, or soul of the mask, was Hymen bringing in a bride, and Juno Pronuba's priest, a bridegroom, proclaiming that those two should be sacrificed to nuptial union; and here the poet made an apostrophe to the union of the kingdoms; but before the sacrifice could be performed, Ben Jonson turned the globe of the earth, standing behind the altar, and within the concave sat the eight men maskers, representing the four humours and the four affections, who leaped forth and disturbed the sacrifice to union. But amidst their fury, Reason, that sat above them all, crowned with burning tapers, came down and silenced them. These eight, together with Reason, their moderator, mounted above their heads, sat somewhat like the ladies in the scallop-shell, the last year. About the globe of earth hovered a middle region of clouds, in the centre of which stood a grand concert of musicians, and upon the canton, or horns, sat the ladies, four at one corner and four at another, who descended upon the stage, downright perpendicular fashion, like a bucket into a well, but came gently slipping down. These eight, after the sacrifice was ended, represented the eight nuptial powers of Juno Pronuba, who came down to confirm the union. The men were clad in crimson and the women in white; they had every one a white plume of the richest herons' feathers, and were so rich in jewels upon their heads, as was most glorious. I think they hired and borrowed all the principal jewels and ropes of pearl, both in court and city. The Spanish ambassador seemed but poor to the meanest of them. They danced all variety of dances, both severally and promiscue; and then the women took in men, as namely, the prince, who danced with as great perfection, and as settled a majesty, as could be devised; the Spanish ambassador, the archduke's ambassador, the duke, &c. And the men, gleaned of the queen, the bride, and the greatest of the ladies."

After the ceremony it was thought proper to separate the youthful pair till they had arrived at riper years. The young earl was sent on his travels, while the bride remained at court with her mother, a lady whose indifferent morals rendered her totally unfit for such a charge. After an absence of nearly four years, Essex returned to England, full of natural eagerness to behold the young and beautiful creature whom he was to claim as his wife. Beautiful indeed she was, but so far was she from sharing his anxiety, that she had engaged her affections to another, and regarded with the utmost horror the prospect of passing her days with the homely Essex. Among her admirers she reckoned the favourite Somerset, and Henry the heir to the throne. The prince had been from the beginning extremely jealous of the favours which his father had heaped upon his pampered minion, and his antipathy was not diminished, when, on their becoming candidates for the favours of the same lady, his rival proved successful. Essex, discovering that his person and matrimonial claims were treated with disdain, applied to the father of his bride to prevail on her to consummate the marriage. The consequence was, that she was obliged to accompany her husband into the country, where the manner in which she nightly exhibited her disgust must have been far from flattering to her unhappy lord. Somerset had intimated to her that she would forfeit his affections, should she ever admit Essex to the privileges of a husband. The foul means which she made use of to destroy her husband's physical powers are fully detailed by Arthur Wilson. That writer's evidence is supported by the extraordinary proofs and circumstances which were afterwards adduced at her trial.

The object of the young countess was to procure a divorce, in order that she might unite herself to the idol of her affections. In 1613, her uncle, the Earl of Northampton, applied to the king to this effect, alleging a natural infirmity on the part of Essex. The cause was heard, and having been decided in the lady's favour, Somerset lost no time in making her his bride. It was while these matters were in the course of agitation, that Overbury solemnly and affectionately forewarned his friend against the ruinous course which he was so blindly pursuing. He represented the impolicy of the action, the ridicule of the world, and that when he had made her his wife the shame which was attached to her character would reflect upon himself. He spoke of the criminal intercourse which had already taken place between them, and added, that as she had already deserted a husband for his sake, she might hereafter be induced to grant the same favours to another. He even went so far as to call her a "strumpet, and her mother and brother, bawds," and to threaten that he would separate himself for ever from Somerset and his interests, should he disgrace their friendship by prosecuting so shameful an affair. Overbury was well qualified to give his advice on the occasion. He had a perfect knowledge of the lady's character, and had been employed throughout the intrigue; indeed, he had composed many exquisite letters and love-poems for Somerset, which had gone far in raising that excess of passion which afterwards led to murder and disgrace.

Somerset was weak enough to repeat to his paramour the conversation which had taken place. Her anger exceeded all bounds, and the unhappy Overbury was already devoted to destruction. After her marriage with Somerset, she easily induced her infatuated husband to sacrifice his former friend.

About this period of our history, it was almost compulsory to accept any office offered by the crown. By this means, the grossest oppression was frequently inflicted under the mask of kindness, and many a dangerous subject got rid of, under the semblance of an honourable appointment. In 1621, four of the most obnoxious members of parliament were joined in a commission, and despatched to Ireland, on the plea of important business; and two years afterwards, we find a citizen of London, who had refused to contribute to a benevolence, ordered with the charge of letters ostensibly to proceed to the same country; this person was glad to make his peace for a hundred pounds. Under similar circumstances, an embassy to Russia was offered to the devoted Overbury. Somerset, who still maintained the appearance of friendship, advised him by all means to decline the honour, promising at the same time to justify his refusal to the king. Overbury was caught in the snare, and humbly petitioned his majesty to select another representative, which Somerset interpreted to the king into gross disobedience and contempt of the royal authority; and Overbury was in consequence committed to the Tower, under directions to be more closely confined than was usual with prisoners of state.* Not only were his friends denied admittance to him, but he was even refused the attendance of one of his own servants.

Some days previously, Somerset had procured the appointment of one of his own creatures, Sir Jervis Elways, to be Lieutenant of the Tower; and now, leaguely with his abandoned wife and her uncle, the Earl of Northampton, he entered into the atrocious project of poisoning his former friend. The principal agents in this horrible transaction were Sir Thomas Monson and a man of the name of Weston, whom the former had successfully recommended to Sir Jervis Elways.

The necessary poisons were provided by the famous Mrs. Turner, and inserted by Weston in the several dishes which were conveyed to the table of their victim. A suspicion, however, of these infamous proceedings at length entered the mind of the lieutenant, who sent for Weston into his study, and so wrought upon his conscience, that he agreed to deceive his employers, and to deliver the poison into the lieutenant's hands.† Sometimes particular dishes were sent by Somerset himself: these were occasionally

* This was not the first time that Overbury had paid a visit to the Tower. The circumstances of his previous commitment are related by Goodman:—"The queen," he says, "was looking out of her window into the garden, where Somerset and Overbury were walking; and when the queen saw them, she said, 'There goes Somerset and his governor,' and a little after Overbury did laugh. The queen conceiving that he had overheard her, thought that they had laughed at her, whereupon she complained, and Overbury was committed. But when it did appear unto the queen that they did not hear her, and that their laughter did proceed from a jest which the king was pleased to use that day at dinner, then the queen was well satisfied, and he was released." It is evident, however, that Anne of Denmark had conceived a particular aversion towards Overbury's person. To the Earl of Salisbury she writes:—

My Lord,

The king hath told me that he will advise with you, and some other four or five of the Council, of that fellow. I can say no more, either to make you understand the matter or my mind, than I said the other day. Only I recommend to your care how public the matter is now, both in court and city, and how far I have reason in that respect. I refer the rest to this bearer, and myself to your love.

Bishop Goodman's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 145.

Other particulars might be inserted, which denote antipathy on the one side and insolence on the other.

† There is a somewhat different account of this interview in the "Five Years of King James," supposed to have been written by Lord Brooke. According to this authority, Sir Jervis Elways was eventually wrought upon by the arguments and entreaties of Northampton to be an active agent in Overbury's murder.—Harl. Misc. vol. v. p. 376.

given to animals, which invariably died after having devoured them. The catastrophe being thus unaccountably delayed, a suspicion was excited in the minds of his employers, that Weston was playing a double part. The countess sent for him; reviled him for his treachery; and joining one Franklin with him in the horrid work, used such arguments as induced him to enter more vigorously on his task. On this occasion, the lieutenant is said to have been kept in the dark, though, in fact, he must have been well aware of his prisoner's sickness, and ought to have been fully aware of the cause. The two ruffians cautiously administered their deadly mixtures; and at last, finding him still hold out, applied a poisoned clyster, which eventually carried him off. According to other accounts, perceiving an irruption breaking out over his body, and fearing lest the symptoms might lead to detection, they released him from his agonies by smothering him in his bed. His interment quickly followed; it being given out that he died of a loathsome disease, the nature of which prevented his body from being kept longer.

From the time of Overbury's death, Somerset became a changed man. The beauty of person, the lightness of his heart, and the conciliating civility which had formerly distinguished him, were now no longer discoverable. Amid the glare and the splendour that surrounded him, he was a sullen and melancholy being. The still small voice of conscience was ever whispering in his ear; and though possessed of the wife whom he had chosen, though the sole favourite of the sovereign, and the master of unbounded wealth, the envied Somerset became a burden to himself, and an object of dislike to a master he no longer was able to amuse.

All that James required, was a decent excuse for deserting and destroying the man whom he had once loved. They were indeed a worthy pair. The appearance of George Villiers at court, in 1614, proved the most fatal blow to the fortunes of Somerset. His enemies, among the foremost of whom was the queen herself, watched with extreme anxiety the rapid transfer of the royal affections: they saw that Somerset's reign was at an end, and began already to speculate on the character and disposition of his successor. James, naturally desirous of preserving some appearance of consistency, attempted the impracticable task of placing his old and new favourite upon a friendly footing. Sir Humphrey May, a follower of Somerset's, was entrusted by James with the conduct of this delicate affair. He could not have fixed on a more proper person. A splendid act of friendship and generosity which he afterwards performed for Sir Thomas Monson, when a prisoner and in distress, is a sufficient guarantee for his kindness of heart, and qualifications as a peace-maker. May, having introduced himself into Somerset's presence, commenced by informing him that his rival was about to visit him with proffers of service and friendship. He used what arguments he could think of to reconcile the proud earl, adding, "Your lordship, though not the sole favourite, will still be a great man." Somerset exhibited an extreme aversion to this singular arrangement. May then thought it right to acquaint him that he had come to make the overture by the king's express command. Somerset was silent, and shortly afterwards Villiers himself entered. A meeting between two such men, and under such circumstances, must indeed have been remarkable. Villiers, far different from the proud Buckingham of after life, was humility itself:—he came, he said, to be Somerset's creature and his dependent, and to gain preferment at court under his auspices: adding that he should always find him a faithful and obedient servant. The earl's reply was brief and startling,—"Sir," he said, "I require none of your services, and I shall give you none of my favour;" adding, in the most undisguised manner, that he would ruin him if it ever lay in his power.

Somerset was fully aware of his declining favour, and took his measures accordingly. Although, with the exception of an accusation that he had embezzled some of the crown jewels, nothing had openly been laid to his charge, it is probable that he had received some hint that his share in Overbury's murder was about to transpire. He therefore made the best use of his remaining influence with the king, and obtained a full and ample pardon for any and all offences which he might heretofore have committed. It is curious that the most important clause in the instrument was borrowed from a similar indulgence granted by the Pope to Cardinal Wolsey. The pardon was signed by James without hesitation; but the queen, who detested Somerset, had sufficient influence to prevent its passing the great seal until the return of the king, who was then absent in the west.

In the mean time, an apothecary's boy, who had been employed in composing the poisoned clyster, fell sick at Flushing, whither he had retired, and his conscience beginning to accuse him, he revealed all the circumstances connected with the destruction of Overbury which had come within his knowledge. James was at Royston, when Sir Ralph Winwood was despatched to him with the tale of his favourite's guilt. He instantly sent a messenger to the Lord Chief Justice, Sir Edward Coke, directing him to take measures for arresting the earl, who was that day to set out from London to join the royal party. When the officer of justice arrived at Royston, he found James with his arms round the neck of Somerset, who had arrived in the mean time, affecting to inquire anxiously, as he pressed him to his heart, how long it would be before he saw him again. Somerset was indignant at the idea of a peer being arrested in the presence of his sovereign: "Nay, man," said James, "if Coke sends for me, I must go." As soon as the earl had departed, "Now the devil go with thee," said the king, "for I will never see thy face any more." That very morning Somerset had conversed with Sir Henry Wotton respecting the prosperity of his affairs, and the brilliant course which he was still apparently destined to run: before night he was in the Tower.

The king's detestable hypocrisy and dissimulation are apparent throughout the whole of this transaction. Sir Edward Coke arriving the same day at Royston, James expressed the strongest determination to discover and punish the crime, without any respect of persons: he added, that if he pardoned any one of them, he hoped God's curse might light on him and his posterity. How far he respected this solemn imprecation, is well known; nor is it the only instance in which he provoked the wrath of Heaven by his horrible contempt of truth. On one occasion, when a report was alluded to in the Star Chamber, that he was about to grant some immunities to the papists, he protested to the lords, "that he would spend the last drop of his blood before he would do so;" and prayed that, before any of his issue should maintain any other religion than that which they truly professed, God would take them out of the world.

Somerset, on his arrival in London, was sent to the Tower, the countess having shared the same fate during his progress from Royston. Their accomplices in the murder, Sir Jervis Elways, Weston, Franklin, and Mrs. Turner, were shortly condemned and executed. Sir Thomas Monson escaped punishment under circumstances which will be presently mentioned. Another of the party, Simon Mason, a servant of Monson's, was also brought into court, on the charge of having conveyed a poisoned tart to Overbury. The judge said to him, "Simon, you had a hand in this business?"—"No, my lord," was the ready answer, "I had only a finger in it, which nearly cost me my life." In his way to the Tower, he had licked some of the syrup of the tart from his fingers, a circumstance which eventually saved him from hanging: it was argued, that he would scarcely have tasted what he knew to be poisoned.

In the meantime, Somerset remained in the Tower, his enemies satisfying themselves of his guilt and condemnation long before they had been decided by the law. By a letter dated 19th November, 1615, about six months previous to his trial, a return was ordered to be made of his effects, with a view probably to their subsequent distribution among the hungry crew, who were anxiously awaiting the final catastrophe. A selection from the inventory has been recently published among the Loseley MSS. and evinces, by the splendour of the articles, what immense sums must have been lavished on this unworthy favourite. Whether from constitutional indifference, a confidence in the king's remaining affection, or from a consciousness of his own innocence, it is certain that Somerset endured with becoming dignity the strange vicissitude in his fortunes. "The earl," writes a contemporary, "seems little to care for this aspersion, and shows no manner of change in his countenance; which is strange, seeing that by manifest proofs it is otherwise, which was delivered in public courts: but he knoweth not what is said or done abroad, being a close prisoner."

The murder of Overbury has generally been traced to the sole circumstance of his having impugned the virtue of Lady Somerset. Admitting, however, that female indignation could proceed to such lengths as murder, is it probable that Somerset would have entered so warmly into his wife's feelings, as to sacrifice for some intemperate expressions a once-loved friend, more especially when those very expressions originated solely in a regard for himself? A momentary and violent irritation may perhaps be allowed as natural; but would he have pursued his victim to the grave by a slow and merciless process of vengeance, scarcely equaled in the annals of crime? Moreover, is it probable, is it indeed possible, that Northampton, whose share in this detestable transaction is undoubted, and who was one of the coldest and most calculating men of his time, should have been influenced in the same unaccountable manner by his profligate niece? In a word, will common sense allow us to suppose, that such a man would have mixed himself up in a fearful crime, and have risked life, fortune, and reputation, merely because some unguarded words had been uttered, which he well knew to be true?

To what then, will naturally be asked, did Overbury owe his melancholy end? This needs an explanation which it is not so easy to afford, and the most that can be adduced, are some obscure and unsatisfactory conjectures. Certain it is, that Overbury was the depository of some important secrets, the discovery of which might have been fatal to the favourite, and that he was even foolish enough to threaten Somerset with a disclosure. Many a dark rumour has floated down to us respecting the mysterious death of Prince Henry, in which the names of Somerset, Northampton, and Overbury, are not omitted. Undoubtedly it was of the most vital importance, both to Somerset and Northampton, that the prince should not survive his father. Preferment was sure to cease, and ruin certain to follow. The abhorrence with which Henry regarded the Suffolk and Northampton branches of the Howards, was scarcely exceeded even by his detestation of Somerset. Besides, the mere fact of these two noblemen being capable of committing one murder, renders it less unlikely that they would have been guilty of the other. At all events, it appears far more probable that they put Overbury out of the way, to insure their own safety, than to avenge themselves on the detractor of a wife or a niece. The conduct, too, of the countess appears less infamous, if we can suppose that, to the indignation of her sex, she added a redeeming anxiety to rescue her husband from approaching ruin. With regard to the general circumstances which threw suspicion over the death of Henry, they have already been introduced in the memoir of that lamented young prince.

Unfortunately it is impossible to investigate this embarrassing affair, without, in some degree, implicating the king himself. The late Charles Fox entertained a project of inquiring into the circumstances of Somerset's crime: in a letter to Lord Lauderdale, he writes,—"I recollect that the impression upon my mind was, that there was more reason than is generally allowed for suspecting that Prince Henry was poisoned by Somerset, and that the king knew of it after the fact." This impression originated, without doubt, in Somerset's arrogance previous to his trial, as well as in the king's undisguised fear lest the earl should enter into some unpleasant details when brought before his judges. Certain it is that Somerset had a secret in his keeping, which apparently saved his own life, and kept James in an unpleasant state of trepidation. Whether, however, it was connected with the death of the prince, or whether, as Harris supposes, it was "the revealing that vice to which James seems to have been addicted," is not so easy to determine. There is a letter extant, addressed by Somerset to the king, in which he professes to pray for mercy; but it conveys less of penitence than of expostulation and defiance. Somerset throughout affected to talk as if the king dared not sentence him to death; and it is even said, that he sent a message to James by the lieutenant of the Tower, in which he threatened to reveal their secret should his pardon not be granted. Hume, in his ingenious palliation of the king's conduct, speaks confidently of "his great remains of tenderness for Somerset." This remark is so far from being borne out by facts, that James appears extremely anxious to get rid of his former favourite. Lord Bacon, who was then attorney-general, and who must have been perfectly well aware of the king's feelings with respect to Somerset, in preparing his majesty with arguments as to the probable results of the approaching trial, thus writes on the subject. "The fourth case is that which I should be very sorry should happen, but it is a future contingent; that is, if the peers should acquit him, and find him not guilty." In this case, Lord Bacon recommends that Somerset should be remanded a close prisoner to the Tower, "there being," he adds, "many high and heinous offences (though not capital) for which he may be questioned in the Star Chamber." If these "great remains of tenderness" really existed, is it likely that the politic Bacon would have expressed his hope of seeing Somerset hanged, and even recommended an unnecessary persecution in the event of his being acquitted?

According to Weldon, the criminal himself went so far, the day before the trial, as to express his determination not to appear in court, unless they dragged him there by force, and in his bed; adding, "that the king durst not bring him to trial." This menace, and the fear of disclosure, had such an effect with James, that he sent privately to Somerset, assuring him that if he behaved quietly and without insolence at his examination, his life should be spared. This promise, however, was protracted to the last moment, the king being desirous of ascertaining privately the mode of defence which it was Somerset's intention to adopt at the trial. Not only were examining commissioners appointed, who constantly interrogated the prisoner, but James was mean enough, under the mask of affection, to employ other individuals, who used their utmost endeavours to entice Somerset to a confession of his plans. Had they succeeded, Somerset, in all probability, would have died on the gallows: he had, however, either received a hint on the subject, or was cunning enough to penetrate their design. So anxious was James to discover his intended plan of defence, that he employed Lord Bacon to anticipate every possible line of conduct which the criminal might adopt. Bacon writes to Sir George Villiers:—"I have received my letter from his majesty wish his marginal notes, which shall be my directions, being glad to perceive I understand his majesty so well. That same little charm, which may be secretly infused into Somerset's ear some few hours before his trial, was excellently well thought of by his majesty, and I do approve it, both in matter and time; only, if it seem good to his majesty, I would wish it a little enlarged: for, if it be no more than to spare his blood, he hath a kind of proud humour, which may overwork the medicine. Therefore, I could wish it were made a little stronger, by giving him some hope that his majesty will be good to his lady and child; and that time (when justice, and his majesty's honour, is once saved, and satisfied) may produce further proof of his majesty's compassion."

The king's next step was to endeavour to entice Somerset to a confession, asserting that it would afford him a more favourable opportunity of exercising the royal prerogative of mercy: Somerset, however, was too guarded to be caught in the snare. The examining commissioners, who were fully aware of the king's anxiety on this point, thus report to his majesty:—"Not to trouble your majesty with circumstances of his answers, the sequel was no other, but that we found him still, not to come any degree further on to confess; only his behaviour was very sober, and modest, and mild, (differing apparently from other times;) but yet, as it seemed, resolved to expect his trial." The commissioners afterwards proceed:—"We have done our best endeavours to perform your majesty's commission both in matter and manner, for the examination of my lord of Somerset, wherein that which passed (for the general) was to this effect, that he was to know his own case, for that his day of trial could not be far off; but that this day's work was that which would conduce to your majesty's injustice little or nothing, but to your mercy much, if he did lay hold upon it, and therefore might do him good, but could do him no hurt; for as to your justice, there had been taken great and grave opinion, not only of such judges as he may think violent, but of the saddest and most temperate in the kingdom, who ought to understand the state of the proofs, that the evidence was full to convict him, so as there needed neither confession, nor supply of examination. But for your majesty's mercy, (although he were not to expect we should make any promise,) we did assure him that your majesty was compassionate of him, if he gave you some ground whereon to work; that as long as he stood upon his innocency and trial, your majesty was tied in honour to proceed according to justice, and that he little understood (being a close prisoner) how much the expectation of the world, besides your love to justice itself, engaged your majesty, whatsoever your inclination were; but nevertheless, that a frank and clear confession might open the gate of mercy, and help to satisfy the point of honour."

But that which has tended to throw a great additional light on these mysterious circumstances, is the existence of some remarkably curious letters, which have recently been published in a collection of the Loseley MSS. The editor informs us that they were discovered carefully preserved in an envelope, on which, in a handwriting of the period, was a long note, part of which is as follows:—"These four letters were all of King James his own hand wryghtinge, sent to Sir John More, Liftennant of the Tower (being put in to that place by his own apoyntment, without the privitie of any man) concerning my Lorde of Somersett, whoe beinge in the Tower, and heringe that he should come to his arrayngment, began to speak big wordes touching on the king's reputation and honour. The king, therefore, desired, as much as he could, to make him confess the poysoninge of Sir Thomas Overberry, and so not to his arrayngment, but to cast himself on his mercy. But being a courtiour, and beaten to these courses, would not; fully imagining that the king durst not, or would not bryng him to his tryall," &c. And in another part of the envelope were added these words,—"Sir George More's my ffather in lawe's legacie, who in his lifetime made much account of these letters, being every word King James his own wryghtinge."

Sir George More, besides having been honoured with these confidential letters, had certainly one personal communication, if not more, with the king; and appears to have been not a little instrumental in dissuading Somerset from breaking out into invectives, or disclosing any unpleasant secrets, at his trial; it is asserted, moreover, that Sir George obtained 1500*l.* a year for his management of this mysterious affair. What renders these letters principally curious, is the manner in which they confirm the supposition that Somerset was really the master of secrets, which it was most important to James should be kept at all hazards from the public. To prevent the possibility of such a catastrophe, it appears that James adopted the nicest precautions, and used every exertion in his power. He appoints one of his own confidants to be Somerset's keeper; he will not even employ a secretary in the correspondence which takes place between the lieutenant and himself; he first endeavours to inveigle Somerset into a confession, and to induce him, by throwing himself on the royal mercy, to avoid a trial; and then, finding this manœuvre fail, he attempts to persuade the world that the earl is a lunatic. The first two letters, above alluded to, have reference principally to the king's most ardent wish, that Somerset should anticipate his trial by an admission of his offence. They evince also his great anxiety that Sir George should preserve their correspondence a profound secret. "Without the knowledge of any," writes James, "I have put you in that place of trust which you now possess, so must I now use your trust and secrecy in a thing greatly concerning my honour and service." And in the next letter he adds, "You must not let him know that I have written unto you, but only that I sent you private word to deliver him this message:—Let none living know of this." The two last and most remarkable letters are as follow:

"Goode Sir George,

"I am extremely sorry that your unfortunate prisoner turns all the great care I have for him, not only against himself, but against me also, as far as he can. I cannot blame you, that you cannot conjecture what this may be, for God knows it is only a trikke of his idle braine, hopping thairby to shift his tryall; but it is easie to be seen that he wolde threatin me with laying an aspersion upon me of being in some sort accessorie to his crime, I can do no more (since God so abstracts his grace from him), than repeat the substance of that letter which Lord Haye sent you yesternighte, which is this: if he wolde write or send me any message concerning this poisoning, it needs not be private; if it be of any other business, that which I cannot now with honoure receive privately, I may do it after his tryall, and serve the turne as well, for except either his tryall or confession precede, I cannot have a private message from him, without laying an aspersion on myselfe of being an accessorie to his cryme, and I praye you to urge him by reason, that I refuse him no favoure which I can graunte him, without taking upon me the suspicion of being guiltie of that cryme whereof he is accused, and so farewell,

"JAMES R."

"Good Sir George,

"For answers to your straunge newis, I am first to tell you, that I expecte the Lord Haye and Sir Robert Carr have been with you before this tyme, which if thaye have not yett bene doe ye sende for them in haste that they may first heare him, before ye saye any thing unto him, and when that is done, if he shall still refuse to goe, [to trial], ye must do your office, except he be either apparently sick or distracted of his wittes, in any of which cacies ye may acquaint the Chancellaire with it, that he may adorne the day till Mondaye nexte, betwene and which time, if his sicknesse or madnesse be counterfitted, it will manifestlie appeare. In the mean tyme, I doubt not but that ye have acquainted the Chancellair with this strange fitte of his, and if upon these occasions ye bring him a little laiter than the houre appointed, the Chancellaire may in the mean tyme protracte the tyme the best he maye, whom I praye you to acquaint like wayes with this my ansoure, as well as with the accident, if he have saide any thinge of moment to the Lord Haye, I expecte to hear of it with all speed; if other way, let me not be troubled with it till the tryall be past. Fairwell.

"JAMES R."

Subscribed in another hand,

"To o' trustie and weel beloved Sir George More, knight, o' levetenant of o' Towre of London."

It was very doubtful, before the trial, whether the crown had sufficient evidence to insure Somerset's conviction; indeed he was merely found guilty on the ground of some expressions which were discovered in a letter of his to Northampton; and yet James would not only force him to confess a crime, of which he might possibly have been guiltless, but proceeds to such lengths to obtain this object, as to endeavour to induce Sir George More to be guilty of something very like a falsehood on the occasion. In one of his letters, the king writes to the lieutenant,—"Ye will doe well of yourselfe to caste out unto him, that ye feare his wyfe shall plead weaklie for his innocence; and that ye find the commissioners have, ye know not how, some secrete assurance that in the ende she will confesse of him; but this must onlie be as from yourselfe;" surely this has every appearance of invention. It may be remarked that Lord Bacon, in embracing the different accidents which might occur at the trial, thus writes to the king:—"The second case is, if that fall out, (which is likest as things stand, and as we expect), which is that the lady confess, and that Somerset plead not guilty, and be found guilty." Lord Bacon was right in both conjectures; the countess, however, though she confessed her own crime, in no way implicated her husband.

Another circumstance, which throws suspicion on James, was the liberation of Sir Thomas Monson, who was to have been tried as an accomplice in Overbury's murder, but escaped after his arraignment. Coke, the lord chief justice, was rash enough to observe, "That more would come out at his trial than the death of a private individual." He is even said to have exclaimed on the bench, "God knows what became of that sweet babe Prince Henry, but I know somewhat." Certain it is that James took fright; that Monson obtained his liberty, and that Coke was disgraced.

Somerset was brought to trial in Westminster Hall, May 25, 1616. During the whole of the day James is described as being in a painful state of agitation,—"sending to every boat he perceived landing at Whitehall, and cursing all that came without tidings." When word was at length brought him that the earl was condemned, his agitation ceased. "This," Weldon says, "he had from Sir George More's own mouth." Somerset is described as being dressed on the occasion in "a plain black satin suit, his hair curled, his face pale, his beard long, and his eyes sunk in his head." He was also decorated with the George and Garter. Weldon asserts, that two persons were placed behind him at his trial, whose instructions were to throw a cloak over his face, and carry him off, should he exhibit the slightest intention of implicating the king. He pleaded innocent; but the peers finding him guilty, he was sentenced to be carried to the Tower, and from thence to the place of execution, where he was to be hanged like a common criminal.

Somerset, with his countess, received at different periods several reprieves. By an order in council, dated 18th January, 1622, they were finally liberated from confinement, though their lives were merely respited at the king's pleasure:

it was also stipulated that they should reside in the country; one of Lord Wallingford's two seats in Oxfordshire (Grays and Caversham) being allowed them for choice. The order for their release is as follows:—

Anno Dom. 1621. An. Reg. Jac. 19. An Order of the Privy Council, Whitehall, 18th January, 1622.

Present.—Lord Keeper, Lord Treasurer, Lord President, L. M. Hamilton, Earl Marshal, L. Visc. Falkland, Lord Digby, Lord Brook, Mr. Treasurer, Mr. Sec. Calvert, Mr. Chanc. Excheq., Master of the Rolls.

Whereas, his majesty is graciously pleased to enlarge and set at liberty the Earl of Somerset and his lady, now prisoners in the Tower of London; and that, nevertheless, it is thought fit that both the said earl and his lady be confined to some convenient place: It is therefore, according to his majesty's gracious pleasure and command, ordered, that the Earl of Somerset and his lady do repair either to Grays or Cowsham [Caversham], Lord Wallingford's houses in the county of Oxon, and remain confined to one or either of the said houses, and within three miles' compass of the same, until further order be given by his majesty.

At last, in 1624, about four months previous to the king's death, notwithstanding his majesty's former solemn asseveration, they received a full pardon for their crime. In the reign of Charles the First, Somerset petitioned, though unsuccessfully, for the restoration of his estates. The guilty pair resided together in a private and almost obscure condition. Their former passionate love was converted into abhorrence; and though inmates of the same house, they lived entirely separate and estranged.

James, whether from pity or some other cause, allowed his former favourite 4000*l.* a year. Somerset was compelled, however, till he received his pardon, to hold the rents, which produced this income, in his servant's name; the law excluding him, as a condemned person, from being the ostensible possessor.

Somerset is said to have been assured by a fortune-teller, that if he should ever see the king's face again, he would certainly be reinstated in his former greatness. According to Arthur Wilson, James, in the latter part of his life, occasionally paid him a visit in his retreat. Bishop Burnet inform us, that when the king grew weary of Buckingham's insolence and contemptuous manner, he had serious intentions of supplying his place with his old favourite. He adds, that their first meeting was in the gardens at Theobalds, where the king embraced Somerset tenderly, and shed many tears. "Somerset," adds Burnet, "told this to some from whom I had it."

It is remarkable that the great and virtuous Lord Russell was the grandson of Somerset and his abandoned countess. The result of their ill-timed union was an only daughter, Anne, who became the wife of William Russell, Earl of Bedford, created a duke in 1694. There is something interesting in her history. The union took place in the lifetime of the old Earl of Bedford, who had been in the habit of saying to his son, "Marry whom you will but a daughter of Somerset." Unfortunately, however, they met at court, and the son falling passionately in love with her, expressed his determination never to marry another. The earl professed the greatest abhorrence at the idea of the match, and probably might never have relented but for the interference of Charles the First in favour of the lovers. The king's share in overcoming his prejudices, is alluded to in a letter of the period. Mr. Garrard writes to the Earl of Strafford, 5th April, 1636, "The king lately sent the Duke of Lennox to my lord of Bedford, to move him to give way to the marriage between my Lord Russell and the Lady Anne Carr, daughter to the Earl of Somerset, which he should take well at his hands. The love between them hath been long taken notice of, though discreetly and closely carried for his father gave him, as I take it, leave and liberty to choose in any family but in that: but marriages are made in heaven."

The old earl at length gave a reluctant consent; and in 1637 they were married. He had no reason to regret his having relented. Some time afterwards he was seized with the small-pox; and though deserted by his own children, the lady Anne remained with him and nursed him like a daughter. She caught the disorder and lost her beauty. It is said, that after she grew up, she discovered the account of her parents' infamy in a book; but that she was happily so ignorant of the facts, as to look upon them as mere calumnies.* She died in 1684, aged sixty-three.

This account of his daughter enables us to relate a redeeming trait in the character of Somerset. Among other expedients which had been adopted by the old Lord Bedford to prevent his son's marriage, he had insisted on the sum of twelve thousand pounds being deposited as the marriage portion of Anne Carr. It was an immense sum to Somerset, who possessed little except his residence at Chiswick. However, he sold house, plate, and jewels, in order to make up the amount. "Since her affections are settled," he said, "I would ruin myself rather than make her unhappy." Such an action goes far to redeem the name of Somerset from utter obliquy, and for the credit of human nature should not remain untold. How truly has it been said by the poet,—

None are all evil,—quickenings round the heart,
Some softer feeling will not quite depart!

The curse of Somerset was his choice of a wife. We are assured that by nature he was of a "mild and affable disposition," and might have been a good man if he had not met with such a woman. Wilson says of his person that he was "rather compact than tall; his features and favour comely and handsome rather than beautiful; the hair of his head flaxen; that of his face tinged with yellow of the Sycambrian colour." Weldon speaks of him as "handsome and well-bred;" and even asserts that, previously to his elevation, he had passed his time in study, and in the society of eminent men. He must have been nearly sixty at the time of his death,† which took place in July, 1645. His remains were interred in the parish church of St. Paul's, Covent Garden.

* There is, however, another account, that when she met with the passage respecting the guilt of her parents, she fell down in a fit, and was discovered senseless, with the book before her. There is a half-length picture of her at Woburn, by Vandyke, in which she is painted dressed in blue, drawing on her gloves. Pennant's Journey from Chester to London, p. 494.

† His birth is commonly fixed in 1588, which would make him in his fifty-eighth year at the time of his decease, and only twenty-one at his first appearance at court.

Saturday, 26th August.

the hemp manufactory, with their wives and daughters—all people of high standing in the world—occasionally honoured his table with their presence; and how could he be other than ashamed of mine? It vexes me that I cannot even yet be cool on the subject; it vexes me that a creature so sordid, should have the power so much to move me; but I cannot—I cannot master my feelings. He—he told me—and with whom should the blame rest, but with the weak, spiritless thing who lingered out in mean, bitter dependence, to hear what he had to tell?—he told me that all his friends were respectable, and that my appearance was no longer that of a person whom he could wish to see at his table, or introduce to any one as his nephew. And I had staid to hear all this!

“I can hardly tell you how I got home. I traveled stage after stage, along the rough dusty roads, with a weak and feverish body, and almost despairing mind. On meeting with my mother, I could have laid my head on her bosom and cried like a child. I took to my bed in a high fever, and trusted that all my troubles were soon to terminate; but, when the die was cast, it turned up life. I resumed my old miserable employments—for what could I else?—and, that I might be less unhappy in the prosecution of them, my old amusements too. I copied, during the day, in a clerk’s office, that I might live, and wrote, during the night, that I might be known. And I have, in part, perhaps, attained my object. I have pursued and caught hold of the shadow on which my heart had been so long set; and if it prove empty, and untangible, and unsatisfactory, like every other shadow, the blame surely must rest with the pursuer, not with the thing pursued. I weary you, Mr. Lindsay; but one word more. There are hours when the mind, weakened by exertion, or by the teasing monotony of an employment which tasks without exercising it, can no longer exert its powers, and when, feeling that sociality is a law of our nature, we seek the society of our fellow men. With a creature so much the sport of impulse as I am, it is of these hours of weakness that conscience takes most note. God help me! I have been told that life is short; but it stretches on, and on, and on before me; and I know not how it is to be passed through.”

My spirits had so sunk during this singular conversation, that I had no heart to reply.

“You are silent, Mr. Lindsay,” said the poet; “I have made you as melancholy as myself; but look round you, and say if you have ever seen a lovelier spot. See how richly the yellow sunshine slants along the green sides of Arthur’s Seat, and how the thin blue smoke, that has come floating from the town, fills the bottom of yonder grassy dell, as if it were a little lake. Mark, too, how boldly the cliffs stand out along its sides, each with its little patch of shadow. And here, beside us, is St. Anthony’s Well, so famous in song, coming gushing out to the sunshine, and then gliding away through the grass, like a snake. Had the Deity purposed that man should be miserable, he would surely never have placed him in so fair a world. Perhaps much of our unhappiness originates in our mistaking our proper scope, and thus setting out, from the first, with a false aim.”

“Unquestionably,” I replied, “there is no man who has not some part to perform; and, if it be a great and uncommon part, and the powers which fit him for it proportionably great and uncommon, nature would be in error could he slight it with impunity. See, there is a wild bee bending the flower beside you. Even that little creature has a capacity of happiness and misery; it derives its sense of pleasure from whatever runs in the line of its instincts—its experience of unhappiness, from whatever thwarts and opposes them; and can it be supposed that so wise a law should regulate the instincts of only inferior creatures? No, my friend, it is surely a law of our nature also.”

“And have you not something else to infer?” said the poet.

“Yes,” I replied, “that you are occupied differently from what the scope and constitution of your mind demand; differently both in your hours of employment and of relaxation. But do take heart—you will yet find your proper place, and all shall be well.”

“Alas! no, my friend,” said he, rising from the sward. “I could once entertain such a hope; but I cannot now. My mind is no longer what it was to me in my happier days—a sort of terra incognita, without bounds or limits. I can see over and beyond it, and have fallen from all my hopes regarding it. It is not so much the gloom of present circumstances that disheartens me, as a depressing knowledge of myself—an abiding conviction that I am a weak dreamer, unfitted for every occupation of life—and not less for the greater employments of literature than for any of the others. I feel that I am a little man, and a little poet, with barely vigour enough to make one half effort at a time; but wholly devoid of the sustaining will—that highest faculty of the highest order of minds—which can direct a thousand vigorous efforts to the accomplishment of one important object. Would that I could exchange my half celebrity—and it can never be other than a half celebrity—for a temper as equable, and a fortitude as unshrinking as yours! But I weary you with my complaints: I am a very coward; and you will deem me as selfish as I am weak.”

We parted. The poet, sadly and unwillingly, went to copy deeds in the office of the commissary clerk; and I, almost reconciled to obscurity and hard labour, to assist in unlading a Baltic trader in the harbour of Leith.

JAMES SMITH.

Carey & Hart have just published “Memoirs, Letters, and Comic Miscellanies, in Prose and Verse, of the late James Smith, Esq., edited by his brother, Horace Smith, Esq., 2 vols.”

James Smith has been known as a writer of small but clever pieces, in prose and verse, for the last forty years; and, with his brother, Horace, has filled a considerable place in the light and fugitive English literature. Besides the “Rejected Addresses,” he wrote, better than any one else, addresses to “Mummies” and “Old Clocks,” and clever nonsense for Mathews. He did not dull the edge of his wit by too much use, and seems to have lived and died every one’s favourite. There are pretty praises of him by Lord Byron and other cotemporaries. The present “Collection” has several poetical pieces which we do not remember having seen before. The prose sketches are comic, but not of great merit. His letters are by far the best of the book. The following is a good enough specimen of his epistolary manner, and interesting on account of the persons of whom it speaks.

My dear Mrs. Holme,

The interest that I take in the welfare of you and yours has caused me to receive the communication in your last letter with sincere pleasure. The philosophical book on the mind by Combe I have sent to Lady —, but will bring it you on Friday se’night, the 6th of September. Turn minutes to seconds, as some lyric poet requests of Time, that the period may sooner arrive. I dined yesterday at — House, where the Countess Guiccioli is on a visit. She is much improved in her English. When we rejoined the ladies in the drawing-room, coffee was introduced, and several little tottering daddy long-legs tables were set out whereon to deposit our cups. I and Madame G. had a table between us. I then ventured to touch upon Lord Byron. The subject evidently interested her. I repeated several passages from his “Childe Harold,” with which she seemed quite familiar. She then asked me to give her some of my imitations of him from the “Rejected Addresses.” These she did not seem quite so well to comprehend. I told her all I knew of him before he went abroad, to which, like Desdemona, “she did seriously incline.” Bysshe Shelley she denominates a good man. Leigh Hunt’s name she pronounces Leg Hunte. With tears in her eyes she then despatched upon the merits and failings of the departed. When any sudden pause took place in the conversation at the other tables, she, evidently not wishing to be overheard, said “Bai an bai,” (by-and-by), and when the general buzz recommenced, she resumed the thread of her narrative. Shelley “disliked his Don Juan,” said I, “and begged him to leave it off, calling it a Grub street poem.” “A what?—what you mean by Grub street?” I then explained to her the locality of that venerable haunt of the muses in the days of Pope and Swift, by a quotation from myself,—

“A spot near Cripplegate extends,

Grub street ’tis called, (the modern Pindus),

Where (but that bards are never friends)

Bards might shake hands from adverse windows.”

“When he dined with me,” the countess continued, “he ate no meat. Still haunted by a dread of growing fat, he very much injured his own health; yet his figure, notwithstanding, grew larger. Oh! he was very handsome! Beautiful eyes and eyelashes!—and such a spiritual expression of countenance! I had occasion to go to Ravenna on some family business. We settled that he should not accompany me. At that time several people were plaguing him to go to Greece. ‘Ah,’ he said, in his sportive manner, ‘let fourteen captains come and ask me to go, and go I will.’ Well, fourteen captains came to him and said, ‘Here we are, will you now go?’ He was ashamed to say he had only been joking, (you know how fond he was of saying things in that light, joking sort of a way,) so it ended in his undertaking to go. He said to me, ‘While you are at Ravenna, I will go to Greece, and we shall meet again when we both return.’ God, however, disposed of it otherwise. He was not well when he set out. In Greece they wanted to bleed him; he would not be bled, and so he died.” The countess paused, evidently much affected. I said nothing for a minute or two. I then observed that I had read and heard much upon the subject she had been discussing, but that I did not know how she and Lord Byron first became acquainted. She looked at me a moment, as if wondering at my audacity, and then said, with a good-humoured smile, "Well, I will tell you. I was one day—" But here the drawing-room door opened, and some Frenchman with a foreign order was announced. The lady repeated her "Bai an bai" sotto voce, but unfortunately that bai an bai never arrived. The foreigner, unluckily, knew the countess; he, therefore, planted himself in a chair behind the countess, and held her ever and anon in a commonplace kind of conversation during the remainder of the evening.

Count D'Orsay set me down in Craven street. "What was all that Madame Guiccioli was saying to you just now?" he inquired. She was telling me her apartments are in the Rue de Rivoli, and that if I visited the French capital, she hoped I would not forget her address." "What, it took her all that time to say that? Ah, Smeeth, you old humbug! that won't do."

Believe me to remain,
Sincerely yours,
JAMES SMITH.

EIGHTEEN AND GRAY HAIR?

OR, LOVE'S LABOUR LOST!—A PETITE HISTOIRE.

After an absence of two years spent in travelling, I saw her again at the theatre. She was the attraction of the whole house; all eyes in the pit were fixed upon her; and I, after one, could scarcely venture on a second glance: at length I summoned resolution; obtained a full view of of her; but how was I horror-struck. The reason of the general observation her entrance caused was now apparent; a cold shivering came over me; my knees trembled.

Poor, unhappy Henrietta! I sighed, as I convulsively bit my lips. One of my neighbours, perceiving my emotion, touched me with his elbow, and said, "Do you observe that young lady in the centre box—the first row. Is it not surprising that so young a creature should have white hair?" "And with such sparkling black eyes, too!" remarked another; "what a thousand pities!" "If a writer of romance were here," said a third, "this beautiful monster would furnish materials for an excellent ballad, something à la Heine, at which we know not whether to laugh or cry. Black eyes and white locks; our attraction and abhorrence; a true and lively picture of the literature of the day!" I could have annihilated the impertinent puppies.

At last the curtain rose; what was acted God knows. The audience laughed. I ground my teeth in agony. I several times thought of making a bolt for the door; but an irresistible power chained me to the spot where my devoted victim presented herself. Cold drops stood upon my brow; but I remained. The play was over, and my tormentors commenced talking of the young girl with the gray hair.

"For my part," said one, "I think it not unlikely that this poor thing in some lonely walk at night stumbled upon a ghost. Have you read the 'Scherin von Prevorst,' by Korner—"

"He is a poet and a Swabian," interrupted a person at my back. "Trust me, there are no such creations as ghosts and seeresses; I am a physician, and can explain to you how it happens that nature produces on certain qualities of the hair certain effects."

"Ah! you are a doctor, are you?" remarked a new speaker; "come, come, expound it all to us ex cathedra. The hair of a young girl cannot change its colour without some very extraordinary cause. She must have been subject to some terrible calamity, some shock. Perhaps her husband was murdered in her arms; or she dropped her child as she was dancing it at a window and dashed its brains out on the pavement."

"Excuse me, gentlemen, your conjectures all fall to the ground," said the doctor, in an authoritative tone; "can't you at once perceive that this charming creature is not a mother; perhaps unmarried."

"How old may the poor thing be?" inquired one.

"Sixteen," replied another.

"Eighteen!" exclaimed I, scarce knowing what I was saying.

"What! you are acquainted with her, then?" exclaimed all in a breath.

I made no reply.

"He surely must be able to tell us something about her," doggedly remarked one of the party. "I shrewdly guess that this young maiden owes her white hair to some cross in love, some—"

In a paroxysm of despair I seized the hand of the last speaker. "Hold, sir; spare me; I am a wretch—a perjured villain."

What effect this outburst of my anguish, this involuntary confession of my wrongs to Henrietta—wrong from me by a guilty conscience—produced on my auditors, may well be imagined; but luckily for me, at this moment, the orchestra let loose its thunder; all that noise and fury signifying nothing, that characterises modern music; and the curtain rose again. But what fictitious sorrows; what love, treachery, despair, could vie with mine? My remorseless memory pictured, in colours too true and faithful, how she had vowed to me her innocent, weak heart, and its dawning affections; how I had sworn to be eternally hers; to adore her whom I had so shamefully forgotten and forsaken. Alas! I now, too late, perceived that I had poisoned all the springs of life and happiness: that the Henrietta whom I had left so blooming, so confiding and happy, was now, with white hair and a broken heart, sinking fast into the grave. "Miserable wretch!" I ejaculated, "is it too late to redeem the past?" A thought flashed across the darkness of my mind—too late—no, perhaps your repentance may make all well again. The mighty power of love—I will throw myself at her feet—will—

My resolve was made—the performance was nearly at an end—I rushed out of the pit. Some one seized me by the hand; "Gustavus!"

"Felix! you here! Have you seen her," I abruptly inquired.

"Her! who?"

"Henrietta."

"I left her only a few minutes ago. You find her much altered, eh?"

"Felix, I am a monster of iniquity!"

"What!" said he laughing, "were you the sly rogue, the charlatan?"

"Charlatan! what mean you?"

"You must know that Henrietta, scarcely a month since, bought of an itinerant vender of pomatum, a substance for making the hair grow. She had scarcely used it twice before her hair became as gray as you now see it."

"Pomatum; it was not love then,"—the word died on my lips.

"Love!" replied Felix, with surprise, "God be praised, no. We have been married eighteen months, and are the happiest couple in the universe. Whether my wife's hair be black or gray is to me a matter of indifference."

"Eighteen months!—your wife!—and I—"
Alas! 'twas but the penalty that my inconsistency so well merited. Take heed, ye of both sexes who possess that inestimable gift—another's love. Never trifle with it as I have done!

JOHN HAMBLEN.

He was a gentleman of a good family in Buckinghamshire, and born to a fair fortune, and of a most civil and affable deportment. In his entrance into the world, he indulged to himself all the licence in sports and exercises, and company, which were usual by men of the most jolly conversation. Afterwards, he retired to a more reserved and melancholy society, yet preserving his own natural cheerfulness and vivacity, and above all a flowing courtesy to all men; though they who conversed nearly with him, found him growing into a dislike of the ecclesiastical government of the church, yet most believed it rather a dislike of some churchmen, and of some introductions of theirs, which he apprehended might disquiet the public peace. He was rather of reputation in his own country, than of public discourse, or fame in the kingdom, before the business of ship-money; but then he grew the argument of all tongues, every man enquiring who and what he was, that durst, at his own charge, support the liberty and property of the kingdom; and rescue his country, as he thought, from being made a prey to the court. His carriage throughout this agitation, was with that rare temper and modesty, that they who watched him narrowly to find some advantage against his person, to make him less resolute in his cause, were compelled to give him a just testimony. And the judgment that was given against him, infinitely more advanced him than the service for which it was given. When this Parliament begun (being returned Knight of the Shire for the county in which he lived,) the eyes of all men were fixed upon him, as their Patrie Pater, and the pilot that must steer the vessel through the tempests and rocks which threatened it. And, I am persuaded, his power and interest at that time, was greater to do good or hurt, than any man's in the kingdom, or than any man of his rank hath had in any time; for his reputation of honesty was universal, and his affections seemed so publicly guided, that no corrupt or private ends could bias them.

He was of that rare affability and temper in debate, and of that seeming humility and submission of judgment, as if he brought no opinion of his own with him, but a desire of information and instruction; yet he had so subtle a way of interrogating, and under the notion of doubts, insinuating his objections, that he infused his own opinions into those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them. And even with them who were able to preserve themselves from his insinuations, and discerned those opinions to be fixed in him, with which they could not comply, he always left the character of an ingenuous and conscientious person. He was indeed a very wise man, and of great parts, and possessed with the most absolute spirit of popularity, and the most absolute faculties to govern the people, of any man I ever knew. For the first year of the Parliament, he seemed rather to moderate and soften the violent and distempered humours than to inflame them. But wise and dispassioned men plainly discerned that that moderation proceeded from prudence and observation that the season was not ripe, rather than that he approved of the moderation; and that he begot many opinions and motions, the education whereof he committed to other men; so far disguising his own designs, that he seemed seldom to wish more than was concluded; and in many gross conclusions, which would hereafter contribute to designs not yet set on foot, when he found them sufficiently backed by a majority of voices, he would withdraw himself before the question, that he might seem not to consent to so much visible unreasonableness; which produced a great doubt in some, as it did approbation in others, of his integrity. What combination soever had been originally with the Scots for the invasion of England, and what further was entered into afterwards in favor of them, and to advance any alteration of the government, in Parliament, no man doubts was at least with the privacy of this gentleman.

After he was among those members accused by the king of high treason, he was much altered, his nature and carriage seeming much fiercer than it did before. And without question, when he first drew his sword, he threw away the scabbard; for he passionately opposed the overtures made by the king, for a treaty from Nottingham, and as eminently all expedients that might have produced any accommodation in this that was at Oxford; and was principally relied on to prevent any infusions which might be made into the Earl of Essex toward peace, or to render them ineffectual, if they were made; and was indeed much more relied on by that party, than the general himself. In the first entrance into the troubles he undertook the command of a regiment of foot, and performed the duty of a colonel, upon all occasions, most punctually. He was very temperate in diet, and a supreme governor over all his passions and affections, and had thereby a great power over other men. He was of an industry and vigilance not to be tired out, or wearied by the most labourous; and of parts not to be imposed upon by the most subtle or sharp; and of a personal courage equal to his best parts; so that he was an enemy not to be wished whenever he might have been made a friend; and as much to be apprehended where he was so, as any man could deserve to be. And therefore his death was no less pleasing to one party, than it was condoled in the other. In a word, what was said of Cinna, might well be applied to him; "he had a head to contrive, and a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any mischief."—Clarendon.

TURENNE.

The great Turenne was killed, July 27, 1675, by a cannon shot, near the village of Saltzbuch, in going to choose a place whereon to erect a battery. "No one," says Voltaire, "is ignorant of the circumstances of his death; but we cannot here refrain a review of the principal of them, for the same reason that they are still talked of every day. It seems as if one could not too often repeat, that the same bullet which killed him, having shot off the arm of St. Hilaire, lieutenant general of the artillery, his son came and bewailed his misfortune with many tears; but the father, looking towards Turenne, said, 'It is not I, but that great man who should be lamented.' The words may be compared to the most heroic sayings recorded in all history, and are the best eulogy that can be bestowed upon Turenne. It is uncommon, under a despotic government, where people are actuated only by their private interests, for those who have served their country to die regretted by the public. Nevertheless, Turenne was lamented both by the soldiers and people; and Louvois was the only one who rejoiced at his death. The honours which the king ordered to be paid to his memory are known to every one; and that he was interred at St. Iyres, in the same manner as the Constable du Guesclin, above whom he was elevated by the voice of the public, as much as the age of Turenne was superior to the age of the constable."—De Grammont.

CONDE.

Of the great Prince of Condé, Cardinal de Retz says, "He was born a general, which never happened but to Cæsar, to Spinola, and to himself. He has equaled the first; he has surpassed the second. Intrepidity is one of the least shining strokes in his character. Nature had formed him with a mind as great as his courage. Fortune, in setting him out in a time of wars, has given this last a full extent to work in. His birth, or rather his education, in a family devoted and enslaved to the court, has kept the first within too strait bounds. He was not taught time enough the great and general maxims which alone are able to form men to think consistently. He never had time to learn them of himself, because he was promoted from his youth, by the great affairs that fell unexpectedly to his share, and by the continual success he met with. This defect in him was the cause, that with the soul in the world the least inclined to evil, he has committed injuries; that, with the heart of an Alexander, he has, like him, had his failings; that with a wonderful understanding, he has acted imprudently; that, having all the qualities of the Duke Henry of Guise, he has not carried faction so far as he might. He could not come up to the height of his merit; which, though it be a defect, must yet be owned to be very uncommon, and only to be found in persons of the greatest abilities."—Memoirs, vol. i. p. 248.

He passed the remainder of his days, tormented with the gout, relieving the severity of his pains, and employing the leisure of his retreat in the conversation of men of genius of all kinds, with which France then abounded. He was worthy of their conversation, as he was not unacquainted with any of those arts and sciences in which they shone. He continued to be admired in his retreat; but, at last, that devouring fire which, in his youth, had made him a hero, impetuous, and full of passions, having consumed the strength of his body, which was naturally rather agile than robust, he declined before his time. The strength of his mind decaying with that of his body, there remained nothing of the great Condé during the last two years of his life. He died in 1686.—Voltaire.

FERGUSON.

O thou, my elder brother in misfortune,
By far my elder brother in the moon,
With tears I pity thy unhappy fate!—Bruna.

I returned to the vessel with a heavy heart; and it was nearly three months from this time, ere I again set foot in Edinburgh. Alas! for my unfortunate friend! He was now an inmate of the asylum, and on the verge of dissolution.

The asylum in which my unfortunate friend was confined, at this time the only one in Edinburgh, was situated in an angle of the city wall. It was a dismal-looking mansion, shut in on every side, by the neighbouring houses, from the view of the surrounding country; and so effectually covered up from the nearer street, by a large building in front, that it seemed possible enough to pass a lifetime in Edinburgh without coming to the knowledge of its existence. I shuddered as I looked up to its blackened walls, thinly sprinkled with miserable looking windows, barred with iron, and thought of it as a sort of burial-place of dead minds. But it was a Golgotha, which, with more than the horrors of the grave, had neither its rest nor its silence. I was startled, as I entered the cell of the hapless poet, by a shout of laughter from a neighbouring room, which was answered from a dark recess behind me, by a fearfully prolonged shriek, and the clanking of chains. The mother and sister of Ferguson were sitting beside his pallet, on a sort of stone settle, which stood out from the wall; and the poet himself, weak, and exhausted, and worn to a shadow, but apparently in his right mind, lay extended on the straw. He made an attempt to rise as I entered; but the effort was above his strength, and, again laying down, he extended his hand.

"This is kind, Mr. Lindsay," he said; "it is ill for me to be alone in these days; and yet I have few visitors, save my poor old mother and Margaret. But who cares for the unhappy?"

I sat down on the settle beside him, still retaining his hand. "I have been at sea, and in foreign countries," I said, "since I last saw you, Mr. Ferguson, and it was only this morning I returned; but believe me there are many, many of your countrymen, who sympathise sincerely in your affliction, and take a warm interest in your recovery."

He sighed deeply: "Ah," he replied, "I know too well the nature of that sympathy. You never find it at the bedside of the sufferer—it evaporates in a few barren expressions of idle pity; and yet, after all, it is but a paying the poet in kind. He calls so often on the world to sympathise over fictitious misfortune, that the feeling wears out, and becomes a mere mood of the imagination; and, with this light, attenuated pity of his own weaving, it regards his own real sorrows. Dearest mother, the evening is damp and chill—do gather the bed-clothes round me, and sit on my feet; they are so very cold and so dead, that they cannot be colder a week hence."

"O Robert, why do you speak so?" said the poor woman, as she gathered the clothes round him, and sat on his feet. "You know you are coming home to-morrow."

"To-morrow!" he said—"if I see to-morrow, I shall have completed my twenty-fourth year—a small part, surely, of the three score and ten; but what matters it when 'tis past?"

"You were ever, my friend, of a melancholy temperament," I said, "and too little disposed to hope. Indulge in brighter views of the future, and all shall yet be well."

"I can now hope that it shall," he said. "Yes, all shall be well with me—and that very soon. But, oh! how this nature of ours shrinks from dissolution!—yes, and all the lower natures too. You remember, mother, the poor starling that was killed in the room beside us? Oh, how it struggled with its ruthless enemy, and filled the whole place with its shrieks of terror and agony. And yet, poor little thing! it had been true, all life long, to the laws of its nature, and had no sins to account for, and no judge to meet. There is a shrinking of heart as I look before me, and yet I can hope that all shall yet be well with me—and that very soon. Would that I had been wise in time! Would that I had thought more and earlier of the things which pertain to my eternal peace! more of a living soul, and less of a dying name! But, oh! 'tis a glorious provision, through which a way of return is opened up even at the eleventh hour!"

We sat round him in silence; an indescribable feeling of awe pervaded my whole mind, and his sister was affected to tears.

"Margaret," he said, in a feeble voice—"Margaret, you will find my Bible in yonder little recess; 'tis all I have to leave you; but keep it, dearest sister, and use it, and, in times of sorrow and suffering, that come to all, you will know how to prize the legacy of your poor brother. Many, many books do well enough for life; but there is only one of any value when we come to die."

"You have been a voyager of late, Mr. Lindsay," he continued, "and I have been a voyager, too. I have been journeying in darkness and discomfort, amid strange unearthly shapes of dread and horror, with no reason to direct, and no will to govern. Oh, the unspeakable unhappiness of these wanderings!—these dreams of suspicion, and fear, and hatred, in which shadow and substance, the true and the false, were so wrought up and mingled together, that they formed but one fantastic and miserable whole. And, oh! the unutterable horror of every momentary return to a recollection of what I have been once, and a sense of what I had become! Oh, when I awoke amid the terrors of the night—when I turned me on the rustling straw, and heard the wild wail and yet wilder laugh—when I heard and shuddered, and then felt the demon in all his might coming over me, till I laughed and wailed with the others—oh, the misery! the utter misery! But 'tis over, my friend—'tis all over; a few, few tedious days, a few, few weary nights, and all my sufferings shall be over."

I had covered my face with my hands, but the tears came bursting through my fingers; the mother and sister of the poet sobbed aloud.

"Why sorrow for me, sirs?" he said; "why grieve for me? I am well, quite well, and want nothing. But 'tis cold, oh, 'tis very cold, and the blood seems freezing at my heart. Ah! but there is neither pain nor cold where I am going, and I trust it shall be well with my soul. Dearest, dearest mother, I always told you it would come to this at last."

The keeper had entered to intimate to us that the hour for locking up the cells was already past, and we now rose to leave the place. I stretched out my hand to my unfortunate friend; he took it in silence, and his thin attenuated fingers felt cold within my grasp, like those of a corpse. His mother stooped down to embrace him.

"Oh, do not go yet, mother," he said—"do not go yet—do not leave me; but it must be so, and I only distress you. Pray for me, dearest mother, and, oh! forgive me; I have been a grief and a burden to you all life long; but I ever loved you, mother; and, oh! you have been kind, kind and forgiving—and now your task is over. May God bless and reward you! Margaret, dearest Margaret, farewell."

We parted, and, as it proved, for ever. Robert Ferguson expired during the night; and when the keeper entered the cell next morning, to prepare him for quitting the asylum, all that remained of this most hapless of the children of genius, was a pallid and wasted corpse, that lay stiffened on the straw. I am now a very old man, and the feelings wear out; but I find that my heart is even yet susceptible of emotion, and that the source of tears is not yet dried up.

MARY STUART.

But malice, envy, cruelty, and spleen,
To death doom'd Scotia's dear, devoted Queen.

The interest excited by the production of the new tragedy of Mary Queen of Scots has induced me to advert to the subject, which, although by no means new, may prove interesting to some of your numerous readers. I intend, therefore, to give a brief sketch of the principal incidents in the chequered life of the most unfortunate princess of the most unfortunate family that ever swayed a sceptre.

"Truth is strange—stranger than fiction," and the saying is fully verified in the eventful career of Mary of Scotland. Her whole life is a romance. What a theme has it afforded for minstrels, poets, and romance-writers, and in what a variety of ways has it been treated; each period from her departure from her beloved France to her execution at Fotheringay having afforded

FRANCES HOWARD,

COUNTESS OF SOMERSET.

There is something fearful and revolting in the history of this titled murderess. Man, from his sterner nature, and by a long communion with vice and crime, may at last become so callous to all better feelings, as to be induced to shed the blood of a fellow-creature. Women, also, among the low and uneducated, impelled by the pinching of poverty or the rankling of revenge, may be hurried forward to commit violence against nature, and to heap infamy on their sex. But that the young, the beautiful, and delicately nurtured Frances Howard, to whom the world had been all smiles, and success, and kindness, should have set herself deliberately and mercilessly to take away the life of another, is a fact so unparalleled and unnatural, that, were it not proved beyond all doubt, it could only be regarded as an improbable fiction.

Frances Howard was the eldest daughter of Thomas, Earl of Suffolk, a man of indifferent character and moderate talent. The earl was chancellor of the University of Cambridge: when the orator of the university, at his inauguration, addressed him, as was usual, in a Latin speech, he informed the senate that he did not understand what was said; however, he added, as he concluded they meant to welcome him, he begged to assure them in return, that he would advance their interests as much as lay in his power.

As his daughter, the Lady Frances, was only thirteen years of age at the time of her marriage with the Earl of Essex, in January, 1606, she must have been born about the year 1593. Sir Symonds d'Ewes was assured by one Captain Field, a "faithful votary of her father, the Earl of Suffolk, that he had known her from her childhood, and had ever observed her to be of the best nature and sweetest disposition of all her father's children, exceeding them all also in the delicacy and comeliness of her person." This individual attributed to the advice and influence of her uncle, Northampton, the wretched course of life into which she afterwards fell. There can be no doubt that she was eminently beautiful. Arthur Wilson, who speaks of her character with abhorrence, almost appears to relent when he tells us of her sweet and bewitching countenance.

It may be doubted whether it was in the nature of Essex to insure the happiness of any woman. He was a cold and unbending republican, and, probably, like most of that cast, a tyrant in domestic life. He possessed neither elegance of mind nor manners, and his features were as rough as his disposition: a strange contrast to his unfortunate father. It is remarkable that both his wives transferred their affections to other men. His second lady, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Pawlet, fixed her regards on a Mr. Udall or Uvedale, and Essex separated from her in consequence. Wilson was resident in the house at the period of the earl's marriage with Elizabeth Pawlet. "I must confess," he says, in his memoir of himself, "she appeared to the eye a beauty, full of harmless sweetness; and her conversation was affable and gentle." Wilson did not always find her so very affable; for she afterwards refused to quit her chamber unless he was dismissed from her husband's establishment. He thus alludes to her frailty,—“Within two years this malicious piece of vanity, unworthy of so noble a husband, was separated from him, to her eternal reproach and infamy.”

Such a man as Essex was certainly ill suited to the beautiful, flattered, and passionate Frances Howard. Previously, however, to the earl's return from abroad, whither he had been sent after their youthful marriage, she had met and fallen violently in love with the favourite Somerset. The guilty pair were accustomed to meet at the house of Mrs. Turner, either at Hammersmith, or Paternoster Row. Occasionally also their appointments were at the residence of one Coppinger, a person remarkable only for the indifference of his character.

The exertions of the young countess to procure a divorce from her husband were at least as unwearying as her expedients were ingenious. The account which Arthur Wilson gives of this part of her history is too singular to be altogether omitted, though a considerable portion is unfit for detail:—"The Countess of Essex," he says, "having her heart alienated from her husband, and set upon the viscount, had a double task to undertake for accomplishing her ends. One was to repulse her husband; the other to make the viscount sure. Her husband she looked upon as a private person; and to be carried by him into the country, out of her element (being ambitious of glory, and a beauty covetous of applause,) were to close, as she thought, with an insufferable torment; though he was a man that did not only every way merit her love, but he loved her with an extraordinary affection, having a gentle, mild, and courteous disposition, specially to women, such as might win upon the roughest natures.* But this fiery heat of his wife's, mounted upon the wings of lust, or love (call it what you will), carried her after so much mischief, that those that saw her face might challenge nature of too much hypocrisy, for harbouring so wicked a heart under so sweet and bewitching a countenance.

"To strengthen her designs, she finds out one of her own stamp, Mrs. Turner, a doctor of physic's widow, a woman whom prodigality and looseness had brought low; yet her pride would make her fly any pitch, rather than fall into the jaws of want. These two consult together how they might stop the current of the earl's affection towards his wife, and make a clear passage for the viscount in his place. To effect which, one Dr. Forman, a reputed conjuror (living at Lambeth), is found out: the women declare to him their grievances: he promises sudden help: and, to amuse them, frames many little pictures of brass and wax; some like the viscount and countess, whom he must unite and strengthen; others like the Earl of Essex, whom he must debilitate and weaken; and then with philtrous powders, and such drugs, he works upon their persons. And to practise what effects his art would produce, Mrs. Turner, that loved Sir Arthur Manwaring (a gentleman then attending the prince), and willing to keep him to her, gave him some of the powder, which wrought so violently with him, that through a storm of rain and thunder he rode fifteen miles one dark night to her house, scarce knowing where he was till he was there.

"The good earl, finding his wife nouseled in the court, and seeing no possibility to reduce her to reason till she were estranged from the relish and delights she sucked in there, made his condition again known to her father. The old man being troubled with his daughter's disobedience,

* This high praise must be attributed to the zeal of Wilson for the honour of his patron. He was the faithful follower and intimate acquaintance of the earl.

embittered her being near him with wearisome and continual chidings, to wean her from the sweets she doated upon, and with much ado forced her into the country. But how harsh was the parting, being sent away from the place where she grew and flourished! Yet she left all her engines and imps behind her: the old doctor, and his confederate, Mrs. Turner, must be her two supporters. She blazons all her miseries to them at her depart, and moistens the way with her tears. Chartley was an hundred miles from her happiness; and a little time thus lost is her eternity. When she came thither, though in the pleasantest part of the summer, she shut herself up in her chamber, not suffering a beam of light to peep upon her dark thoughts. If she stirred out of her chamber, it was in the dead of the night, when sleep had taken possession of all others, but those about her. In this implacable, sad, and discontented humour she continued some months, always murmuring against but never giving the least civil respect to her husband, which the good man suffered patiently, being loth to be the divulger of his own misery; yet, having a manly courage, he would, sometimes break into a little passion, to see himself slighted and neglected by himself; but having never found better from her, it was the easier to bear with her."

Forman, the wizard or astrologer, who is here mentioned, though undoubtedly a rogue, was far superior in learning and ingenuity to the common mountebanks of his time. He was an excellent chemist, possessed considerable skill in astronomy and mathematics, and was indefatigable in his thirst after knowledge. He was born 30th of December, 1552, and at six years old is said to have been troubled with strange dreams and visions. When he arrived at fourteen, his father being dead, he bound himself apprentice to a grocer and apothecary at Salisbury, where he first obtained an insight into the nature of drugs. He endeavoured to improve his mind by reading; but his master, imagining, perhaps, that it interfered with his duties, deprived him of his books; however, Forman's bed-fellow was a boy who daily received instruction at a school in Salisbury, and from him he nightly elicited what the other had learnt during the day. At the age of eighteen he established a small school for himself; and having by this means realised a paltry sum of money, he set out for Oxford, where he entered himself a poor scholar of Magdalene College. After a residence of two years he again turned school-master, and began to study magic, astronomy, and physic. He now thought it necessary to travel, and having visited Portugal and the East, set up as a physician in Philpot lane, London; however, not having properly graduated, he was much annoyed by the legitimate practisers, and was four times imprisoned and once fined. On the 27th of June, 1603, having been some time resident in Jesus College, Cambridge, he obtained his degree of doctor of physic and astronomy from that university. From this period he settled himself at Lambeth, where he practised his profession unmolested; pretending, moreover, to the hidden art, and duping his fellow-creatures with all the paraphernalia of horoscopes, amulets, nativities, and the philosopher's stone. "He was a person," says Anthony Wood, "that in horary questions, especially theft, was very judicious and fortunate; so, also, in sickness, which was indeed his master-piece; and had good success in resolving questions about marriage, and in other questions very intricate. He professed to his wife that there would be much trouble about Sir Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and the Lady Frances, his wife, who frequently resorted to him, and from whose company he would sometimes lock himself in his study one whole day. He had compounded things upon the desire of Mrs. Anne Turner, to make the said Sir Robert Carr, calid quo ad hanc, and Robert, Earl of Essex, frigid quo ad hanc, that is, to his wife, the Lady Frances, who had a mind to get rid of him, and be wedded to the said Sir Robert. He had also certain pictures in wax, representing Sir Robert and the said lady, to cause a love between each other, with other such like things." It may be here remarked that these waxen images, as well as the countess's indelicate letters to Forman, were produced in open court at her trial. There was also exhibited a written parchment, drawn up by Forman, "signifying what ladies loved what lords at court;" but this the lord chief justice would not allow to be read. It appeared that his own wife was among the number.

The death of the astrologer is curious. Wood says, "I have been informed by a certain author, that the Sunday night before Dr. Forman died, he, the said Forman, and his wife being at supper in their garden-house, she told him in a pleasant humour, that she had been informed that he could resolve whether man or wife should die first, and asked him, 'whether I shall bury you or no?'—'Oh!' said he, 'you shall bury me, but thou wilt much repent it.' Then said she: 'How long will that be?' to which he made answer, 'I shall die before next Thursday night be over.' The next day, being Monday, all was well; Tuesday came, and he was not sick; Wednesday came, and still he was well; and then his impertinent wife did twit him in the teeth what he had said on Sunday. Thursday came, and dinner being ended, he was well, went down to the water side, and took a pair of oars to go to some buildings he was in hand with at Puddle Dock; and being in the middle of the Thames, he presently fell down, and only said, 'an impost, an impost,' and so died; whereupon a most sad storm of wind immediately followed." In the Life of Lilly, the astrologer, there is an interesting account of this memorable cheat. He is said to have been extremely kind to the poor. According to Lilly, the following entry was found in one of Forman's books:—"This I made the devil write with his own hands, in Lambeth Fields, 1596."

Anne Turner, another agent of the countess in her detestable practices, as has been already mentioned, was the widow of a physician, and had seen better times; but, considering crime preferable to poverty, was easily enlisted in the dark designs of her mistress. She was a woman of great beauty, and remarkable in the world of fashion as having introduced yellow starch in ruffs. When Coke, the lord chief justice, sentenced her to death for her share in the murder of Overbury, he added the strange order, that "as she was the person who had brought yellow starched ruffs into vogue, she should be hanged in that dress, that the same might end in shame and detestation." He told her also that she was a sorcerer, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer. Sir Symonds D'Ewes informs us that she appeared at her trial in the fashion which she had introduced, which may account for the order issued by the judge. Even the hangman who executed this wretched woman was decorated with yellow ruffs on the occasion: no wonder, therefore, that the fashion shortly grew to be generally detested and disused, which Sir

Symonds informs us was the case. There is a wood cut of Mrs. Turner attached to her dying speech and confession, preserved in the Library of the Antiquarian Society. She was executed at Tyburn, 15th November, 1615, and according to Camden, in his Annals, died a "true penitent." Indeed, we have evidence that her demeanour on the scaffold excited the commiseration of the bystanders. A Mr. John Castle writes to Mr. James Milles, 28th November, 1615,—"Since I saw you, I saw Mrs. Turner die. If detestation of painted pride, lust, malice, powdered hair, yellow bands, and the rest of the wardrobe of court vanities—if deep sighs, tears, confessions, ejaculations of the soul, admonitions of all sorts of people to make God and an unspotted conscience always our friends—if the protestation of faith, and hope to be washed by the same Saviour, and the like mercies that Mary Magdalene was, be signs and demonstrations of a blessed penitent, then I will tell you that this poor broken woman went a cruce ad gloriam, and now enjoys the presence of her and our Redeemer. Her body being taken down by her brother, one Norton, servant to the prince, was, in a coach, conveyed to St. Martin's of the Fields, where, in the evening of the same day, she had an honest and a decent burial." In a poem of the period, entitled Overbury's Vision, Mrs. Turner is eulogised in some verses, of which the poetry is as beautiful as the sentiment is misplaced:—

"The roses on her lovely cheeks were dead,
The earth's pale colour had all overspread
Her sometime lively look; and cruel Death,
Coming untimely with his wintry breath,
Blasted the fruit, which, cherry-like, in show,
Upon her dainty lips did whilom grow.
O how the cruel cord did misbecome
Her comely neck! and yet by law's just doom
Had been her death. Those locks, like golden thread,
That used in youth to enshrine her globe-like head,
Hung careless down; and that delightful limb,
Her snow-white nimble hand, that used to trim
Those tresses up, now spitefully did tear
And rend the same; nor did she now forbear
To beat that breast of more than lily white,
Which sometime was the bed of sweet delight.
From those two springs where joy did whilom dwell,
Grief's pearly drops upon her pale cheek fell."

A rather remarkable story is told respecting Sir Jervis Elways, who also died on the gallows for his share in Overbury's death. He had been a fellow-commoner of St. John's College, Cambridge, and had presented a silver bowl to that community. On the day, and, as it is said, on the very hour of his execution, the bowl fell down and broke asunder. Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who was afterwards a fellow-commoner of St. John's, assures us that he was credibly informed of the fact. Elways had at one period of his life been a great gambler; but having lost a large sum of money at a sitting, he made a solemn vow to his Maker that he would never commit the vice again; adding a hope, that if he did so he might come to be hanged. He neglected his vow, and recalled the circumstance at the last. "Now, God," he said, "hath paid my imprecation home."

To return to the countess. Essex, wearied with the perpetual proofs of hatred and disgust which she exhibited towards him, and perhaps somewhat suspecting the anti-philtroous regimen to which he had been long insensibly subjected, at length fell in with her views for the procurement of a divorce. Bishop Goodman throws some curious light on this particular passage in the annals of crime. "I may herein," he says,

"speak my certain knowledge concerning the nullity of the marriage between the Earl of Essex and his lady. About a year or two before the marriage was questioned, I did hear from a gentleman belonging to the Earl of Huntingdon, but very well known, and a great servant to the Earl of Essex, that the Earl of Essex was fully resolved to question the marriage, and to prove a nullity; and I am confident that if the countess had not then at that instant done it, the Earl of Essex himself would have been the plaintiff; so then, I hereby conclude that both parties were agreed and were alike interested in the business."

A written answer to the objections against the divorce was drawn up by the king himself, who took a deep interest in the proceedings.

This trial is not a little remarkable, when we consider that a cause which was more fit to be discussed in a brothel, was argued before the dignitaries of the church;—that a king was the supporter of one side, and an archbishop of the other;—and, moreover, that the verdict hung upon a particular objection, the validity of which, considering the personal charms of the plaintiff, none but a very cold or a very ignorant man could possibly have acknowledged.

Essex, in order to pay the marriage portion of five thousand pounds, was forced to cut down timber at his seat at Adderston, and would even have been compelled to sell land, had not his grandmother, the Countess of Leicester, come forward and assisted him. He retired to his venerable castle of Chartley, in Staffordshire, where he endeavoured to forget the ridicule of the world in the sports of the field. His mode of living at Chartley is fully described by Arthur Wilson in his life of himself.

The marriage of the lady and her paramour was solemnised at Whitehall, on the 26th December, 1613, and was an exhibition of greater magnificence than had ever been witnessed in England at the espousals of a subject. The king, the queen, and the principal persons of the court, were present at the ceremony; but it did not tend to silence the whisperings of scandal, when it was seen that the bride had the effrontery to stand at the altar in the dress of a virgin. Previously to the ceremony, Somerset, who had been hitherto merely Viscount Rochester, was created an earl, in order that the countess might not lose rank in the transfer of her hand.

"Whitehall," says Coke, "was too narrow to contain the triumphs of this marriage, and they must be extended into the city. Accordingly, on the 4th of January, the bride and bridegroom, attended by the Duke of Lennox, the lord privy seal, the lord chamberlain, and a numerous train of the nobility, proceeded in great state to the city. A magnificent entertainment was prepared for them in Merchant Tailors' Hall. The music struck up as they entered. Speeches of congratulation were delivered, and the mayor and aldermen came forward in their scarlet gowns to do honour to the favourite and his bride. At the sumptuous banquet which followed, they were waited on by the choicest citizens from the twelve companies. After supper, there were plays, masks, and dancing, and, late at night, the rejoicings were concluded with a second feast. At three o'clock in the morning, the bride and bridegroom returned to Whitehall." Thus does the world worship the rising sun. Within a little more than two years, these two envied and glittering beings were the inmates of a prison; deprived of fortune, flattery, and circumstance, and narrowly escaping a death of infamy by the hands of the common executioner.

In perusing the history of the Countess of Somerset, it is necessary to bear in mind one important fact. At the period of her marriage with Somerset, and of the subsequent death of Overbury—comprising the most atrocious murder, and the most disgraceful narrative of infamy, that has been recorded in modern times—this unhappy creature could not possibly have exceeded her twenty-first year. That Overbury disliked her character, and defamed it to others besides Somerset, is very possible. Weldon says, that “if one of her brothers, or any of her kindred, had challenged and killed him in fair combat, the world would readily have exonerated them.” But the expedients to which she had recourse, would have been atrocious in a savage. Sir Symonds D'Ewes relates, that “on one occasion she offered a thousand pounds to Sir Daniel Wood, a follower of Anne of Denmark, and an enemy of Overbury's, if, either by duel or assassination, he would put her detractor out of the way.” Wood told her, that “he had no objection to bastinado him, but that he was unwilling to be sent to Tyburn for any lady's pleasure.” While in prison, she is described as “very pensive and silent, and much grieved.”

She was tried for the murder of Overbury, 24th May, 1616, in Westminster Hall. On entering the hall, the ceremony of carrying the axe before her was omitted. First came the chancellor, who acted as lord high steward, upon horseback. He was followed by his attendants and several peers. Then came six sergeants-at-law, the clerk of the crown in chancery, the seal-bearers, and the white staff. Two barons (Russell and Norris), and two knights, terminated the procession. She stood pale and trembling at the bar, and during the reading of the indictment, covered her face with her fan. She pleaded guilty to the crime; but beseeched the peers to intercede for her with the king, with so many tears, and in such extreme anguish, that the bystanders were unable to refrain from commiseration. The sentence was, that she should be conveyed to the Tower, and from thence to the place of execution, where she was to be hung by the neck &c.

The wretched existence which she eventually passed with her husband, has been already alluded to in the memoir of the earl. The estrangement between them, though widened by mutual hatred, was rendered even necessary by an injury which she had sustained in giving birth to her only daughter. The disease of which she died, was as horrible as her crime, but the details are too loathsome for insertion. Walpole informs us, in his Anecdotes of Painting, that in 1762 her escutcheons still remained entire in the beautiful parish church of Walden. She died in 1632, at the age of thirty-nine.

HENRY HOWARD,

EARL OF NORTHAMPTON.

This unamiable personage was born at Shotisham, in Norfolk, about the year 1539. He was the brother of that Duke of Norfolk who lost his head in the cause of the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots, and the second son of the lamented Earl of Surrey, the darling of poetry, of learning, and romance. He was educated at King's College, and afterwards at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. During the reign of Elizabeth, he had met with little favour, but at the accession of James, had no reason to complain of neglect. In May, 1603, he was made a privy councillor; in January following, lord warden of the Cinque Ports; in March, Baron of Marnhill and Earl of Northampton; and in April, 1606, lord privy seal, and was honoured with the Garter. In 1609, he was made high steward of the University of Oxford, and in 1612, chancellor of Cambridge. James had not forgotten the misfortunes of the Howards in the cause of his mother.

Northampton related a curious story to his secretary, one George Penny. When a mere infant, it had been predicted to his father, by an Italian astrologer, that in middle life his son would be reduced to such a state of poverty as to be in want of a meal, but that in his old age his wealth would be abundant. When the prediction was made, that a Howard should ever be poor appeared at least to be extremely improbable; but the fact, nevertheless, came to pass. By the execution of the Duke of Norfolk, and the forfeiture of his estate, his family became so impoverished, that the earl, to use the phrase of his biographer, was often fain to dine with Duke Humphrey; those hours, during which others were enjoying the luxury of the table, were frequently employed by the hungry earl in poring over the contents of the booksellers' stalls in St. Paul's Churchyard.* The unmeasured favours which were afterwards heaped upon him by James, abundantly fulfilled the prophecy.

The earl was one of those mistaken dreamers, who are ever fancying that the world is their dupe, while in reality they deceive no one but themselves. The delusion lasted through a long life of contemptible cunning and clumsy intrigue. Flattery and dissimulation were his tools, but they must have been awkwardly handled; for his motives and his character were seen through by all. Lady Bacon, the mother of Sir Francis, anxiously forewarns her sons against keeping his society: “He is,” she says, “a dangerous intelligencing man; no doubt a subtle papist, inwardly, and lieth in wait.” Again, she adds: “Avoid his familiarity, as you love truth and yourself. Pretending courtesy, he worketh mischief perilously. I have long known him and observed him. His workings have been stark naught.” Rowland White, also, thus writes to Sir Robert Sydney: “Lord Harry is held a ranter; and I pray you take heed of him, if you have not already gone too far.” In the Five Years of King James, he is spoken of as “famous for secret insinuation and for cunning flatteries;” and Weldon tells us, that “though not a wise man, he was the greatest flatterer in the world.” If ever he was surpassed in this despicable art, it was by one of his own adulators, when he said of him, “that he was the most learned amongst the noble, and the most noble amongst the learned.” Unfortunately this fulsome compliment was paid to him by a bishop, who, for sixteen years was kept in the indifferent see of Llandaff, and who, without doubt, had an eye to translation.

A long career of folly and artifice was followed by an old age of infamy and crime. He had actually completed his seventieth year, when he became a pander to the dishonour of his own niece in her adulterous intrigue with Somerset. After a lapse of threescore years and ten, the hope of further aggrandisement, and an innate love of intrigue, continued to be the main-spring and the curse of his existence. Of his subsequent share in Overbury's murder not the remotest doubt can exist. He is even said to have been the author of the infamous plot, by which Overbury was offered and induced to refuse the embassy to Russia, and thus fell under the king's displeasure. But the following letters, the originals of which are preserved in the Cotton Library, will be considered sufficient to establish his guilt.

They are addressed to Sir Jervis Elways, the lieutenant of the Tower:—

“Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

“My Lord of Rochester desiring to do the last honour to his deceased friend, requires me to desire you to deliver the body of Sir Thomas Overbury to any friend of his that desires it, to do him honour at his funeral. Herein my lord declares the constancy of his affection for the dead, and the meaning that he had in my knowledge, to have given his strongest strain at this time of the king's being at Theobald's, for his delivery. I fear no impediment to this honourable desire of my lord's but the unsweetness of the body, because it was reported that he had some issues, and in that case the keeping of him must needs give more offence than it can do honour. My fear is also, that the body is already buried upon that cause whereof I write; which being so, it is too late to set out solemnity.

“Thus, with my kindest commendations, I end, and rest, your affectionate and assured friend, “II. NORTHAMPTON.

Postscript.—“You see my lord's earnest desire with my concurring care, that all respect be had to him that may be for the credit of his memory; but yet I wish withal that you do very discreetly inform yourself whether this grace hath been afforded formerly to close prisoners, or whether you may grant my request in this case, who speak out of the sense of my lord's affection, though I be a councillor, without offence, or prejudice. For I would be loth to draw either you or myself into censure, now I have well thought of the matter, though it be a work of charity.”

This letter is endorsed by Sir Jervis Elways, as follows;

“So soon as Sir Thomas Overbury was departed, I writ unto my lord of Northampton; and because my experience could not direct me, I desired to know what I should do with the body, acquainting his lordship with his issues, as Weston had informed me, and other foulness of his body, which was then accounted the —. My lord writ unto me, that I should first have his body viewed by a jury: and I well remember, his lordship advised me to send for Sir John Sidcote to see the body, and to suffer as many else of his friends to see it as would, and presently to bury it in the body of the quire, for the body would not keep. Notwithstanding Sir Thomas Overbury dying about five in the morning, I kept his body unburied until three or four of the clock in the afternoon. The next day Sir John Sidcote came thither; I could not get him to bestow a coffin, nor a winding-sheet upon him. The coffin I bestowed; but who did wind him, I know not. For, indeed, the body was very noisome; so that, notwithstanding my lord's directions, we kept it over long, as we all felt.

“JER. HELWINE.”

To the next letter, the earl, for obvious reasons, omitted to sign his name.

"Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

"Let me entreat you to call Sidcote, and three or four of his friends, if so many come, to view the body; if they have not already done it; and so soon as it is viewed, without staying the coming of a messenger from the court; in any case, see it interred in the body of the chapel within the Tower instantly.

"If they have viewed, then bury it by and by; for it is time, considering the humours of that damned crew, that only desire means to move pity and raise scandals. Let no man's instance move you to make stay in any case, and bring me these letters when I next see you.

"Fail not a jot herein, as you love your friends: nor after Sidcote and his friends have viewed, stay one minute, but let the priest be ready; and if Sidcote be not there, send for him speedily, pretending that the body will not tarry.

"In poste haste at 12."

How strange are the anomalies of human nature! The same wretched old man, the cold-blooded murderer, and the corrupter of his own niece, was a munificent patron of public charities. At Greenwich he built two colleges, one for decayed gentlemen, and the other for twelve poor men and a governor. At Rise, in Norfolk, he erected an hospital for twelve poor women; and at Clun, in Shropshire, another charitable retreat for twelve poor men and a governor. He was also a writer on theological subjects.

Northampton was the author of several works, which are now either forgotten, or only casually recorded. He is included in Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, where there is a longer, but scarcely a more flattering, notice than he deserves.

The same man who made little ado about crime, made a great deal about religion. He was bred a Roman Catholic, in which faith, after changing his religion four times, he died. At heart, however, there is little doubt of his having been a papist throughout; indeed, he confessed as much in his will. The appointment which he held as Warden of the Cinque Ports enabled him to give free ingress to the priests. Of this advantage he availed himself to such an extent, that the people began to murmur, and the king himself exhibited symptoms of strong displeasure. Flattering himself, however, that actual proofs were wanting, Northampton commenced a prosecution of several persons who had accused him of the connivance. An inquiry took place in the Star Chamber. The subtle earl appeared to be carrying all before him, when the Archbishop of Canterbury rose from his seat. After a short premise, he produced a letter in court written in Northampton's own hand

* Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 481. See Ath. Oxon. and Cotton MSS. and Titus, b. vii. fol. 465. In addition to these, there is extant a third letter, written by Northampton to Sir Jervis Elways previous to Overbury's death. As Lodge, I think, is the only writer who has remarked it, and as it tends to throw some question over the mysterious strictness with which Overbury was supposed to have been immured, it is but fair that the following important extract should be inserted:—"In compliance," says the earl, "with old Mr. Overbury's petition, it is the king's pleasure that Dr. Craig, this bearer, should presently be admitted to Sir Thomas Overbury; that during the time of his infirmity he may take care of him, and as often as, in his judgment, to this end he shall find reason."—Lodge, Portraits of Illustrious Personages.

to Cardinal Bellarmine. In this epistle the earl not only expressed himself a firm believer in the tenets of the Church of Rome, but assured the cardinal, that though the features of the times, and the solicitations of his sovereign, had compelled him to wear the mask of Protestantism, he was nevertheless prepared to enter into any attempt, which might be agreed upon for the advancement of their mutual faith. The defamers were in consequence liberated, and Northampton retired in disgust to his house at Greenwich. He survived the disclosure but a few months; breathing his last on the 15th of June, 1614, in the 75th year of his age. Sir Henry Wotton writes, in a letter to Sir Edmund Bacon:—"The Earl of Northampton, having, after a lingering fever, spent more spirits than a younger body could well have borne, by the incision of a wenish tumour grown on his thigh, yesternight, between eleven and twelve of the clock, departed out of this world; where, as he had proved much variety and vicissitude of fortune in the course of his life, so peradventure he hath prevented another change thereof by the opportunity of his end." A curious letter is extant, addressed by the earl to his friend Somerset, written in the last hours of life and in the full consciousness that he was dying. He seems to have regarded his approaching dissolution without fear, and to have interested himself entirely for those friends whom he would leave unprovided behind him. After preferring a few requests in their behalf,—"Assurance from your lordship," he says, "that you will effect those final requests, shall send my spirit out of this transitory tabernacle with as much comfort and content as the bird flies to the mountain;" and he concludes: "Farewell, noble lord; and the last farewell in the last letter that ever I look to write to any man. I presume confidently of your favour in these poor suits, and will be, both living and dying, your affectionate friend and servant,"

"H. NORTHAMPTON."

The earl was buried at his own request, in the chapel belonging to Dover Castle.

He built Northampton, or, as it is now called, Northumberland House, in the Strand, and, according to Lloyd, gave the design of the famous structure of Audley End. He was never married: one writer says of him, that "he was more wedded to his book than his bed, for he died a bachelor." His hatred was as deadly as his conduct was treacherous. He said of the gallant Robert Mansel, "that he would be content to be perpetually damned in hell to be revenged of that proud Welshman." In his will, Northampton inserted the following bequest: "I most humbly beseech his excellent majesty to accept, as a poor remembrance from his faithful servant, an ewer of gold, of one hundred pounds value, with one hundred jacobine pieces of twenty-two shillings apiece therein; on which ewer my desire is there should be this inscription—Detur dignissimo."

MARY, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE.

Although the character and pursuits of this illustrious lady, render a notice of her somewhat foreign to the character of this work, it may not be uninteresting to say a few words respecting the mother of Earl William and Earl Philip; moreover, it is refreshing to turn a moment from the glare of folly and vice, to unpretending piety and intellectual refinement.

Mary, Countess of Pembroke, was the daughter of Sir Henry Sidney, a Knight of the Garter, and one of the stately courtiers of Queen Elizabeth. She was the wife of Henry, second Earl of Pembroke, and the beloved sister of the memorable Sir Philip Sidney. Their tastes and habits were congenial: there was the same high sense of honour, the same elegance of mind, the same charitable regard for human suffering. Sir Philip dedicated his Arcadia to his sister, the being who best loved the author, and who was the most competent to appreciate the work.

She spent a long life and a splendid fortune in doing good to her fellow creatures. She patronised men of learning, and embellished herself; indeed, her wit and mental endowments appear only to have been exceeded by her piety. Dr. Donne said of her, that "she could converse well on all subjects, from predestination to slave silk;" and Spenser eulogizes her as—

The gentlest shepherdess that lived that day:
And most resembling, both in shape and spirit,
Her brother dear.

In her old age the cowardice and misconduct of her son Philip nearly broke her heart, and she is even said to have torn her hair with anguish when she heard the tale of his dishonour.

The countess was herself an authoress. She translated from the French, Mornay's "Discourse of Life and Death," and the tragedy of "Antoine;" the former printed in 1590, and the latter in 1600. Wood informs us, in a notice of William Bradbridge, who was chaplain at Wilton, that with the assistance of that divine, she completed a translation of the Psalms. He contradicts himself, however, in another place, and mentions her brother, Sir Philip, as the translator; adding that the MSS. curiously bound in crimson velvet, was bequeathed by the countess to the library at Wilton. Some agreeable specimens of her epistolary style will be found in Park's Noble Authors.

She died at an advanced age, in her house in Aldersgate street, 25th of September, 1621. Her remains were interred in Salisbury Cathedral, in the vault of the Herberts. Ben Jonson's admirable epitaph, though somewhat hackneyed, will, perhaps, bear repetition:—

Underneath this marble hearse
Lies the subject of all verse—
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother.
Death, ere thou hast slain another
Wise, and fair, and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.
Marble piles let no man raise
To her name; for after days
Some kind woman born as she,
Reading this, like Niobe,
Shall turn marble, and become
Both her mourner and her tomb.

WILLIAM HERBERT,

EARL OF PEMBROKE.

The life of Earl William is invariably a panegyric. Wit, gallantry, integrity, and refined taste, the highest breeding and the kindest nature have rendered him one of the most delightful characters of his time. Though too high-minded and independent to make his fortune as a courtier he was ever respected by his sovereign, was admired by all parties, and beloved by all ranks

He was neither subservient to Elizabeth, who was partial to him, nor to James, who stood in awe of him. He was liked by the courtiers because he asked for nothing, and admired by the country because he was indebted for nothing. He stood a superior being among the buffoons and sycophants of the court of James; among them, but not of them. He was loyal to his king, he loved his country and supported its institutions, he lived magnificently without impoverishing his heir, and possessed genius himself and distinguished it in others. In a word, he was the patron of Shakspeare and of Inigo Jones.

With all these virtues and accomplishments, the earl was not altogether exempt from the weaknesses of human nature. He was a staunch votary of pleasure, and too ardent in his admiration of women, for whom he sacrificed too much both of his fortune and his time. If these indulgences somewhat out-lasted the period of life, when alone they can be at all venial, they may be attributed, perhaps, to some unpleasant circumstances which embittered his domestic life.

William, third Earl of Pembroke, was born at Wilton, April 8, 1580. In 1592, at the age of thirteen, he was entered at New College, Oxford, where he remained two years. He succeeded his father in the family honours, January 19, 1601. In 1603, he was made a Knight of the Garter by James the First, and in 1609 Governor of Portsmouth. In the fifteenth year of King James he was made Lord Chamberlain, and in 1626 was unanimously elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford. Charles the First, at his accession, made him Lord Steward of the Household, and in the fifth year of his reign, Warden of the Stannaries.

We learn from the Sydney Papers that the earl, then Lord Herbert, made his first appearance at the court of Elizabeth, about August, 1599; his father allowing him a retinue of two hundred horse to attend her majesty's person. The old queen received him graciously: her admiration of manly beauty still remained, but her favours were slighted by Lord Herbert. Rowland White complains bitterly of this circumstance in his letters to Herbert's uncle, Sir Philip Sidney. On the 8th of September, 1599, he writes,—“My Lord Herbert is a continual courtier, but doth not follow his business with that care as is fit, he is so cold a courtier in a matter of such greatness.” On the 12th of the same month, he renews the subject:—“Now that my Lord Herbert is gone, he is much blamed for his cold and weak manner of pursuing her majesty's favour, having had so good steps to lead him unto it. There is a want of spirit and courage laid to his charge, and that he is a melancholy young man. Young Carey follows it with more care and boldness.” According to the dates of these letters, his stay at court must have been extremely brief. At his farewell visit, the queen detained him in private conversation for an hour; no wonder, therefore, that his friends complained of his coldness.

He married, about the year 1604, Mary, daughter of Gilbert, seventh Earl of Shrewsbury. She brought him a large fortune, but the advantage was negated by a disagreeable person and an unenviable temper, and Lord Clarendon speaks of their union as “most unhappy.”

At the council table of James, the earl's conduct was manly in the extreme. Wherever the king's interests were really concerned, he not only opposed the flimsy flatterers of the court, but even thwarted the king himself in some of his more objectionable measures. When the Spanish match was under discussion, notwithstanding it was the darling offspring of the king's brain, he opposed it so violently, that James is described as actually terrified at his vehemence. Nevertheless, the king had sense enough to value his fidelity and open dealing, and though Lord Clarendon says, “He rather esteemed Pembroke than loved him;” yet his credit remained unimpaired. The earl was an especial favourite with Anne of Denmark.

Pembroke is said to have entertained a singular dislike to frogs. James, aware of the prejudice, and delighting to a childish degree in any practical joke, took an opportunity of thrusting one of these creatures down the earl's neck. The manner in which the latter revenged himself, though certainly pardonable, would have been attempted by few others about the court. James, as is well known, had the utmost abhorrence of a pig; one of these animals was therefore obtained, and lodged, by Pembroke's orders, under a particular article of furniture in the king's apartment. His majesty was extremely annoyed when he made the discovery, and the more so as the joke was played in the earl's own house at Wilton.

The quarrel which occurred in 1608 between the earl and Sir George Wharton, is too curious to be omitted. The particulars are thus related in a letter from Thomas Coke to the Countess of Shrewsbury:—

“I do not doubt but your ladyship hath heard before this what honour my lord of Pembroke hath got by his discreet and punctual proceeding in the question betwixt Sir George Wharton and him, yet for that, I have understood it by Mr. Morgan and others, particularly least your ladyship may have heard it but in general, I adventure to advertise your ladyship; on Friday was seven-night, my lord and Sir George, with others, played cards, where Sir George showed such choler, as my lord of Pembroke told him, ‘Sir George, I have loved you long, and desire still to do so; but, by your manner in playing, you lay it upon me, either to leave to love you, or to leave to play with you; wherefore, choosing to love you still, I will never play with you more.’ The next day, they hunted with the king, and my lord of Pembroke's page galloping after his lord, Sir George came up to him and lashed him over the face with his rod. The boy told his lordship, who finding, by strict examination, that the boy had not deserved it, demanded of Sir George why he did strike his boy? Sir George answered, he meant nothing towards his lordship. My lord said, he asked not that, but what the cause was why he did strike the boy? ‘I did not strike him,’ answered Sir George. ‘Then I am satisfied,’ said the earl. ‘God's blood!’ said Sir George, ‘I say it not to satisfy you.’ ‘But, sir,’ said the earl, ‘whose striketh my boy without cause, shall give me an account of it, and, therefore, I tell you, it was foolishly done of you.’ ‘You are a fool,’ said Sir George. ‘You lie in your throat,’ said the earl. And thus the Duke of Lennox, Marr, and others, coming in, this rested, and every one began to gallop away on hunting, and the earl being gone about six or eight minutes, Sir George spurred his horse with all speed up to him, which was observed by the Earl of Montgomery, who, crying, ‘Brother, take heed, you will be stricken,’ (neither party having weapon,) the earl instantly received him with a sound backward blow over the face, which drove him almost upon his horse croup. But the company being present, they galloped again, till in the end the stag died in Bagshot farm, where Sir George, taking opportunity to wait, came afterwards to the earl, and offered him a paper, protesting there was nothing in it unfit for his lordship to read. The earl said, ‘Sir George, give me no papers here, where all they see us who know what hath passed, if you mean to do yourself right; but tell me, is not the purport of it a challenge to me?’ ‘Yes,’ said Sir George. ‘Well,’ said the earl, ‘this night you shall have an answer, now let us talk of the —;’ and after calling Sir John Lee unto him, willed him to tell Sir George, that that night he should bring him the length of my lord's sword. After being come home, and divers coming to his chamber, and Sir John (amongst the rest) only private to his lordship's intent, ‘O, Sir John,’ said his lordship, ‘you are coming for the sword which I promised you,’ and commanded his page to deliver unto him the sword which my Lord of Devonshire gave him, which he receiving as given, went, according to his former direction, to Sir George, [and] told him that was the earl's sword; the next morning being Sunday, the time when they would fight, and, therefore, willed him to withdraw himself, and take measure of the sword. ‘No,’ said Sir George, ‘it shall not need; I will have no other sword than this at my side.’ ‘Advise yourself,’ said Sir John; ‘that is shorter than this, and do not think that the earl will take one hair's breadth of advantage at your hands.’

“Upon this, Sir George was first sent for, and after, the earl, and the king's commandment laid upon them not to stir; after which Sir George came to Sir John Lee, and told him that if my lord would break the king's commandment, he would do the like. Sir John said, he knew the earl was very scrupulous of breaking any of the king's commandments, but yet he would undertake upon his life to bring Sir George to where the earl should be, all alone, with that sword by his side; where, if Sir George would draw upon him, his lordship should either defend himself, or abide the hazard; but soon after, Sir George came to Sir John Lee, and told him, he had received another commandment from his majesty, and resolved to observe the same. After, they were both convened before the lords, and last before the king, and it was, as I hear, required that my lord should give him satisfaction, which his lordship said he should do thus: If Sir George would confess that he did not intend to have offended him at that time, he would acknowledge that he was sorry that he had stricken him, and thus it ended.”

Sir George Wharton was killed in a duel, the following year, by his intimate friend, Sir James Stuart, who also died of his wounds.

According to Anthony Wood, Earl William was in person “rather majestic than elegant, and his presence, whether quiet or in motion, was full of stately gravity.” He speaks of him as the “very picture and viva effigies of nobility.” The earl, among his other accomplishments, was a poet, and the author of some “amorous and not inelegant airs,” which were set to music by his contemporaries. The following graceful trifle affords an agreeable specimen of his muse:

“Dry those fair, those crystal eyes,
Which like growing fountains rise
To draw those banks; grief's sullen brooks
Would better flow from furrowed looks;
Thy lovely face was never meant
To be the seat of discontent.”

Then clear those watery eyes again,
That else portend a lasting rain,
Lest the clouds which settle there
Prolong my winter all the year;
And thy example others make
In love with sorrow for thy sake."

The goddess of his idolatry was Christian, daughter of Edward, Lord Bruce, who afterwards became the wife of William Cavendish, second Earl of Devonshire.

Some remarkable circumstances attended the earl's decease. It had been foretold by his tutor, Sandford, and afterwards by the mad prophetess, Lady Davies, that he would either not complete, or would die on the anniversary of, his fiftieth birthday. That these predictions were actually fulfilled, appears by the following curious passage in Clarendon's Rebellion. "A short story may not be unfily inserted; it being frequently mentioned by a person of known integrity, whose character is here undertaken to be set down, who at that time being on his way to London, met, at Maidenhead, some persons of quality, of relation or dependence upon the Earl of Pembroke, Sir Charles Morgan, commonly called General Morgan, who had commanded an army in Germany, and defended Stoad; Dr. Feild, then Bishop of St. David's; and Dr. Chafin, the earl's then chaplain in his house, and much in his favour. At supper, one of them drank a health to the lord steward; upon which another of them said, that he believed his lord was at that time very merry, for he had now outlived the day which his tutor, Sandford, had prognosticated, upon his nativity, he would not outlive; but he had done it now, for that was his birthday, which had completed his age to fifty years. The next morning, by the time they came to Colebrook, they met with the news of his death."

On the fatal day, the earl had engaged himself to sup with the Countess of Bedford. During the meal, he appeared unusually well, and remarked that he would never trust a woman's prophecy again. A few hours afterwards, he was attacked by apoplexy, and died during the night. Granger, to make the story more remarkable, relates that when the earl's body was opened, in order to be embalmed, the incision was no sooner made, than the corpse lifted its hand. The anecdote, he adds, was told by a descendant of the Pembroke family, who had often heard it related. The earl died at his house in London, called Baynard's Castle, on the 10th of April, 1630,* and was buried near his father in Salisbury Cathedral.

The portrait of Earl William has been painted by Vandyke, and his character drawn by Lord Clarendon. The latter should be his epitaph: it is one of the most beautiful delineations of that illustrious historian.

PHILIP HERBERT,

EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY.

The "memorable simpleton" of Walpole, who dimmed the lustre of a proud name by his cowardice, arrogance, and folly. Were we to believe but one half that has been said against him, his character would appear sufficiently odious. A favourite and a rebel can have no friends, and Montgomery, who was both, has had no admirers.

* Ath. Oxon. vol. i. p. 546; Collins's Peerage, vol. iii. p. 123. As the earl was born on the eighth of April, 1580, unless the dates are wrongly given, this discrepancy would tend to throw some doubt on Lord Clarendon's remarkable anecdote.

The earl was the second son of the celebrated Mary, Countess of Pembroke, nephew of Sir Philip Sidney, and younger brother of Earl William. He was born about the year 1582.

He was the first acknowledged favourite of King James, after his accession to the English throne. His handsome face, his love of dogs and horses, and especially his taste for hunting, rendered him peculiarly acceptable to that monarch. His influence remained unimpaired till the appearance of Robert Carr at court, an event which quickly turned the current of royal favour. However, as Montgomery neither remonstrated with James, nor showed any bitterness at his altered position, the king, who, above all things loved his ease and quiet, so far appreciated his forbearance, as to regard him ever after as his second favourite, whoever might chance to be the first. On his death-bed James gave the greatest proof of his confidence in the earl. When the suspicion broke on the dying monarch, that Buckingham and his mother were tampering with his life, it was to Montgomery that he exclaimed trustingly, "For God's sake look that I have fair play!"

The earl had received his education at New College, Oxford. On the 4th of June, 1605, he was created Earl of Montgomery, and on the 10th of May, 1608, was made a Knight of the Garter. The favours which he obtained from James, were not substantial, for during this reign he rose no higher than to be a lord of the bed-chamber. In the reign of Charles the First, however, he became lord chamberlain, and, to the disgrace of the University, Chancellor of Oxford. He succeeded his brother as Earl of Pembroke, 10th April, 1630.

His first appearance at court had been in the lifetime of Elizabeth, where, though a mere boy at the time, he appears to have rendered himself conspicuous for that want of modesty, which afterwards formed so prominent a trait in his character, and became so distasteful to his contemporaries. Rowland White, in a letter dated 26th April, 1600, thus writes to Sir Philip Sidney:—"Mr. Philip Herbert is here (at court), and one of the forwardest courtiers that ever I saw in my time; for he had not been here two hours, but he grew as bold as the best. Upon Thursday he goes back again, full sore against his will." He seems to have shared the success of his brother in the tournaments and other sports of the period. We find,—

The Herberts every cockpit-day,
Do carry away
The gold and glory of the day.

He was privately contracted in October, 1604, without the knowledge of the friends of either party, to Lady Susan Vere, daughter of Edward, 17th Earl of Oxford. The family of the young lady exhibited some aversion to the match, but the king interposed and softened their prejudices. On St. John's Day, 1604, they were married with great magnificence at Whitehall. The bride was led to church by Prince Henry and the Duke of Holstein, and the king himself gave her away. She looked so lovely in her tresses and jewels, that the king observed, "were he unmarried, he would keep her himself." After the ceremony there was a splendid banquet, succeeded by as gorgeous a mask. The following picture of the entertainments, as well as of the manners of the times, can scarcely need a comment:—"There was no small loss that night of chains and jewels, and many great ladies were made shorter by the skirts, and were very well served that they could keep out no better. The presents of plate and other things given by the noblemen were valued at 2,500*l.*; but that which made it a good marriage was a gift of the king's, of 500*l.* land, for the bride's jointure. They were lodged in the council chamber, where the king, in his shirt and night-gown, gave them a reveille matin before they were up, and spent a good time in or upon the bed; chuse which you will believe. No ceremony was omitted of bride-cakes, points, garters, and gloves, which have been ever since the livery of the court; and at night there was sewing into the sheet, casting off the bride's left hose, and many other petty sorceries." By Lady Susan the earl had several children, who outlived him.

Lord Clarendon says of Montgomery,—"there were very few great persons in authority, who were not frequently offended by him by sharp and scandalous discourses, and invectives against them, behind their backs; for which they found it best to receive satisfaction by submissions, and professions, and protestations, which was a coin he was plentifully supplied with for the payment of all those debts." The fact is, he was one of the most brutal, cowardly, and choleric persons that ever disgraced a court. He appears to have been constantly engaged in some unbecoming quarrel. In 1610, a dispute with the Earl of Southampton proceeded to such lengths, that the rackets flew about each other's ears, though the king eventually made up the matter without bloodshed. After he had become lord chamberlain, Anthony Wood observes quaintly, that he broke many wiser heads than his own. This remark refers principally to his unjustifiable attack upon May, the translator of Lucan. The poet, (who was also a gentleman of some consideration in his time,) while a mask was being performed in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, happening to push accidentally against the chamberlain, the latter instantly lifted his staff, and broke it over May's shoulders. Wood says, that had it not been for the earl's office, and the place they were in, "it might have been a question whether the earl would ever have struck again." An account of the fracas is related by Mr. Garrard in one of his gossiping letters to the Earl of Strafford, dated 27th February, 1633:—"Mr. May of Gray's Inn, a fine poet, he who translated Lucan, came athwart my lord chamberlain in the Banqueting House, who broke his staff over his shoulders, not knowing who he was, the king present, who knew him, for he calls him his poet, and told the chamberlain of it, who sent for him the next morning, and fairly excused himself to him, and gave him fifty pounds in pieces: I believe he was thus indulgent for the name's sake." At the time of his well-known quarrel with Lord Mowbray, which took place in the House of Lords in 1641, he must have been nearly in his sixtieth year. Lord Clarendon says, that "from angry and disdainful words, an offer or attempt at blows was made." Probably a blow was really struck, for it is certain that Mowbray threw an inkstand at the thick head of his antagonist. They were both sent to the Tower by order of the lords, and Montgomery was in consequence deprived by the king of his post of chamberlain.

Early in life, Montgomery had himself received a lesson, which should have deterred him from assaulting others. In 1607, he had been publicly horse-whipped, on the race-course at Croydon, by Ramsey, a Scottish gentleman, afterwards created Earl of Holderness. 'This was the same Ramsey from whose hands, some years previously, the young Earl of Gowrie had met his death. The affray caused so much excitement at the time, that the English assembled together, resolving to make it a national quarrel: but Montgomery not offering to strike again, "nothing," says Osborne, "was spilt but the reputation of a gentleman; in lieu of which, if I am not mistaken, the king made him a knight, a baron, a viscount, and an earl in one day." Fortunately the truth of this story does not rest upon Osborne's statement, for, as the earl was never a viscount, and as he was knighted in 1604, and made an earl in 1605, long previous to this disgraceful affray, we might have been inclined to discredit the whole account, had it not been confidently related by other authors. Butler, in one of his amusing burlesques of the earl's parliamentary speeches, makes him, at a later period of his life, thus allude to the disgrace of his youth. "For my part, I'll have nothing to do with them. I cannot abide a Scot, for a Scot switched me once, and cracked my crown with my own staff, the virge of my lord chamberlainship, and now they are all coming to switch you too."

It is reported of Montgomery that he was so illiterate that he could scarcely write his own name, and yet he constantly gave his opinion on matters of taste, and insulted genius by patronising it. We must remember, however, that to be a patron of literature was formerly a requisite ingredient in the fashionable world. The titled coxcomb sauntered into his levee, at which the wretched author presented his work, and for a false and fulsome panegyric received a donation of a few pounds: the latter obtained a dinner, and the former a character for taste and benevolence. Such is the degree of credit which we may fairly allow to Montgomery, of which Osborne says, that "he was only 'fit for his own society, and such books as were dedicated to him.'" Heminge and Condell, however, dedicated to Montgomery, and to his brother Earl William, the first folio edition of Shakspeare's plays: speaking of them as "the most noble and incomparable pair of brothers, who, having prosecuted these trifles, and their author living with so much favour, would use a like indulgence towards them which they had done unto their parent." This is such high praise, and so dear to an Englishman is any thing connected with the name of Shakspeare, that we should be inclined to forgive many faults in a friend and patron of the immortal dramatist. Some importance, however, must be attached to the earl's well-known character for vanity, and very little indeed to the suspicious encomiums of a dedication.

Montgomery was twice married. In 1630, after the death of his first wife Lady Susan Vere, he united himself to Anne, widow of Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset, and heiress of the Cliffords, Earls of Cumberland. Under what circumstances this religious, munificent, and high-spirited lady, united herself to an absurd and profligate bully, we are not informed. It is certain, however, that their marriage was not a happy one; and as the earl became more profligate with increase of years, she was eventually compelled to insist on a separation. The countess, who survived him many years, is probably best known by her famous letter to Sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of state to Charles II. when he applied to her to nominate a member for the borough of Appleby:

"I have been bullied by a usurper, I have been neglected by a court, but I will not be dictated to by a subject: your man sha'n't stand.

"ANN DORSET,

"PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY."

Had Montgomery contented himself with being a profligate, a gambler, a fool, or a coward; had he been satisfied with tyrannising over his wife, or with cudgeling, or being cudgelled, he would have avoided in a great degree the contempt and obloquy with which his name has been burdened. But when we find him turning rebel, and becoming an ungrateful apostate to the prince who had raised him, words are scarcely sufficient to express our indignation and contempt. In 1649, though a peer of England, he sat as a member, for Berkshire, in the republican House of Commons, and was subsequently one of the council of state after the beheading of King Charles. Butler celebrates the earl's apostasy with his usual humour.

"Pembroke's a covenanting lord,
That ne'er with God or man kept word;
One day he'd swear he'd serve the king,
The next 'twas quite another thing;
Still changing with the wind and tide,
'That he might keep the stronger side;
His hawks and hounds were all his care,
For them he made his daily care,
And scarce would lose a hunting season,
Even for the sake of darling treason.
Had you but heard what thunderclaps,
Broke out of his and Oldsworth's chaps,
Of oaths and horrid execration,
Oft with, but oftener without passion.
You'd think these senators were sent
From hell to sit in parliament."

This Goth was actually selected by the parliament to reform the University of Oxford. The speech which he made to the senate of the university on this occasion, was admirably ridiculed in a pasquinade of the period, of which we cannot refrain from giving an extract. It is just the sort of composition which one would have expected from so silly a man, while it particularly reflects on an inveterate habit of swearing, which is known to have formed another offensive trait in his character.

"My Visitors,

"I am glad to see this day; I hope it will never end, for I am your chancellor. Some say I am not your chancellor, but dam me, they lye, for my brother was so before me, and none but rascals would rob me of my birthright. They think the Marquis of Hertford is Chancellor of Oxford, because, forsooth, the university chose him. 'Sdeath, I set here by ordinance of Parliament, and judge ye, gentlemen, whether he or I look like a chancellor. I'll prove he is a party, for he himself is a scholar; he has Greek and Latin, but all the world knows I can scarce write or read; dam me, this writing and reading has caused all this blood. I thank God, and I thank you; I thank God I am come at last, and I thank you for giving me a gilded bible; you could not give me a better book, dam me, I think so: I love the bible, though I seldom use it; I say I love it, and a man's affection is the best member about him; I can love it though I cannot read it, as you, Dr. Wilkinson, love preaching, though you never preach."

If this extract be not sufficient, the reader may turn to the posthumous works of Samuel Butler, the author of Hudibras, who has made himself very merry with the earl's fantastic oratory. Indeed, so absurd were his speeches, both in the House of Lords and elsewhere, that they became a common joke at the period, and agreeably employed the wits in turning them into lampoons and ridicule.

Instead of reforming others, the time was approaching when the earl might, with more propriety, have thought of reforming himself. He died on the 23d of January, 1690; not quite a year after the master whom he had deserted. He is said to have indulged in a pursuit almost as ridiculous as himself: he collected a vast number of portraits with a view to the study of physiognomy, in which he is stated to have made so great a proficiency, that James, placing an absurd faith in his discrimination, was believed to have employed him to discover the characters of foreign ambassadors on their first appearance at court.

In a scarce lampoon of the period, the following lines are recommended for Montgomery's epitaph:

"Here lies the mirror of our age for treason,
Who, in his life, was void of sense and reason,
The Commons' fool, a knave in every thing;
A traitor to his master, lord, and king:
A man whose virtues were to whore and swear,
God damn him was his constant daily prayer."

JAMES HAY,

EARL OF CARLISLE.

This magnificent personage, who shared so largely both the royal favour and the public purse, was the son of a private gentleman in Scotland. He was educated in France, and is said to have belonged to the famous Scottish guard, which was formerly maintained by the French monarch. At the accession of James he hastened over to England, trusting that his showy person and foreign accomplishments would obtain for him these substantial favours, which most of his countrymen expected, and many obtained. He is said to have been introduced to James by the French ambassador.

His rise was rapid, and not altogether undeserved. The elegance of his manners, his taste for dress and splendour, and a natural sweetness of temper, quickly rendered him a favourite as well with the king as with his courtiers. Few have had wealth and honours more quickly showered upon them; and, with the exception of profuse expenditure, few have borne the smiles of fortune with more modesty and discretion. He shunned politics, which would have made him enemies; and, by his unaffected courtesy and extensive hospitality, obtained the good will of those who might otherwise have been his rivals. Though positive talent must be denied him, he possessed a strong sense and natural tact, which to a courtier are far more valuable than genius itself. He understood the king's character more thoroughly than any other man, and had sufficient shrewdness to perform, at least with credit, the various embassies with which he was afterwards entrusted. Wilson says of him: "He was a gentleman every way complete. His bounty was adorned with courtesy not affected, but resulting from a natural civility in him. His humbleness set him below the envy of most, and his bounty brought him into esteem with many."

He was raised to the peerage in June, 1616, by the title of Lord Hay of Sawley; but without the issue of letters-patent, or a seat in the house of lords or Scottish parliament; he was also merely allowed precedence after the barons of Scotland. This singular kind of elevation would almost appear to have originated in a freak of King James; for the creation, we are informed, took place in the presence of witnesses, at nine o'clock at night at Greenwich. In 1617, he was created Viscount Doncaster; and in 1622, Earl of Carlisle. He also obtained a grant of the island of Barbadoes, and became a knight of the Garter.

According to an old writer, King James, in his advancement of this favourite, merely repaid a debt which the royal family of Scotland had long owed to the Hays. "One Hay, his ancestor," writes Lloyd, "saved Scotland from an army of Danes, at Longcarty, with a yoke in his hand. James Hay, six hundred years after, saved the king of that country from the Gowries at their house, with a cutter in his hand: the first had as much ground assigned him by King Kenneth as a falcon could fly over at one flight, and the other as much land as he could ride round in two days." Lloyd also informs us, that the whole family fell, in former days, before Dublin Castle; and that the race would have been extinct for ever, but for a successful Cæsarian operation, which preserved the heir. To this circumstance, if it be true, the present Earl of Kinnoul, whose ancestor was the cousin and heir of James Hay, must be indebted for his existence and honours.

In the splendour of his embassies, the magnificence of his entertainment, and the excessive costliness of his dress, and other personal luxuries, the earl, at least in this country, has never been surpassed. In 1616, he was sent to Paris, to congratulate the King of France on his marriage with the Infanta of Spain; being furnished, at the same time, with some private instructions regarding the feasibility and advantages of a match between Prince Charles and a daughter of France. Nothing could exceed the magnificence of this celebrated mission, and consequently, on the first day of its appearance at court, the whole of Paris turned forth, as the spectators of English splendour. The heart of old Wilson warms as he describes the scene:—"Six trumpeters," he says, "and two marshals (in tawny velvet liveries, completely suited, laced all over with gold, rich and closely laid,) led the way; the ambassador followed with a great train of pages; and footmen, in the same rich livery, including his horse and the rest of his retinue, according to their qualities and degrees, in as much bravery as they could desire or procure, followed in couples, to the wonderment of the beholders. And some said (how truly I cannot assert,) the ambassador's horse was shod with silver shoes, lightly tacked on; and when he came to a place where persons or beauties of eminence were, his very horse, prancing and curvetting, in humble reverence flung his shoes away, which the greedy bystanders scrambled for, and he was content to be gazed on and admired, till a farrier, or rather the argentier, in one of his rich liveries, among his train of footmen, out of a tawny velvet bag took others and tacked them on, which lasted till he came to the next troop of grantees; and thus, with much ado, he reached the Louvre."

In 1619, he was sent ambassador to Germany, with a view of mediating between the emperor and the Bohemians. His progress to the northern court, in which he was attended by the choicest of the young nobility of England, was scarcely less magnificent than his former mission to the French king. The expenses of his two first meals, on landing at Rotterdam, amounted to a thousand guilders, about a hundred pounds sterling, while his carriages are said to have cost no less than sixty pounds a day. A singular instance of his munificence is recorded during this mission. An innkeeper of Dort, having calculated that the ambassador must pass through that town, had made sumptuous preparations for his entertainment. The earl, however, had chosen Utrecht for his route, and the zealous innkeeper was disappointed. The latter followed the embassy, introduced himself to the ambassador, and complained of the loss which he had sustained. The earl immediately gave him an order on his steward for thirty pounds.

Wilson informs us that the king was ashamed to tell the parliament how much money this embassy had cost, and therefore "minced the sum into a small proportion." James, it may be remarked, in his speech to parliament, in 1620, observes, that "my lord of Doncaster's journey had cost him three thousand five hundred pounds;" when it would appear from Wilson that the expenses could not have amounted to less than fifty or sixty thousand.

The earl's magnificence, however, failed at least on one occasion in exciting all the admiration he desired. In his progress to Germany, the vicinity of the Hague to Rotterdam (at which latter place he had landed,) rendered it necessary that he should pay a visit of ceremony to the Prince of Orange. It was no less imperative on the prince to invite him to dinner, and accordingly it was hinted to his highness, that for the entertainment of so splendid a guest, some addition to the usual fare would be requisite and proper. The prince, whose homely habits led him to despise the costly refinements of his expected guest, was perhaps not unwilling to have an opportunity of exhibiting his contempt. Accordingly, he called for the bill of fare, and observing that only one pig was nominated in the bill, commanded the steward to put down another,—the only addition which he could be prevailed upon to make. Besides the general homeliness of such an entertainment, it is necessary, in order to give point to the story, to include a remark of Wilson's, "that this dish is not very pleasing to the Scottish nation for the most part;" an antipathy which, it seems, is still partially prevalent in Scotland.

In 1621, the earl was again sent to France, in order to mediate between Louis XIII. and the French Protestants; he was also at Madrid during the matrimonial visit of Prince Charles, and corresponded with King James; but that he was employed officially is not probable. It may be here remarked, that, notwithstanding the earl's talents for diplomacy were at least respectable, not one of his three missions was attended with success.

His splendid folly with regard to costume even Lord Clarendon has condescended to mention. "He was surely," says his lordship, "a man of the greatest expense in his own person of any in the age he lived, and introduced more of that expense in the excess of clothes and diet than any other man; and was, indeed, the original of all those inventions, from which others did but transcribe copies." Arthur Wilson tells us, that "one of the meanest of his suits was so fine as to look like romance." This particular dress the historian saw, and thus describes:—"The cloak and hose were made of very fine white beaver, embroidered richly all over with gold and silver; the cloak, almost to the cape, within and without, having no lining but embroidery; the doublet was cloth of gold, embroidered so thick that it could not be discerned; and a white beaver hat suitable, brimful of embroidery, both above and below."

But it was in his feasts and entertainments that his extravagant prodigality shone most conspicuously. Like the emperor Heliogabalus, he seems to have thought that what was cheaply obtained was scarcely worth eating. Since the days when that purpled profligate smothered his guests in rooms filled with roses, more fantastic hospitality can hardly be recorded. Osborne's account of one of the earl's banquets is too curious not to be inserted in his own words:—"The Earl of Carlisle was one of the quorum that brought in the vanity of ante-suppers, not heard of in our forefathers' time, and, for aught I have read, or at least remember, unpractised by the most luxurious tyrants. The manner of which was to have the board covered, at the first entrance of the guests, with dishes as high as a tall man could well reach, and dearest viands sea or land could afford: and all this once seen, and having feasted the eyes of the invited, was in a manner thrown away, and fresh set on the same height, having only this advantage of the other, that it was hot. I cannot forget one of the attendants of the king, that, at a feast made by this monster of excess, eat to his single share a whole pye, reckoned to my lord at ten pounds, being composed of ambergrease, magesterial of pearl, musk, &c.; yet was so far (as he told me) from being sweet in the morning, that he almost poisoned his whole family. And yet, after such suppers, huge banquets no less profuse, a waiter returning his servant home with a cloak-bag full of dried sweetmeats and comfits, valued to his lordship at more than ten shillings the pound. I am cloyed with the repetition of this excess, no less than scandalised at the continuance of it."

Weldon mentions another banquet which was given by the earl in honour of the French ambassador, "in which," he says, "was such plenty, and fish of that immensity brought out of Muscovy, that dishes were made to contain them, (no dishes before in all England could near hold them,) after that a costly voyde, and after that a masque of choice noblemen and gentlemen, and after that a most costly and magnificent banquet, the king, lords, and all the prime gentlemen then about London being invited thither." The immense fish were probably sturgeon. The necessity of waiting for the manufacture of the dishes could scarcely have improved their flavour.

James, not satisfied with heaping on his favourite unbounded wealth, secured for him, by especial mediation, one of the most wealthy heiresses of the period. This lady was Honora, sole daughter of Edward Lord Denny, subsequently created, in 1626, Earl of Norwich, by Charles the First.

After the decease of his countess, of whom little or nothing has been recorded, the earl remarried, 6th November, 1617, Lucy, daughter of Henry, eighth Earl of Northumberland, a beautiful coquette, whose memoir more properly belongs to the succeeding reign. This Northumberland was the "stout old earl," who had been fined 30,000*l.* and committed to the Tower for life, on account of his suspected share in the Gunpowder Treason. He was still a prisoner at the period of his daughter's marriage, to which he not only withheld his consent, but afterwards refused to aid them with his purse: nothing, he said, should induce him to give his daughter to "a beggarly Scot," or supply them with a groat. They were married in the presence of the king. The bridegroom shortly afterwards obtained the release of his father-in-law from prison, but even then it was with the greatest difficulty that the independent old earl could be induced to consent to a meeting.

After the death of James the First, we know little of the history of his gorgeous favourite. That he was not, however, entirely overlooked, is evident from his having been made first gentleman of the bed-chamber to Charles the First, in 1633.* He died on the 25th of April, 1636, the ruling passion of his life still strong even in death. "When the most able physicians," says Osborne, "and his own weakness had passed a judgment that he could not live many days, he did not forbear his entertainments, but made divers brave clothes, as he said, to outface naked and despicable death withal." The workings of the human mind are often fantastic and bewildering; but how strange must have been the conceptions of that man, who, in such a moment, could connect velvets and embroideries with skeletons and the grave! The progress of the earl's last illness is more than once referred to by Garrard, in his letters to Lord Strafford. On the 15th of March he writes, "Sunday night last, the 13th of this month, my lord of Carlisle was dying, his speech gone, his eyes dark: he knew none about him, but in two or three hours he came out of this trance, and came to his senses again. Now he thinks he shall die, which before he did not, and is well prepared for it, having assistances from the best divines in town. His debts are great, above 80,000*l*. He has left his lady well near 5,000*l*. a year, the import of the wines in Ireland, for which they say she may have 20,000*l*. ready money, and 2,000*l*. pension, newly confirmed to her by the king: little or nothing comes to his son. The physicians keep him alive with cordials, but they are of opinion that he cannot last many days." His funeral, probably according to his own directions, was magnificent.

Lodge remarks, that "notwithstanding his expensive absurdities, the earl left a very large fortune, partly derived from his marriage with the heiress of the Lords Denny, but more from the king's unlimited bounty." The fact, though not of much importance, scarcely appears to be corroborated by contemporary writers. Lord Clarendon says especially, that he left neither "a house nor an acre of land to be remembered by;" and yet both Clarendon and Weldon estimate the sums heaped on him by James as amounting to four hundred thousand pounds.

With all his faults,—with all his folly and boundless expenditure, the spendthrift earl has still some claims to be a favourite. Civility and common sense preserved him from the fate of Somerset and of Buckingham. He was modest, generous, and hospitable; neither depressed by adversity, nor elated by prosperity. Sir William Davenant says of him, in a copy of verses addressed to his widow,—

* Clarendon, vol. iii. p. 140. It appears strange at first sight that Carlisle, who was a peer, should have been made a gentleman of the bed-chamber. We find, however, that as late as George I. the Duke of Hamilton was merely styled first gentleman, as was also the Duke of Lauderdale in the reign of Charles the Second. Formerly the title of gentleman implied, in its strictest sense, nobility.

Cheerful his age, not tedious or severe,
Like those, who being dull, would grave appear.

If he was not generally beloved, he was at least generally popular. If he spent largely, it was agreeably with the tastes and wishes of his sovereign; and if we are compelled to look upon him as a voluptuary, he was a sensualist without being selfish, and a courtier without being insolent.

FRANCIS LORD BACON,

EARL OF ST. ALBANS.

To enter into any lengthened details respecting the life of Lord Bacon might be considered a reflection on the reader; still it may not be inexpedient to introduce some scattered anecdotes relating to an extraordinary man, over whose mighty mind and corrupt heart the Christian lingers with sorrow, the moralist with wonder, and the world at large with regret:—a man whom it is now difficult to praise, yet whom, but for some lamentable weaknesses, it would have been almost as difficult not to idolise:—

If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined,
The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind.

Lord Bacon was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Keeper of the Great Seal to Queen Elizabeth, and of Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, tutor to King Edward the Sixth: this lady has been extolled by her contemporaries for her piety and mental accomplishments. Bacon was born, January 22, 1561, at York House in the Strand, formerly the residence of the Bishops of Norwich, and afterwards of the Villiers, Dukes of Buckingham.

Lloyd says, that "he was a courtier from his cradle to his grave, sucking in experience with his milk, being inured to policy as early as to his grammar." When a boy, Queen Elizabeth took much notice of him, admired his ingenious answers, and, alluding to the post held by his father, used to style him familiarly her young Lord Keeper. She once inquired the age of the gifted boy, to which he replied readily, that "he was two years younger than her majesty's happy reign."

It was remarked by the famous Earl of Salisbury: that Raleigh was a good orator though a bad writer;—Northampton a good writer, though a bad orator:—but that Bacon excelled in both. Howell, who must have often listened to his oratory, speaks of him as "the eloquentest that was born in this isle."

He had the art of leading a man to the subject in which he was the most conversant. His memory was astonishing, yet he argued, said Lloyd, rather from observation and his own reasonings than from books. He spent four hours every morning in study, during which period he never allowed himself to be interrupted.

Ben Jonson and Richard Earl of Dorset were among the number of his friends. The latter was so great an admirer of his genius, that, according to Aubrey, he employed Sir Thomas Billingsley (the celebrated horseman) to write down whatever fell from the lips of the great philosopher in his social discourse. He liked to compose in his garden, accompanied either by a friend or amanuensis, who instantly committed his thoughts to paper. Among others whom he thus employed was Thomas Hobbes, of Malmesbury. Aubrey informs us that this person was so beloved by his lord, that he "was wont to have him walk with him in his delicate groves when he did meditate, and when a notion darted into his mind, Mr. Hobbes was presently to write it down: and his lord was wont to say that he did it better than any one else about him, for that many times, when he read their notes, he scarce understood what they writ, because they understood it not clearly themselves."

His information on all subjects was astonishing. "I have heard him," says Osborne, in his advice to his son, "entertain a country lord in the proper terms relating to hawks and dogs; and at another time out-cant a London surgeon." Of money, he said, it was like manure, of no use till it was spread.

Sometimes he would have music in the room adjoining that in which he composed. He was also accustomed to drink strong beer before going to bed; in order, we are told, "to lay his working fancy asleep, which otherwise would keep him waking a great part of the night." Sir Edward Coke, though he affected to undervalue him as a lawyer, appears to have been envious of his talent.

We are assured by Lloyd that Bacon always fainted at an eclipse of the moon.

His manner of living was superb in the extreme, especially when he was left regent of the kingdom during the progress of King James into Scotland, when he gave audience to the foreign ambassadors, in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, almost with regal splendour. An eye said: "The aviary at York House was built by his lordship, and cost 300*l*. Every meal, according to the season of the year, he had his table strewn with sweet herbs and flowers, which he said did refresh his spirits and memory. When he was at his country-house at Gorhambury, St. Albans seemed as if the court had been there, so nobly did he live. His servants had liveries with his crest; his watermen were more employed by gentlemen than even the king's. King James sent a buck to him, and he gave the keeper 50*l*." Howell, in his letters, mentions a similar instance of his liberality, on his receiving a buck from one of the royal domains. He sent for the under-keeper who had brought the present, and "having drunk the king's health unto him in a great silver gilt bowl," gave it to him as his fee.

Lord Bacon was not satisfied with common venality, but occasionally sold his decisions to both parties. Sir Symonds D'Ewes, however, says, that if he was the instrument of mischief, it was rather from those about him than his own nature, "which his very countenance promised to be affable and gentle." There is no doubt that this great dispenser of justice was duped in the grossest manner by his own servants: these people, we are told, robbed him at the bottom of the table, while he himself sat immersed in philosophical reveries at the upper end. Three of his servants kept their coaches, and more than one maintained race-horses in their establishments. A splendid casket of jewels, presented to him by the East India merchants, was embezzled, without his discovering it, by his own page. When the fact was mentioned to him, that his servants had actually purloined money from his closet: "Ah! poor men," he said, "that is their portion." When he returned home, after the knowledge of his disgrace, his servants, rising, as usual, in the hall to receive him: "Ah!" he said, "your rise has been my fall." When they shortly afterwards deserted him, he compared them to vermin which quit a house when their instinct tells them it is about to fall.

How extraordinary and how humiliating to human nature must have been that scene, when the great philosopher stood a cringing suppliant to his peers, "prostrating himself and sins;" craving pardon of God and his fellows, and promising to amend that life which apparently, but for such exposure, would have been transmitted to posterity as proud and faultless as his genius. When he delivered the great seal to the four peers who had been commissioned to receive it:—"It was the king's favour," he said, "that gave me this: and it is through my own fault that he has taken it away." When the instrument was delivered to James, he muttered some words respecting his difficulty in selecting a successor—"As to my lawyers," he said, "they are all knaves."

Bacon was apparently little distressed by his fall. Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, happening to encounter him immediately after that event, with equal bad taste and bad feeling, wished him, ironically, a merry Easter!—"And to you, signior," replied Bacon, "I wish a merry Pass-over!" The reply not only comprehended a wish that the ambassador were well out of the kingdom, but alluded to his supposed Jewish origin, the greatest insult which could have been offered to a Spaniard.

Charles, at that time Prince of Wales, chanced to meet Bacon in his coach shortly after his fall. The disgraced chancellor was retiring to the seclusion of his own house at Gorhambury, but accompanied with a train of horsemen, such as would have done honour to him in his prouder days. "Do all we can," remarked the prince, "this man scorns to go out like the snuff of a candle."

We should be far more inclined to forgive the gross corruption of this eminent man, but for his infamous ingratitude to his kindest, stanchest, and most disinterested friend, the unfortunate Earl of Essex: his treatment of that unhappy nobleman would have been disgraceful in a savage. It may be here remarked, that a far more detestable crime, even than ingratitude, has been laid to the charge of Lord Bacon; the details of which are given so minutely by Sir Symonds D'Ewes, that it is impossible not to attach some credit to the accusation.

Many false aspersions, however, have undoubtedly been cast on his name. Among others may be mentioned a story of Sir Anthony Weldon's, whose remarks are as scurrilous as his tale is undoubtedly untrue. A misunderstanding, he informs us, happening to exist between the chancellor and the Duke of Buckingham, the former, being desirous of obtaining an interview with the favourite, was kept waiting, during two successive days, in an apartment appropriated to the lowest menials in the duke's household. Weldon affirms, that he himself saw him in this situation, seated on a wooden chest, with the chancellor's purse and seal lying beside him; and that he subsequently discovered from one of the servants that this indignity was imposed by the express orders of the duke. He adds, that when the chancellor was at length admitted into the presence of Buckingham, he threw himself prostrate on the ground and kissed the duke's feet. Judging from what we know of Lord Bacon's character, and especially from his letters to Buckingham, there is certainly no circumstance which tends in any way to support the charge of Weldon, either of such gross subserviency on the one hand, or so much insolence on the other. Bacon's manly and beautiful letter of advice to Buckingham, on his first coming into power, is certainly alone sufficient to rescue him from the absurd aspersions of a prejudiced scandal-monger.

Although the loss of power and place reduced him to a state of comparative poverty, the stories which are related of his being actually in distress and want are no doubt considerably exaggerated. Wilson informs us that after his disgrace, he lived in obscurity in his house in Gray's Inn, and was in want to the last. The same writer embellishes his narrative with a curious tale. The beer he informs us, in Lord Bacon's house being of a very bad quality, he occasionally sent to Sir Fulk Greville, (Lord Brook,) who resided in the neighbourhood, for a bottle of his lordship's beer. This boon, after considerable grumbling, the butler had at last positive orders to deny: "so sordid," adds Wilson, "was the man who had advanced himself to be called the friend of Sir Philip Sidney, and so friendless was the other after he had fallen from his high estate!"*

The degradation of this wonderful genius, while it distressed the good and gratified the evil, could even afford merriment to the wretched punsters of the age. Alluding alike to his misconduct and his poverty, his new titles of Verulam and St. Albans were easily converted into Very-lame and St. All-bones. In the height of his distress, his neighbours in the country good-naturedly came forward, and offered to purchase an oak wood on his property. "No," said Lord Bacon, "I will not sell my feathers."

Park has rescued from obscurity a copy of verses of no slight merit, the production of some philosophical poet of former days, who thus laments over the downfall of a great man:—

Dazzled thus with height of place,
While our hopes our wits beguile,
No man marks the narrow space
Twixt a prison and a smile.

Then since Fortune's favours fade,
You that in her arms do sleep,
Learn to swim and not to wade,
For the hearts of kings are deep.

But if greatness be so blind
As to trust in towers of air;
Let it be with goodness lined,
That at least the fall be fair.

Then though darken'd, you shall say
When friends fall off, and princes frown;
Virtue is the roughest way,
But proves at night a bed of down.

Lord Bacon was himself a poet. Those who may be curious to see him in this light, will find some specimens of his muse in Park's "Noble Authors," and also in Aubrey's "Letters of Eminent Men."

Wilson describes Lord Bacon as of a middling stature, his "presence grave and comely;" but adds that he early wore the appearance of old age. Aubrey says, "he had a delicate, lively, hazel eye: Dr. Harvey told me it was like the eye of a viper." The same writer relates one or two characteristic anecdotes of this extraordinary man. He was once watching some fishermen from the garden at York House, and offered them a certain sum for the results of their draught, which they refused, considering it insufficient. On drawing up their net, they found that it only contained two or three small fish. Lord Bacon told them they had better have accepted his offer. The men replied that they had hoped for better success. "Hope," said his lordship, "is a good breakfast, but a bad supper." According to Aubrey, none of his servants dared to appear before him except in boots of Spanish leather:—he could always detect common leather, which was extremely offensive to his nerves.

When the Bishop of London cut down some fine trees at the Episcopal Palace at Fulham, Bacon told him that he was a good expounder of dark places.

When some person hinted to him that it was time to look about him, "Sir," was his reply, "I do not look about me; I look above me."

Queen Elizabeth, when on a visit to Lord Bacon at Redgrave, happened to make an observation on the small size of his house:—"Madam," he replied, "my house is small; but it is you who have made me too great for it."

King James, says Howell, once asked his opinion of a French ambassador who had recently arrived. Bacon replied that he thought him a tall well-looking man.—"But what do you think of his head-piece?" asked the king. "Sir," said Bacon, "tall men are like houses of four or five stories, wherein, commonly, the uppermost room is worst furnished." I do not know whether this was the same French ambassador, who told Lord Bacon, on their first introduction, that he had always compared him to an angel, of whom he had heard and read much, but had never seen. Bacon replied modestly, that "if the charity of others compared him to an angel, his own infirmities told him that he was a man." If Bacon can at all be compared to an angel, it must certainly be to a fallen one.

In January, 1620, being then in the commencement of his sixtieth year, we find him keeping his birth-day with some magnificence at York House, the scene of his early life, and the favourite residence of his age. His old friend, Ben Jonson, celebrated the occasion with his vigorous muse. It was a kind, and at that period, a valuable mark of respect, to the disgraced minister. Though the lines are occasionally harsh, the compliment is felicitously introduced.

Hail, happy genius of this ancient pile!
How comes it all things so about thee smile?
The fire, the wine, the men! and in the midst
Thou stand'st, as if some mystery thou didst!
Pardon, I read it in thy face, the day
For whose returns, and many, all these pray:
And so do I. This is the sixtieth year
Since Bacon and thy lord, was born, and here;
Son to the grave, wise keeper of the seal,
Fame and foundation of the English weal.
What then his father was, that since is he,
Now with a little more to the degree.
England's high chancellor, the destined heir
In his soft cradle to his father's chair,
Whose even thread the Fates spin round and full,
Out of their choicest and their whitest wool.
'Tis a brave cause of joy, let it be known,
For 'twere a narrow gladness, kept thine own.
Give me a deep-crown'd bowl, that I may sing,
In raising him, the wisdom of my king.

Aubrey informs us, on the authority of Thomas Hobbes, that Bacon owed his death to his indiscreet eagerness in pursuing a philosophical experiment. He happened to be taking the air in his coach near Highgate, when an idea came into his head that flesh might be preserved in snow as well as in salt. The snow at the time lying thick on the ground, he resolved to make the experiment; but "staid so long in doing it," that he was seized with a shivering fit, and was obliged to be carried to Lord Arundel's house at Highgate. Unfortunately he was placed in a damp bed, by which his disorder was so much aggravated that he died in a few days.

His death took place on the 9th of April, 1626. Conformably with his own wishes, he was buried near the remains of his mother, in St. Michael's Church, St. Albans, the only place of worship in the ancient Verulam. His secretary, Thomas Meauty, erected over him a monument of white marble, to which Sir Henry Wotton supplied the inscription. Howell writes to Dr. Prichard, "My Lord Chancellor Bacon is lately dead of a languishing weakness; he died so poor, that he scarce left money to bury him; which though he had a great wit, did argue no great wisdom, it being one of the essential properties of a wise man to provide for the main chance. I have read, that it hath been the fortune of all poets commonly to die beggars; but for an orator, a lawyer, and a philosopher, as he was, to die so, is rare. It seems the same fate befel him that attended Demosthenes, Seneca, and Cicero, (all great men,) of whom the two first fell by corruption. The fairest diamond may have a flaw in it; but I believe he died poor out of a contempt of the pelf of fortune, as also out of an excess of generosity." It may be remarked that the number and value of the legacies which he bequeathed by his last will, has led to a disbelief of Bacon's poverty. Dr. Lingard, however, justly observes, that "as his executors refused to act, it may induce a suspicion that he left not wherewith to pay them."

Not many years after the death of Bacon his grave was opened, and one King, a physician, became possessed of his skull. Fuller tells us that this remarkable relic was treated by King with "derision and scorn;" but the man, he adds, who "then derided the dead, is since become the laughing-stock of the living."

Lord Bacon is described as having borne adversity with as little moderation as he had done prosperity; and as having exhibited a pitiful and mean-spirited subserviency in his intercourse with the great. To this accusation, his letters to King James, after his fall, certainly attach some weight. In an appeal which he addressed to Prince Charles, there was a passage which had more wit than reverence,—he said that, "as the father had been his creator, he hoped the son would be his redeemer." The name of Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn Lane, still points out the spot where one of the residences of Bacon once stood.

EDWARD LORD HERBERT,

OF CHERBURY.

The life of Lord Herbert, of Cherbury, written by himself, is one of the most curious works of the kind that has ever issued from the press. Who can read without delight a narrative, and such a narrative, too, of the private foibles and most secret thoughts of the soldier, the statesman, the wit, and the philosopher? That he was truth itself, is undoubted; and if his vanity sometimes occasions a smile, we must bear in mind the peculiar features of the period in which he lived. We must remember that chivalry was not then extinct, and that the smiles of beauty, and the honours of battle, were considered as indispensable in conferring not only reputation, but respect. Gifted by nature with wit, beauty, and talent, and possessing courage almost amounting to a fault, can we wonder that, in a martial and romantic age, Lord Herbert should have engaged the hearts of women, almost as universally as he won for himself the respect of men. If he speaks somewhat ostentatiously of his own merits, at least with equal candour he lays open to us his faults. His literary reputation is so well established, that comment would be tiresome, and praise superfluous.

Lord Herbert was born in 1581. According to Anthony Wood, his birth-place was a "most pleasant and romantic spot in Wales, called Montgomery Castle, the seat of his father, Richard Herbert." But this is a mistake. Lord Herbert himself informs us that he was born at Eyton, in Shropshire, the residence of his mother's family, the Newports. At the age of fourteen, he went to University College, Oxford, from whence he proceeded on his travels. At the coronation of James the First, he was made a Knight of the Bath, and in 1616, was sent ambassador to Paris to intercede for the French Protestants. He held this important post for five years, when his famous quarrel with the constable Luines procured his recall. In 1625, he was created by James I. Baron Herbert, of Castle Island, in Ireland; and in 1629, Lord Herbert, of Cherbury, in Shropshire, by Charles the First. On the 28th of February, 1598, when only seventeen, he was married to a daughter of Sir William Herbert, of St. Gillian's. The match seems to have been one of convenience; the lady, among other circumstances, being six years older than himself.

Lord Herbert made his first appearance in London in his nineteenth year. "Curiosity," he says, "rather than ambition, brought me to court; and as it was the manner of those times for all men to kneel down before the great Queen Elizabeth, who then reigned, I was likewise upon my knees in the presence chamber, when she passed by to the chapel at Whitehall. As soon as she saw me, she stopped; and swearing her usual oath, demanded, who is this? Every body there present looked upon me, but no man knew me, till Sir James Croft, a pensioner, finding the queen stayed, returned back and told who I was, and that I had married Sir William Herbert of St. Gillian's daughter: the queen hereupon looked attentively upon me; and swearing again her ordinary oath, said, it is a pity he was married so young; and thereupon gave her hand to kiss twice, both times gently clapping me on the cheek."

Lord Herbert's account of his being invested with the Order of the Bath, throws a curious light on the manners of the time. The placing the spur upon the right heel, was then an important part of the ceremony. His esquire, he informs us, was standing near him, prepared to perform the office, when the Earl of Shrewsbury himself kindly approached him: "Cousin," he said, "I believe you will be a good knight, and therefore I will put on your spur;" whereupon, after my most humble thanks for so great a favour, I held up my leg against the wall, and he put on my spur.

He then proceeds to describe the nature of the oath which he was called upon to take,— "Never," he says, "to sit in a place where injustice shall be done, without righting it to the utmost of my power, and particularly ladies and gentlemen that shall be wronged in their honour, if they demand assistance, and many other points not unlike the romances of knight-errant."

"The second day to wear robes of crimson taffeta, and so ride from St. James's to Whitehall, with our esquires before us; and the third day to wear a gown of purple satin, upon the left sleeve whereof is fastened certain strings, weaved of white silk and gold, tied in a knot, and tassels of the same,* which all the knights are obliged to wear until they have done something famous in arms, or till some lady of honour take it off, and fasten it on her sleeve, saying, 'I will answer he shall prove a good knight.' I had not long worn this string, but a principal lady of the court, and certainly in most men's opinions the handsomest, took mine off, and said she would pledge her honour for mine. I do not name this lady; because some passages happened afterwards which oblige me to silence, though nothing could be justly said to her prejudice or wrong."

It is curious to discover to how late a period of our history the spirit of knight-errantry descended. A Knight of the Bath at the present day may have achieved the insignia of his order at Waterloo or Trafalgar: he has won them, perhaps, by good and brave deeds, but little more is allotted to him than the merit of preserving them unstained. But, even as late as the days of James, there still existed that Quixotic enthusiasm, and that high standard of honour, which, however we may be disposed to regard them as fantastic, were once practised by the wisest and the best, and threw an undefinable interest over the social relations of former times. Let us see by what obligations a philosopher and historian, such as Lord Herbert, considered himself bound. The following circumstance occurred during one of his visits to the castle of Merlon, the residence of the Constable de Montmorency, whither he had been invited by the constable's daughter, the Duchess de Vantadour. "Passing," he says, "two or three days here, it happened one evening that a daughter of the dukes, of about ten or eleven years of age, going one evening from the castle to walk in the meadows, myself, with divers French gentlemen, attended her, and some gentlemen that were with her: this young lady wearing a knot of riband on her head, a French cavalier took it suddenly and fastened it to his hat-band; the young lady offended herewith, demands her riband, but he refusing to restore it, the young lady, addressing herself to me, said, 'Monsieur, I pray get my riband from that gentleman.' Hereupon, going towards him, I courteously, with my hat in my hand, desired him to do me the honour that I may deliver the lady her riband or bouquet again; but he roughly answering me, 'Do you think I will give it to you, when I have refused it to her?' I replied, 'Nay then, sir, I will make you restore it by force,' whereupon also, putting on my hat, and reaching at his, he, to save himself, ran away, and after a long course in the meadow, finding that I had almost overtaken him, he turned short, and running to the young lady, was about to put the riband in her hand, when I, seizing upon his arm, said to the young lady, 'It was I that gave it.' 'Pardon me,' quoth she, 'it is he that gives it me.' I then said, 'Madam, I will not contradict you; but if he dare to say that I did not constrain him to give it, I will fight with him.' The French gentleman answered nothing thereunto for the present, and so conducted the young lady again to the castle. The next day, I desired Mr. Aurelian Townsend to tell the French cavalier that either he must confess that I constrained him to restore the riband, or fight with me; but the gentleman seeing him unwilling to accept of this challenge, went out from the place, whereupon I followed him, some of the gentlemen that belonged to the constable taking notice hereof, acquainted him therewith, who sending for the French cavalier, checked him well for his sauciness in taking the riband away from his grandchild, and afterwards bid him depart his house; and this was all that I ever heard of the gentleman with whom I proceeded in that manner, because I thought myself obliged thereunto by the oath taken when I was made Knight of the Bath, as I formerly related upon this occasion."

* This custom of fastening a knot or riband of white silk to the left shoulder of the knight, is as old as the time of Henry the Fourth, the supposed founder of the order. Froissart says, that at his coronation, that monarch created forty-six knights, to whom he gave "long green coats, the sleeves whereof were cut straight, and furred with minever, and with great hoods or chaperons furred in the same manner, and after the fashion used by prelates; and every one of these knights on his left shoulder had a double cordon, or string of white silk, to which white tassels were pendent." The Appendix to Anstie's "Observations on the Knighthood of the Bath," affords a curious picture of the ceremonies of investiture, in the reign of James the First.

Lord Herbert afterwards mentions another instance of similar gallantry on his part, which occurred in the apartments of Anne of Denmark. A Scottish gentleman had snatched a riband from Miss Middlemore, a maid of honour, who begged Lord Herbert to procure its restitution. The delinquent refusing to part with it, Lord Herbert seized him by the throat, and had almost succeeded in throwing him down, when they were separated by the bystanders. Their subsequent meeting in Hyde Park was prevented by an injunction of the lords of the council.

Lord Orford says of Lord Herbert, that "he returned the insolence of the great Constable Luines with the spirit of a gentleman, without committing his dignity of ambassador." This quarrel is a memorable one. The French king, Louis the Thirteenth, was preparing vigorous measures against his protestant subjects, in whose favour Lord Herbert had been sent to mediate. His instructions were to obtain his end, if possible, by peaceable persuasions, or, should that appear impracticable, to enforce his arguments by threats. Having obtained an interview with the constable, he explained to him calmly the great interest which the court of England took in this religious warfare. De Luines inquired rudely by what right the king, his master, interfered in their affairs. "The king, my master," replied the ambassador, "oweth an account of his reasons to no man; and for myself, it is sufficient that I obey him." He added, however, "that if the question were asked in more courteous terms, he was willing to satisfy him on the subject." "We will have none of your advices," replied the constable. "That," said Lord Herbert, "is a sufficient answer; and I am now charged to inform you, that we know very well what to do." "We do not fear you," said De Luines. "If you had said that you did not love us, I should have believed you," said the ambassador. "By G—," retorted the constable, "if you were not an ambassador I would treat you after another fashion." "If I am an ambassador," said Lord Herbert, "I am also a gentleman, and this," laying his hand upon his sword, "shall be my answer." He then rose from his chair and went towards the door, to which De Luines, with a show of civility, offered to accompany him; but Lord Herbert told him, that after such language there was no need of ceremony.

He remained some days in the town, expecting to hear from the constable; but instead of a hostile message, he was informed by the Mareschal de St. Geran, that having mortally offended the minister, he was in no place of security. "As long as my sword is by my side," said Lord Herbert, "I am in a place of safety." The constable, in order to lay a formal complaint against Lord Herbert, eventually procured his own brother to be sent ambassador extraordinary into England, and Lord Herbert was in consequence recalled. On his return to England, he obtained an audience of King James; and having cleared himself of the charges which had been brought against him, requested his majesty's permission to send a trumpeter to the constable, challenging him to single combat. The king told him that he would consider of it; but the constable shortly afterwards died, and the gallant philosopher returned to Paris.

The strictest respecter of truth may unconsciously give too fair a colouring to a narrative of his own conduct. Perhaps De Luines was not altogether to blame. Certainly Lord Herbert was a hot-headed man, and Camden even goes so far as to make him the party most to blame, observing pointedly that he treated the constable with irreverence.

Lord Herbert is generally described as a very handsome man: Aubrey alone, who had been frequently in his society, speaks of him as a "black man:" the whole-length engraving of him, from the original by Oliver, which forms the frontispiece of Dodsley's edition of his life, affords the same idea of his swarthinness.

It may not be generally known, that among his other accomplishments, Lord Herbert was no indifferent poet. There is an elegant copy of verses by him, entitled—

AN ODE

UPON THE QUESTION MOVED, WHETHER LOVE SHOULD CONTINUE FOR EVER!

'The two opening stanzas are very pleasing:

Having interr'd her infant birth,
The watery Ground, that late did mourn,
Was atrew'd with flowers, for the return
Of the wish'd bridegroom of the Earth.

The well-accorded birds did sing
Their hymns unto the pleasant time;
And, in a sweet consorted chime,
Did welcome in the cheerful Spring.

They conclude:

Oh! no, beloved! I am most sure
Those virtuous habits we acquire,
As being with the soul entire,
Must with it evermore endure.

Else should our souls in vain elect;
And vainer yet were Heaven's laws,
When to an everlasting cause
They give a perishing effect.

Nor here on earth, then, nor above,
Our good affection can impair;
For, where God doth admit the fair,
Think you that he excludeth Love?

These eyes again thine eyes shall see,
These hands again thine hands infold;
And all chaste pleasures can be told,
Shall with us everlasting be:

For if no use of sense remain,
When bodies once this life forsake,

Or they could no delight partake,
Why should they ever rise again?
Let then no doubt, Celinda, touch,
Much less your fairest mind invade;
Were not our souls immortal made,
Our equal loves can make them such.

There were many contradictions in Lord Herbert's character. "The same man," observes Granger, "was wise and capricious; redressed wrongs, and quarreled for punctilios; hated bigotry in religion, and was himself a bigot to philosophy. He exposed himself to such dangers as other men of courage would have carefully declined; and called in question the fundamentals of a religion which none had the hardiness to dispute besides himself." His famous philosophical work, De Veritate, was expressly written against revealed religion. With the publication of this work is connected an extraordinary instance of human vanity and human inconsistency. The same man who had just been arguing against the possible existence of miracles, could nevertheless believe that the Divine intentions had been communicated in a miraculous manner to himself: in a word, he could easily discredit a revelation which comprehended the happiness of the whole human race, and yet was fully convinced of it when merely applying to himself and to his own insignificant pursuits. Entertaining considerable apprehension as to the manner in which his work would be received; and "being doubtful," he says, "in my chamber, one fair day in summer, my casement being opened towards the south, the sun shining clear, and no wind stirring, I took my book De Veritate in my hand, and kneeling on my knees, devoutly said these words,—O thou eternal God, Author of the light which now shines upon me, and Giver of all inward illuminations, I do beseech thee, of thy infinite goodness, to pardon a greater request than a sinner ought to make. I am not satisfied enough whether I shall publish this book De Veritate; if it be for thy glory, I beseech thee to give me some sign from heaven; if not, I shall suppress it."

"I had no sooner spoken these words, but a loud though yet gentle noise came from the heavens (for it was like nothing on earth), which did so comfort and cheer me, that I took my petition as granted, and that I had the sign I demanded, whereupon also I resolved to print my book. This (how strange soever it may seem) I profess before the eternal God is true: neither am I any way superstitiously deceived herein; since I did not only hear the noise, but in the serenest sky that ever I saw, being without all cloud, did to my thinking see the place from whence it came."

Certainly Lord Herbert was a most conscientious deist. According to Aubrey, twice a day he had prayers in his house, and on Sundays a sermon was preached by his chaplain.

In his last illness, when he knew himself to be dying, he expressed a wish that Archbishop Usher might be sent for. When it was proposed to him to receive the sacrament, he said, indifferently, that if there was good in any thing it was in that, and at all events it could do him no harm. Under the circumstances the primate refused to administer it, for which he was afterwards much blamed. Lord Herbert died serenely. Shortly before he breathed his last, he inquired the hour, and on receiving a reply, "an hour hence," he said, "I shall depart;" he then turned his face to the opposite side, and shortly afterwards expired.

It is not my intention in the present hasty sketch to be a partisan of a Buchanan, Robertson, Hume, Tytler, or others who have treated on the subject, leaving the views of sober-minded historians to be discussed as your readers may think most proper.

The daughter of James V. and Mary of Guise was born a few days before the death of her father, and at the age of six years was conveyed to France, whither she was sent for her education, by the same fleet that had brought over the French auxiliaries under Monsieur Desse. This exercised a powerful influence over her future destiny, and was the cause of all her misfortunes. Educated in France, and brought up at the most polished court in Europe, she insensibly acquired those manners which disqualified her from reigning over her ancient subjects, the Scots, among whom the government of a queen was unknown, and of too feeble a character to rule over a rude and semi-barbarous people, torn by intestine commotions, and struggling for the maintenance of the reformed religion. She was married, April 24, 1558, at a very early age, to Francis, the Dauphin of France, afterwards Francis II., a prince of feeble constitution and a weak understanding, who dying, left her a widow at the age of nineteen. After a short time, Mary with a sad heart, took leave of that kingdom, the brief, but only scene of her life in which fortune had smiled upon her. As long as her eyes could distinguish the coast, she continued to feed her melancholy with the prospect, and to utter, "Farewell, France; farewell, beloved country, which I shall never more behold!"

"To Scotia's Queen, as slowly dawned the day,
Rose on her couch, and gazed her soul away.
Her eyes had blessed the beacon's glimmering height,
That faintly tip the feathery surge with light;
But now the moon with orient hues portrayed
Each castled cliff and brown monastic shade;
All touched the talisman's resistless spring,
And, lo! what busy tribes were instant on the wing!"

After an absence of nearly thirteen years, she landed safely in her native kingdom. At this period commenced her trials and misfortunes, all following each other in quick succession; and whatever might have been her faults, bitter and grievous was the expiation.

We are informed by Dufresnoy, who came over to Scotland in her suite, that she lodged on the night of her arrival in the "Abbaye of Holyrood," which, says he, "is really a fine building." He proceeds:—"We landed at Leith, and went from thence to Edinburgh, which is but a short league distant.—The queen went there on horseback, and the lords and ladies, who accompanied her upon the little wretched hackneys of the country, as wretchedly caparisoned, at sight of which the queen began to weep, and to compare them with the pomp and superb palfreys of France; but there was no remedy but patience. What was worst of all, being arrived at Edinburgh, and restored to rest in the Abbaye, there came under her window, in the court, a crew of five hundred or six hundred scoundrels from the city, who gave her a serenade with wretched violins and little rebecks, of which there are enough in that country, and began to sing psalms, &c., so miserably mistimed and mistuned, that nothing could be worse. Alas! what music, and what a night's rest!" On this celebrated serenade, that true son of genius, the Ettrick Shepherd, founded his beautiful legend, "The Queen's Wake," from which I beg leave to quote the following lines:—

"Queen Mary lighted in the court,
Queen Mary joined the evening sport;
Yet though at table all were seen
To wonder at her air and mien,
Though courtiers fawned and ladies sung,
Still on her ears the accents rung.
'Watch thy young bosom and maiden eye,
For the shower must fall, and the flower must die;
And much she wished to prove ere long
The wondrous powers of Scottish song."

Passing over her ill-assorted marriage with the imbecile Darnley, which was celebrated with all due pomp and festivity, I come to that dreadful tragedy—that frightful episode in Scottish history—the murder of David Rizzio, which Mr. Haines has selected as the subject of his new historical tragedy. What heart is there that does not throb at the mention of the name of this celebrated Italian musician, coupled with that of Mary Queen of Scots? The names are inseparable. Whatever may have been Mary's culpability in this unhappy partiality and undue preference of Rizzio, it is now almost universally admitted that there was no criminality existed, although appearances seemed to favour such a supposition; certain it is that he was admitted into her confidence, and grew not only to be considered as a favourite, but as a minister. Hence the jealousy with which Darnley was inspired. Some writers represent Rizzio as servile, haughty, arrogant, and insolent; others, that he was shrewd and sensible, with education above his rank. But he was a foreigner, and his destruction was therefore resolved on by Darnley, Morton, Ruthven, Lindsay, and Maitland, in a manner nowise suitable to justice, to humanity, or to their own dignity. Accordingly, a plan was concerted between the above-mentioned nobles, and the place chosen was the queen's bedchamber; and on the 9th of March, 1566, Morton entered the court of the palace with 160 men, and seized the gates without resistance.

The queen was at supper with the Countess of Argyll, Rizzio, and a few domestics, in a closet off the bedchamber, about twelve feet square, the present north-west tower of Holyrood Palace, when Darnley suddenly entered her apartment by a private passage. Behind him was Ruthven, clad in complete armour, with three or four of his most trusty accomplices. Such an unusual appearance alarmed those who were present, and Rizzio, apprehending that he was the intended victim, instantly retired behind the queen. Numbers of armed men now rushed into the chamber. Mary in vain employed tears, threats, and entreaties to save her favourite, but it was all in vain: he was torn from her by violence, dragged out of the closet, through the bedchamber into the chamber of presence, and despatched with fifty-six wounds.

"In clattering hauberk clad, through night's still gloom,

Stern Ruthven fiercely stalks with haggard mien;
With thundering tone proclaims the victim's doom,
And tears her minion from a doating queen:
Through the arch'd courts and storied chambers high
Loud shrieks of terror ring, and death's expiring cry!"

Towards the outer door of the apartment, on the floor of a passage which was formerly part of the room, there are large dusky spots, said to have been occasioned by Rizzio's blood staining the floor, which no washing of the boards has been able to efface. The armour of Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, and of James VI. is shown in the room from which Rizzio was dragged out to be murdered. The queen's dressing-box is also shown; the roof of the queen's bed-room is divided into compartments, charged with the armorial device of some one of the blood royal of Scotland, and the walls are hung round with tapestry, and ornamented with subjects taken from "Ovid's Metamorphoses." To conclude this tragical event, I beg to observe that in the middle of the passage leading to the interior of the abbey, is shown a flat, square stone, under which the unfortunate Rizzio is said to have been buried, "in order that the queen might regularly be indulged with the sight of the tomb of her lamented favourite, as she passed to and from her private devotions." This conveys a bitter sarcasm, and speaks volumes. It is, however, merely conjectural, as no historian has pointed out the precise spot where this Italian musician is entombed—at least, so far as I am aware of.

I find, sir, that I have occupied more space than I originally intended, and must for the present conclude with her second truly unfortunate marriage with one whose plausible manners and graceful person were his only accomplishments; so that Mary, whose levity of manners contributed no little to alienate his affections, soon became disgusted with this painted sepulchre. These circumstances, joined to her partiality for the Italian minstrel, were the forerunners of all her woes. I will, with your permission, send you another sketch, concluding with her death at Fotheringay, and a slight glance at the fortunes and misfortunes of the Stuart family.

LITERARY STATISTICS.

In the library of Mr. Rogers, the poet, at his house in St. James' Place, London, is the original agreement between Milton and his publisher, Samuel Symons, in 1666, for the copyright of "Paradise Lost." It is written on one page of foolscap, signed by the contracting parties, and witnessed by "John Fisher" and "Benjamin Greene, servant to Mr. Milton." The autograph of the great poet, notwithstanding his blindness, is remarkably regular and distinct. This interesting relic, we need hardly say, is carefully preserved by its distinguished owner; it is framed and glazed, and occupies a prominent place on the walls of the classical and hospitable mansion of the Poet of Memory. Mr. Rogers, we believe, gave seventy guineas for this relic! For the poem itself, Milton received ten pounds, five being paid in advance, and the other five at the expiration of two years, when 1300 copies had been sold. For each edition, not exceeding 1500 copies, five pounds were to be paid; but in seven years the poet died, and the widow disposed of all her "right, title, and interest" in the work for an additional sum of seven pounds. Thus the whole copyright of "Paradise Lost" brought to the author and his family seventeen pounds, and the bit of paper on which the agreement was written, was sold and eagerly purchased for seventy guineas! Milton was more than fifty years of age, blind, infirm, and solitary, when he began the composition of his great epic. At a similar advanced period of life, Sir Walter Scott, struck with misfortune, entered into an engagement to liquidate, by his literary exertions, a debt of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds. Milton rested his long-cherished hopes of lasting fame upon the work thus late begun : Scott staked his character and his reputation upon the fulfilment of his vast engagement. Both entered with characteristic ardour upon their tasks, and, amidst the pressure of increasing age and infirmity, never lost sight of their anticipated reward. In seven years Milton had completed his divine poem, and held in his hand his passport to immortality. In seven years Scott had paid all but one sixth of his enormous load of debt. The prize was within view, independence seemed almost within his grasp, but he had over-taxed his strength, and disease, soon to be followed by death, came, like an armed man, and closed the superhuman struggle. When will the annals of literature record again two such instances of heroic determination under such adverse circumstances, united to the highest creative genius, and crowned with such marvellous results?—Inverness Courier.

DOCTOR GALL.

I sing of the organs and fibres
That ramble about in the brains;
Avant! ye irreverent jibbers,
Or stay and be wise for your pains.
All heads were of yore on a level,
One could not tell clever from dull,
Till I, like Le Sage's lame devil,
Unroof'd with a touch every skull.
Oh, I am the mental dissector,
I fathom the wits of you all,
Then come in a crowd to the lecture
Of craniological Gall.

The passions, or active or passive,
Exposed by my magical spells,
As busy as bees in a glass hive,
Are seen in their separate cells.
Old Momus, who wanted a casement
Whence all in the heart might be read,
Were he living, would stare with amazement
To find what he wants in the head.

There's an organ for strains amoroso,
Just under the edge of the wig,
An organ for writing but so-so,
For driving a tilbury gig;
An organ for boxers, for stoics,
For giving booksellers a lift,
For marching the zigzag heroics,
And editing Jonathan Swift.

I raise in match-making a rumpus,
And Cupid his fame must impart,
Henceforth with a rule and a compass,
Instead of a bow and a dart.
"Dear madam, your eyebrow is horrid;
And, captain, too broad is your pate;
I see by that bump on your forehead,
You're shockingly dull tête-à-tête."

When practice has made my book plainer,
To manhood, to age, and to youth,
I'll build, like the genius, Phanor,
In London, a palace of truth.
Then fibs, ah, beware how you tell 'em,
Reflect how pellucid the skull,
Whose downright sincere cerebellum,
Must render all flattery null.

Your friend brings a play out at Drury,
'Tis hooted and damn'd in the pit;
Your organ of friendship's all fury,
But what says your organ of wit?
Our laughter next time, prithee, stir, man,
We do'nt pay our money to weep,
Your play must have come from the German,
It set all the boxes asleep."

At first all will be in a hustle;
The eye will from ignorance swerve,
And some will abuse the wrong muscle,
And some will adore the wrong nerve.

In love should your hearts then be sporting,
Your heads on one level to bring,
You must go in your night caps a courting,
As if you are going to swing.

Yet some happy mortals, all virtue,
Have sentiment just as they should,
Their occiput nought can do hurt to,
Each organ's an organ of good.
Such couples angelic, when mated,
To bid all concealment retire,
Should seek Hymen's altar bald pated,
And throw both their wigs in his fire.

My system, from great A to izzard,
You now, my good friends, may descry.
Not Shakespeare's Bermudian wizard,
Was half so enchanting as I.
His magic a Tempest could smother,
But mine the soul's hurricane clears,
By exposing your heads to each other,
And setting those heads by the ears.
Oh, I am the mental dissector,
I fathom the wits of you all,
So here is the end to the lecture
Of craniological Gall.

SCRAPS.

One day when Charles Second dined in state, he made De Grammont remark that he was served upon the knee, a mark of respect not common at other courts.—"I thank your majesty for the explanation," answered De Grammont, "I thought they were begging pardon for giving you so bad a dinner."

James I. told his nurse he could make her son a nobleman, but could not make him a gentleman. It was a title not in the gift of kings.

Holinshed states that 72,000 persons died by the hand of the executioner, during the reign of Henry VIII., being at the rate of 2,000 every year. Under Elizabeth 400 were executed yearly.

It was said of Justices of the Peace, in the time of Elizabeth, that for half a dozen chickens they would dispense with a dozen penal statutes.

In 1600 Queen Elizabeth granted the first patent to the East India Company—its stock was seventy-two thousand pounds—and they fitted out four ships under the command of James Lancaster, for this new trade, which was successful, &c. The trade with Turkey commenced about the year 1583—that with Muscovy about 1569.

Sir Edward Coke said in the House of Commons that he was employed, with Popham, C. J., to take a survey of all the people in England and that they found them to be 900,000 of all sorts.

Sir Thomas Gresham built the Royal Exchange at his own charge in the reign of Elizabeth.

About 1577, pocket watches were first brought into England from Germany. About 1580, coaches were introduced by the Earl of Arundal.

In the 5th Elizabeth was enacted the first law for the relief of the poor.

It appears that fifteenths formerly corresponded to the name. But a valuation having been made in the reign of Edward Third, which was always adhered to, and each town paid unalterably a particular sum, which the inhabitants themselves assessed upon their fellow citizens. The same tax on corporate towns was called a tenth. The subsidy became so unequal that it was changed for a land tax.

A Tod was 28 pounds.

Prynne wrote an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, called Histrio-Mastyx, against plays, dancing, music, &c.

SIMPLICITY OF WRITING.—The endeavour to please by novelty leads men aside of simplicity and nature, and fills their writings with affectation and conceit. It was thus the age of Claudius and Nero became so much inferior to that of Augustus, in taste and genius; and perhaps there are, at present, symptoms of a like degeneracy of taste, in France, as well as in England. There is something surprising in a blaze of wit and conceit; ordinary readers are mightily struck with it, and falsely imagine it to be the most difficult as well as the most excellent way of writing. Seneca abounds with pleasing faults, says Quintilian, and for that reason is the more dangerous, and the more apt to pervert the taste of the young and inconsiderate.—Hume.

MASCULINE AND FEMININE.

In England rivers all are males—
For instance, Father Thames—
Whoever in Columbia sails,
Finds them ma'am'selles or 'dames.

Yes, there the softer sex presides,
Aquatic, I assure ye,
And Missis Sippy rolls her tides, Responsive to Miss Souri.

James Smith.

One of the most sincere lamentations upon the death of a great man is that of Bensérade, the poet, over Cardinal Richelieu.

"Cy gist, ouy gist par la mort bleu
Le Cardinal de Richelieu,
Et ce qui cause mon ennuuy
Ma pension avec lui."

"Here lies—egad 'tis very true
The illustrious Cardinal Richelieu,
My grief is genuine—void of whim,
Alas my pension lies with him."

What an array of men of genius deficient in ordinary talk. Corneille, Addison, Virgil, Lafontaine, Labruere, Goldsmith, Chaucer, and Rochefaucauld, Isocrates, and Cowper, were so timid as to be almost unable to speak in company, and Vauconson was silent as one of his own automata. But not all are fools who talk well, or all geniuses who are mute. "Your wife says nothing," remarked some one to a Frenchman. "Ah, Monsieur, elle n'en pense pas plus."

Cardinal de Richelieu used, for exercise, to jump against a wall with a servant, and showed great ambition, even so unmatched, to excel; which De Grammont observing, offered to jump with him, and took care with great seeming effort to let himself be surpassed. He is said to have ingratiated himself with the minister by this political jumping.

DR. SOUTH.

Dr. South was chaplain to Lord Clarendon, and afterwards Dean of Westminster. He wrote six volumes of sermons and memoirs of his own life. He is one of those who had genius whipped into them by Dr. Busby. The English pulpit is fruitful beyond that of other countries in the production of wits. South, Swift, Sterne, and the present Dean of St. Paul's, Sydney Smith, are not easily matched from any other of the learned professions.

South's sermons begin, in order of date, before the restoration, and come down to near the end of the century. They were much celebrated at the time, and retain a portion of their renown. This is by no means surprising. South had great qualifications for that popularity which attends the pulpit, and his manner was at that time original. Not diffuse, not learned, not formal in argument like Barrow, with a more natural structure of sentences, a more pointed, though by no means a more fair and satisfactory turn of reasoning, with a style clear and English, free from all pedantry, but abounding with those colloquial novelties of idiom which, though now become vulgar and offensive, the age of Charles II. affected, sparing no personal or temporary sarcasm, but if he seems for a moment to tread on the verge of buffoonery, recovering himself by some stroke of vigorous sense and language; such was the worthy Dr. South, whom the courtiers delighted to hear. His sermons want all that is called unction, and sometimes even earnestness; which is owing, in a great measure, to a perpetual tone of gibing at rebels and fanatics; but there is a masculine spirit about them which, combined with their peculiar characteristics, would naturally fill the churches where he might be heard. South seems to bend towards the Armenian theology, without adopting so much of it as some of his contemporaries. He was irascible in temper, and the best description of this part of his character is perhaps given in the following paragraph from one of his sermons.

"There are some persons that, like so many salamanders, cannot live but in the fire; cannot enjoy themselves but in the heats and sharpness of contention; the very breath they draw does not so much enliven them, as kindle and inflame them; they have so much bitterness in their nature, that they must be now and then discharging it upon somebody; they must have vent, and sometimes breathe themselves in an invective or a quarrel; or perhaps their health requires it; should they be quiet a week, they would need a purge, and be forced to take physic."—Sermons, vol. vii. p. 4.

As the doctor's books are rare, we will venture a few further extracts. After speaking against the custom of dueling, he shows in the following beautiful passage that it is no sacrifice of real honour to refuse a challenge.

"Besides that, which is here supposed, which is loss of honour, is indeed no such thing; the measure of honour is the judgment of the knowing, and the pious, and the virtuous, who will value and applaud the passive magnanimity of such an one, that durst look a duty in the face, in spite of scorn, and conquer the scoffs of the world, of which the most reputed for valour are afraid. All that he loses in the opinion of those who rate honour by a false rule, and measure glory by the standard of their own ignorance, vanity, and rashness; and the same persons who condemn him for this, would slight him as much for not talking obscenely, not scoffing at religion and whatsoever is sacred, and for not drinking himself to the condition of a barrel or a sponge; or not rapping out such hideous oaths, as might even provoke divine justice to revenge the impiety of them upon a place or a nation. Those, indeed, who look upon the not doing of these things as pedantry, would, no question, account all refusal of a duel, poorness and pusillanimity."—p. 56, vol. vii.

And again:—

"But he that has not the courage to puff at all popular surmises, and to esteem himself superior to the riots and mistakes of hectors; but by a foolish facility appears and ventures his life at the word and challenge of a furious sot, whose life is not worth the keeping, falls ingloriously, and descends to his grave with the burial of an ass; shame is his winding sheet, and the solemnity of his funeral the reprehension of the wise, the pity of the good, and the laughter of his companions; who can make sport at the loss of a soul and the miseries of damnation."

SUSCEPTIBLE PEOPLE.

BY MRS. GORE.

The incomparable Charles Lamb used to fancy he could detect a schoolmaster by his grammatical scrupulosities in the use of the subjunctive mood. But for the fear of the said schoolmaster before our eyes, we should have headed this article "Touchy People," according to the popular phrase. Pedantically speaking, the word should be "Tetchy;" and to steer clear between plain English and pure English, we have taken leave to Anglicise the French designation of those self-tormentors, who are ever suspecting or resenting affronts;—thin-skinned martyrs, "tremblingly alive all o'er" to ideal injuries, or wincing, like other galled jades, under imaginary lashes.

There is no stronger symptom of insignificance than to be touchy! The moment a person's position is definite, he ceases to be anxious concerning the slights of society: while those by birthright placed above the little impertinences of the little, are incapable of surmising the possibility of affront:—susceptibility on such points is an almost unfailing symptom of a raton. There is some reason that we know not of, why Lady Manly should resent her visit not being returned with sufficient celerity; there is some latent motive for the flush that overspreads poor Mor-daunt's brow, when unable to catch Lord Cecil's eye for a bow, at the theatre. We should not have set ourselves to the task of inquiring why the notice of such people was important to them,—but for their resentment of an offence, after all, perhaps, imaginary. It is like a man scudding along a wall in the consciousness that his coat is out at elbows.

"Ne faut pas parler de corde dans la maison d'un pendu!" says a French adage; and when we see a man resent an allusion to Tyburn, we have a right to suppose that the rope has acted its part in the family history. Be this a hint to susceptible people, lest their infirmity of temper expose them to unjust suspicions. "I am certain he was talking at me"—"That show-up was at my expense!" are phrases serving as notes explanatory to their secret infirmities. How should we know that Mrs. Dove was overbearing in her ménage, but for her insisting that she was caricatured in the heroine of some shrew-contemning novel? How conjecture that Colonel Lawless had exhibited the better part of valour in the Burmese war, but for his calling out some lawyer's clerk for jesting in his presence upon the white feather?

Some people consider this sort of susceptibility an amiable weakness; and apologise for having been cold or ungracious without a cause, on the score of their "foolish sensitiveness." Foolish indeed—worse than foolish! Touchiness is one of the most paltry phases of egotism and vanity. It is only those with whom self is ever uppermost, who dream of being touchy. There are some persons so singularly constituted that, go where they may, do what they will, their own shadow, grown gigantic, seems ever projected before them, as if to convict them of a perpetual attempt to eclipse the sun. They can see nothing in nature but themselves. Every thing said, thought, written by the rest of the world, must have reference to them. The result is, that the rest of the world becomes unanimous in thinking them insupportable.

Conscious of unpopularity, they live in terror of slight. As it is impossible that others should appreciate them at the inordinate value they have set upon themselves, they must find themselves disparaged. They must experience the affront of seeing precedence given to the Duke of Wellington for valour, and Sydney Smith for wit. Try to get at the origin of some author's animosity towards you, and you will learn that you took the liberty of doing justice to Bulwer in his presence, when you must have known that such exaggerated praise of a rival could not be agreeable. Or inquire the motive of Lady Riddlemaree's omitting you from her last ball—you will be told that you inflicted a cruel injury upon her daughter by giving due praise to the serene loveliness of Lady Fanny. Wounded vanity is the true origin of all touchiness.

To public men, this infirmity is a serious disqualification. Susceptibility in a public man amounts to an admission of vulnerability; it is the act of publishing by sound of trumpet the exact measure of his strength, or rather of his weakness. A touchy man, in the house of commons, sets himself up as a target. The young members delight in taking a rise out of him. It is a sort of badger-bait for the lovers of illegitimate sport. Such men are always starting up, or launching out, under the influence of whips and stings from invisible hands, like Caliban capering under the impish inflictions of Prospero. Their bodies, like that of the son of Sycorax, are filled with pains and aches; but where is the enemy?—Every where!—They see their tormentors in the smooth face that smiles upon them, and expect a gripe from the friendly hand extended towards their own!—

Public men have died—ay! actually died, and the worms have eaten them,—from the influence of this morbid susceptibility; not merely by bringing quarrels upon themselves to be decided at the rapier's point, but under the agonising influence of slights attributed by their touchiness to the sovereign; or ingratitude to the nation. The perpetual hair-shirt of wounded self-love has eventually worn out their constitution. Touchiness sends great men to the tomb, just as it sends lesser ones to Coventry.

If the foolish and vulgar enjoyed a monopoly of this painful frailty, we might say, "let them fancy that the windmills are making war upon them—no matter?"—But unluckily touchiness is also one of the follies of the wise. Read Pope's correspondence; consult the memoirs of Swift; turn over the pages of Scaliger; listen to the howlings of Warburton; reflect upon the miseries of Shenstone, touchy not only for himself, but for his Leasowes. Above all, Rousseau!—Rousseau's life was a never-ending warfare against imaginary insults. From the pope, down to the gentle duchesses, on whose knees, like a spoiled child, he was cherished, all were aggressors. The eloquent and enlightened Jean Jacques, in his bursts of irritability and touchiness, betrayed himself as of the class described by one of the most impassioned of writers, as "n'ayant pas en elles ce fonds de tendresse qui fait accepter l'imperfection de l'être humain, —ces personnes qui sont bonnes et affectueuses seulement quand elles révent." In his writings he was a philosopher; in real life, a petulant child!—

Nothing appears more troublesome to individuals who, on their own side, are possessed of this fonds de tendresse—this generous disposition,—this forbearance,—this tendency to live and let live,—than to find themselves in contact with those less lavishly endowed, who are continually imagining causes for dissension, and displaying wounds to be salved over. People so thin skinned that every little rub produces a gangrene, cease at length to excite commiseration. Let their qualities be what they may, others, of inferior merit, who are more facile à vivre, will be preferred as companions. However promising the sport to fish in troubled waters becomes, in the long run, tedious. We like to know when about to meet an old friend, whether he is likely to fold us in his arms or run us through the body. We grow tired of even the most favoured correspondent, who is always signing himself "the madly-used Malvolio." We prefer stars of inferior magnitude, if less liable to conceal themselves by fits and starts in the clouds. We choose our friends to be what the French call d'un commerce sur. Equality of humour, the equality proceeding from a fair estimate of our own claims and a generous estimate of those of others, is in social life an indispensable qualification.

The offence, however, carries its own penalty. The man who is always fancying that you "bite your thumb at him,"—the man who, to borrow Hood's most piquant simile.

—to his own sharp fancies a prey,
Lies like a hedgehog, roll'd up the wrong way Tormenting himself with his prickles, is more to be pitied than if those prickles were the spears of an enemy. His enemy could not always be a-tilt for single combat; but at what hour of the twenty-four is the monomaniac safe from his own antagonism?—He is like Harpagon, seizing himself by the arm as the robber who has despoiled him of his hidden treasure!—

And then the mortification to a touchy person of having it proved to him that he has been fencing with a shadow;—the vexation of having to own himself in the wrong!—And how easy to deceive ourselves concerning the attacks made upon our self love. Many years ago, the writer of these sketches produced, at Drury Lane Theatre, a comedy, entitled "Lords and Commons," in which that excellent comedian, William Farren, enacted the part of an old nabob; admirably costumed, according to his conception of the part. Immediately on his entrance, a murmur of disapprobation arose, for which, at the moment, it was difficult to assign a motive. The following day, several newspaper critics noticed with regret that the part should have been dressed at a well-known individual, noted for his harmless eccentricities, &c. &c. while more familiar friends exclaimed, "A shameful show-up of JEREMY BENTHAM!—An abominable caricature of the worthy Jeremy Bentham!—The wig especially was a facsimile!"

The comedy and the wig were soon afterwards laid on the shelf together; but, to this day, a warm devotee of old Jeremy's continues to reproach us with the treachery of our attack upon "an eminent old man, who ought to have been an object of respect to a young writer."

Mr. Bunn's "Memoirs of the Stage" have thrown a new light upon the matter. The wig in question was fated to become as much an object of contention as the lock of Mrs. Arabella Fermor's hair, the origin of Pope's charming poem. On the appearance of Scribe's clever comedy of "Bertrand et Raton," under the name of "The Minister and the Mercer," general indignation was excited in the royal and ministerial circles, by the appearance of Farren in the part of the ambitious intrigant, in a wig, said to be a facsimile of the one worn by Talleyrand at the Congress of Vienna!—The king signified his displeasure to the lord chamberlain—the lord chamberlain to the manager—the manager to the imprudent histrión. It was by no means certain that a rupture between England and France might not be the result of this insult offered to the French ambassador. Lord Grey, then at the head of the administration, attended the theatre to verify the delinquency.

The offending wig, thus resented by his majesty's government as an offence to good order, and sworn to by hundreds as a deliberate copy from the peculiar and well-known head-dress of Talleyrand, was the identical one worn in the part of Sir Caleb Cabob, and also sworn to by scores as a caricature of Jeremy Bentham!—

So much for the accuracy of people's impressions on such points. So much for the folly of taking to oneself a random shot!

There is a man who would be clever and agreeable but for the solitary foible of touchiness, who "dies daily" from the self-appropriation of random shots. He fancies himself the object of every whisper—every smile—every caricature—every joke going on in the circle of his acquaintance!—Sir John Sensitive once gained a contested election,—and kept his bed for six weeks afterwards, from the severe wounds inflicted by the ordinary squibs of the hustings. Sir John Sensitive once paid his court to the prettiest woman in his county,—and was on the eve of his acceptance, when her ladyship happening to say, in his presence, that she disliked lawyers, he drew off and took affront, because his great grandfather happened to have been Master of the Rolls. Sir John Sensitive has fought three duels;—one with his bosom friend for joking with him about a grammatical fault in his pamphlet on Catholic Emancipation;—one with the member for his county on the strength of his allusion in parliament to certain landowners of intolerant principles in the large and populous county he had the honour to represent;—and the third, with a gentleman of distinguished merit and talent, whom he persisted in mistaking for H. B. just as he had persisted in mistaking himself for the original of one of the clever croquis of that successful caricaturist. Sweet Sir John! be warned. The last bullet of the Freischutz may await thee.

Three have proved true—
The fourth thou mayst rue!

Take patience!—The world is wide enough to allow even so great a man to pass unnoticed. Conquer thy perilous irritabilities, and rise superior to the weakness of those pigmies on stilts, whom we have designated as SUSCEPTIBLE PEOPLE.

THE LUNGS OF LONDON.

"Moreover he hath left you all his walks,
His private harbours, and new planted orchards
On this side Tiber; he hath left them you
And so your heirs for ever; common pleasures
To walk abroad and recreate yourselves."

JULIUS CÆSAR.

The preservation of public health in great cities is an object no less of paramount importance to the citizen, than of curious inquiry to the philosopher; and it is truly surprising to reflect, that in our own country we should have given to this subject so little serious consideration. Abroad, the means of conserving the public health, of disarming the malignity of epidemic diseases, and

His death took place at his house in Queen street, St. Giles's in the Fields, 1648. In his will, he gave directions that a white horse, to which he was much attached, should be carefully fed and attended to during its life. He also bequeathed a large collection of books to Jesus' College, Oxford. On the 5th of August he was buried in the chancel of St. Giles's church in the Fields. "As a soldier," says Horace Walpole, "he won the esteem of those great captains the Prince of Orange and the Constable de Montmorency; as a knight, his chivalry was drawn from the purest founts of the 'Faerie Queene.' Had he been ambitious, the beauty of his person would have carried him as far as any gentle knight can aspire to go. As a public minister, he supported the dignity of his country, even when its prince disgraced it; and that he was qualified to write its annals, as well as to ennoble them, the history I have mentioned proves, and must make us lament that he did not complete, or that we have lost, the account he purposed to give of his embassy. These busy scenes were blended with and terminated by meditation and philosophic inquiries. Strip each period of its excesses and errors, and it will not be easy to trace out, or dispose the life of a man of quality into a succession of employments which would better become him. Valour and military activity in youth; business of state in middle age; contemplation and labours for the information of posterity in the calmer scenes of closing life." Such is the outline of Lord Herbert's character, as it is sketched for him by the pen of another. He has himself completed the picture by his own curious delineation of his private thoughts and secret motives for action; forming, if not the most perfect, at least one of the most remarkable characters in the gallery of human portraits.

ARCHEE, THE COURT FOOL.

In days when the blessings of literature were unknown, and when the sovereign could scarcely read or write, the royal fool, or jester, was a person of no slight importance in dissipating the dullness of a barbarous court. In the long nights and rainy days he must have been invaluable. At the insipid banquets of royalty, formality and state-likeness disappeared before him: he enlivened illiterate boorishness, and gave spirit to flagging conviviality. The guests made him their butt, and he repaid their ridicule with impunity and applause. To the sovereign his society was almost indispensable. In the presence of his fool the monarch could unbend and be perfectly at his ease. He could either amuse himself with his buffoonery, or he could vent on him his spleen. Sometimes this singular familiarity appears to have produced a real attachment on the part of the jester. We find him taking advantage of his peculiar license, and, under the mask and in the language of folly, communicating wholesome and important truths, to which the most powerful noble would scarcely have ventured an allusion.

The character of the court fool of former days is commonly somewhat undervalued. Generally speaking, he was a compound of humour, tact, and impudence; and obtained his title less from being, than from playing, the fool. In many instances, the man who wore a cap and bells, had quite as much sense as the man who was decorated with a coronet. Archibald Armstrong (for such was Archeon's real name) was as shrewd, sensible, witty, and good-humoured an individual as ever adorned the high station to which he was called. In our times he would have probably been famous for conversational pleasantry, or as a writer of facetious fiction. Unfortunately his good sayings are now almost entirely lost to the world; the book of "Jests," which bears his name, is too wretched a production to be genuine. The man, who bearded and ridiculed the proudest prelate since the days of Wolsey, could never have uttered such indifferent nonsense.

His conversation with King James, when the latter was weak enough to trust his heir in the Spanish dominions, is quite admirable:—"I must change caps with your majesty," said Archeon. "Why?" inquired the king.—"Why, who," replied Archeon, "sent the prince into Spain?"—"But, supposing," returned James, "that the prince should come safely back again?"—"Why, in that case," said Archeon, "I will take my cap from my head, and send it to the King of Spain." Archeon, however tender of the prince's safety, had no objection to trust his own person among the pleasures of the Spanish capital. Probably he followed in the train of some of the young courtiers, who hastened to join the prince in his romantic expedition. His wit and his impudence made him as much at home at Madrid as he had formerly been in London. While the prince could with difficulty interchange a syllable with his beloved Infanta, Archeon was not only admitted into her presence, but became a familiar favourite with the Spanish ladies. "Our cousin, Archeon," says Howell, in one of his curious letters from Madrid, "hath more privilege than any, for he often goes with his fool's coat, where the Infanta is with her meninas, and ladies of honour, and keeps a blowing and blustering amongst them, and flirts out what he lists." One day, the subject of conversation was the gallantry of the Duke of Bavaria, who at the head of an inconsiderable force, had routed a large army of the palsgrave. The latter being son-in-law to King James, rendered the topic a displeasing one to an Englishman. "I will tell you a stranger circumstance," said Archeon; "is it not more singular that one hundred and forty ships should have sailed from Spain, to attack England, and that not ten of them should have returned to tell what became of the rest?"

Archeon's famous feud with Archbishop Laud must have been productive of considerable amusement to the more mischievous courtiers. He once asked permission to say grace, at a dinner where that dignified prelate was present. On his request being granted. "Great praise," he said, "be to God, and little Laud to the devil." Osborne says, in his Advice to a Son,—"He was not only able to continue the dispute for diverse years, but received such encouragements from the standers by, as he hath oft, in my hearing, belched in his face such miscarriages as he was really guilty of, and might, but for this foul-mouthed Scot, have been forgotten." There is a pamphlet in the British Museum, curious from its scarcity, entitled Archeon's Dream. Unfortunately it contains no particulars respecting the history of this remarkable humourist, and is, in fact little more than a malicious tirade against Laud, during whose imprisonment it was published. There is a poetical postscript, which concludes as follows:—

His fool's coat now is in far better case,
Than he who yesterday had so much grace.
Changes of time surely cannot be small,
When jesters rise, and archbishops fall.

The discomfiture of the archbishop, when he attempted to introduce the English Liturgy into the Scottish Church, appears to have been highly gratifying to Archeon. A stool had been thrown at the clergyman's head who first attempted to read it in St. Giles's Church, Edinburgh: Archeon facetiously called it the stool of repentance. The religious commotions which followed excited considerable uneasiness at court; in the midst of them, Archeon happened to encounter the archbishop on his way to the council chamber. "Ah," said he, "who's the fool now?" For this and other insolences Laud immediately laid a complaint before the king, who was present in council at the time. When brought before the council he pleaded the privilege of his coat, but buffoonery was now out of place, and he was sentenced to be dismissed from his post. The order, dated Whitehall, 11th of March, 1637, is still preserved and runs as follows:

"It is this day ordered by his majesty, with the advice of the board, that Archibald Armstrong, the king's fool, for certain scandalous words of a high nature, spoken by him against the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, his grace, and proved to be uttered by him by two witnesses, shall have his coat pulled over his head, and be discharged of the king's service, and banished the court; for which the lord chamberlaine of the king's household is prayed and required to give order to be executed. And immediately the same was put in execution."

The circumstances of Archeon's dismissal are more fully described by Mr. Garrard, in a letter to the Earl of Strafford. He writes, 20th March, 1637, "Archeon is fallen into a great misfortune; a fool he would be, but a foul-mouthed knave he has proved himself. Being in a tavern in Westminster drunk, (he says himself he was speaking of the Scottish business,) he fell a railing on my Lord of Canterbury, said he was a monk, a rogue and a traitor. Of this his grace complained at council, the king being present: it was ordered he should be carried to the porter's lodge, his coat pulled over his ears, and kicked out of the court, never to enter within the gates, and to be called into the star chamber. The first part is done, but my Lord of Canterbury hath interceded to the king, that there it should end. There is a new fool in his place, Muckle John, but he will ne'er be so rich, for he cannot abide money."

The writer of the Scout's Discovery, printed in 1642, mentions his falling in with the discarded mountebank about a week after his dismissal. "I met Archeon," he says, "at the Abbey all in black. Alas! poor fool, thought I, he mourns for his country. I asked him about his coat. O, quoth he, my Lord of Canterbury hath taken it from me, because either he, or some of the Scots bishops may have the use of it themselves; but he hath given me a black coat for it; and now I may speak what I please, so it be not against the prelates, for this coat hath a greater privilege than the other had."

Archeon, after his disgrace, retired to the scene of his birth, Arthuret, in Cumberland, where he died at an advanced age in 1672. Whether the fallen jester merely carried with him his court gallantry, or whether the ladies of this retired village entertained some oriental notions as to the physical qualities of a fool, certain it is that the parish register of Arthuret bears record to his regard for the fair sex. The following notices were extracted from it by Lysons:

"Francis, the base son of Archibald Armstrong, baptised December 17, 1643."

"Archibald Armstrong and Sybella Bell, married June 4, 1646."

"Archibald Armstrong, buried April 1st, 1672."

It appears by the Strafford Papers, and also by the following lines attached to the portrait which is prefixed to his "Jests," that Arceus had contrived to make his fortune before he was disgraced:

Arceus, by kings and princes graced of late,
Jested himself into a fair estate;
And, in this book, doth to his friends commend,
His jeers, taunts, tales, which no man can offend.

He was buried in the churchyard of Arthuret, but there is no memorial of the burial-place of the jester.

CHARLES I. CHAP. I.

No monarch could be more disqualified to stem a great political torrent than was the unfortunate Charles. Had he been born in a private station he would have adorned it by the purity of his morals, and the refinement of his taste. Had he inherited unlimited power, he might have converted even despotism into a golden age; or, indeed, had he lived at any other period of our history, he would at least have been regarded as an amiable and accomplished, if not an illustrious prince. But it was his misfortune to live in troubled and extraordinary times. A people had been roused to a sense of their wrongs. The spirit of freedom was abroad, and a watchword was merely wanting to arm a nation in favour of those privileges, which, in times of darkness and slavery, had been wrested from it. Under such circumstances, the errors or oppressions of a long line of kings were easily associated with their reigning representative; and Charles became the sacrifice to a long established system of misrule, rather than to individual offence.

The hero and the martyr of one faction, and the reputed tyrant of another, few monarchs have been more exalted by their friends, or execrated by their enemies. Let us, however, in discussing the character of Charles, divest ourselves as much as possible from the curse of party prejudice. Let us separate the monarch from the man, the pious Christian from the wavering politician; ever bearing in mind that the faults of the prince were the dictates of conscience; that his failings were the result of education; but that all his virtues were his own.

On the one hand, then, we discover a weak and vacillating monarch, submitting to the narrow counsels of inferior minds, neither compromising with grace, nor refusing with dignity; enforcing religious intolerance; and contending with the energies of a great people, and the genius of a remarkable period, by unmeaning promises and paltry intrigues. Unfortunately in the political and most contemptible school of his father, he had early been initiated in kingcraft and insincerity; and the same prince whose high sense of honour was so remarkable in private life, proved himself the most deficient in political integrity. It was this great moral failing which rendered his war with his subjects a war to the knife. Where truth was made subservient to policy on the one hand, submission was rendered impracticable on the other; for how could his subjects restore to him a power, which they imagined, however solemn the compact, would be turned against themselves? Were any reliance to be placed in the assurances of that arch-hypocrite Cromwell, it was this trait in the political character of his victim, which signed the death-warrant of Charles.

Notwithstanding the ingenious defence of Hume and other writers, such, it is to be feared, is the public character of Charles the First. It might be argued in his favour, that political dishonesty is not always inconsistent with private integrity; but would not such an apology be an insult to a virtuous monarch? Is it not more charitable,—more compatible with his acts of private goodness, and his high sense of religious duty, to suppose that he acted according to the dictates of his conscience; and that his errors were those of judgment, rather than of the heart! Surely his domestic virtues were at least equal to his public incapacity! Brave, chaste, temperate, and humane; a pious Christian, an affectionate husband, and an indulgent father; how few men are there whose secret thoughts and actions would bear the same scrutiny as those of the unhappy Charles! Let us follow him through his many misfortunes. Let us regard him through the gratings of his prison, or amidst the dark solemnity of the scaffold. Let us recall his many griefs; a king deprived of his inheritance; the husband torn from his wife, and the father from his children; reviled and spit upon by the meanest of his subjects; dragged to a public trial, and trusting only to a still more public execution for release from his miseries; he yet endured all with a meekness and a dignity so beautiful, as to be unequalled, perhaps, in the history of human suffering, or of human fortitude.

One word respecting the political features of the period. The true philosopher will regard the great contention between Charles and his subjects, as a justifiable struggle for liberty on the one hand; and, on the part of the king, as a conscientious defence of those prescriptive privileges which had descended to him from his forefathers, and which his education led him to regard as sacred. He will admit that on each side were exhibited many great and good qualities, on which the moralist may reflect with satisfaction, and an Englishman with pride. He will remember also, that in all political convulsions the faults on both sides have been generally equal; and he will conclude, that in the present instance such a deduction is not only the most charitable, but probably not far removed from the truth.

Charles the First was born at Dumfermling, in Scotland, the 19th of November, 1600. So weak was he at his birth, that it was hardly expected he could survive his infancy, and consequently, on the 23d of December following, he was hastily christened, without any of those ceremonies which usually attend the baptism of royal infants. When only four years old he was created Duke of York, as well as Knight of the Bath, with ridiculous solemnity: a sword was girded on his side, a coronet of gold placed on his head, and a golden verge in his hand.

A pageant, which followed the ceremony, is described by Sir Dudley Carleton in a letter to Mr. Winwood, dated January, 1604, and affords a very curious picture of the manners of the time. "There was a public dinner in the great chamber, where there was one table for the duke and his earls assistants, another for his fellow knights of the Bath. At night we had the Queen's Mask in the Banqueting House, or rather her pageant. There was a great engine at the lower end of the room which had motion, and in it were the images of sea-horses, with other terrible fishes, which were ridden by Moors. The indecorum was, that there was all fish and no water. At the further end was a great shell, in the form of a scallop, wherein were four seats. In the lowest sat the queen with my Lady Bedford; in the rest were placed my Ladies Suffolk, Derby, Rich, Effingham, Ann Herbert, Susan Herbert, Elizabeth Howard, Walsingham, and Bevil. Their appearance was rich, but too light and courtesan-like for such great ones. Instead of vizards, their faces and arms, up to the elbows, were painted black, which was disguise sufficient, for they were hard to be known; but it became them nothing so well as their red and white, and you cannot imagine a more ugly sight than a troop of lean-cheeked Moors. The Spanish and Venitian ambassadors were both present, and sat by the king in state; at which Monsieur Beaumont quarrels so extremely, that he saith the whole court is Spanish. But, by his favour, he should fall out with none but himself, for they were all indifferently invited to come as private men to a private sport; which he refusing, the Spanish ambassador willingly accepted, and being there, seeing no cause to the contrary, he put off Don Taxis, and took upon him El Senor Embaxadour, wherein he outstripped our little Monsieur. He was privately at the first mask, and sat amongst his men disguised; at this he was taken out to dance, and footed it like a lusty old gallant, with his country woman. He took out the queen, and forgot not to kiss her hand, though there was danger it would have left a mark on his lips. The night's work was concluded with a banquet in the great chamber, which was so furiously assaulted, that down went table and tressels before one bit was touched. They say the Duke of Holst will come upon us with an after reckoning, and that we shall see him on Candlemas night in a mask, as he hath showed himself a lusty reveller all this Christmas."

Previous to the young prince having been brought from Scotland on the accession of his father to the English throne, many of the court ladies had been anxious suitors for the keeping of the child. No sooner, however, were they made acquainted with his sickly condition, and the apparent probability of his dying in their charge, than all this anxiety vanished. Charles was eventually intrusted to the lady of Sir Robert Cary, afterwards Earl of Monmouth; a man ever on the watch for preferment, and who, as appears by his own Memoirs, had eagerly solicited the honour notwithstanding the risk.

The chief infirmity of Charles was a weakness in his legs, by which, in his infancy, he was so much distressed, that till his seventh year he had been compelled to crawl upon his hands and knees. Cary himself informs us, that the prince was so weak in the ankles that he could not even stand alone, and that it was much feared there was a dislocation of the joints. The king was anxious to make the experiment of iron boots, but Lady Cary so strenuously protested against their being adopted, that his majesty eventually submitted to her judgment.

Charles had also remained so long a period before he acquired the faculty of speech, that it was more than apprehended he had been born dumb. James proposed that the string under his tongue should be cut, but this remedy was also successfully opposed by Lady Cary. Probably it was these infantine infirmities that rendered Charles the especial favourite of his mother, Anne of Denmark. She used to say, observes

Weldon, that she loved him as dearly as her own soul.

In his sixth year, one Thomas Murray, a layman, was appointed his tutor. Little more can be collected respecting this person than the brief notice of Perinchief, who describes him as well qualified for the office though a favourer of presbyterianism. Under the tuition of Murray he made a creditable progress in learning. Prince Henry often jested with his young brother on the diligence with which he applied himself to his studies. On one occasion, when they were waiting with the rest of the court for the king to make his appearance, Henry caught up the cap of Archbishop Abbott and put it on his brother's head. If he continued a good boy, he said, and attended to his book, he would one day make him Archbishop of Canterbury. Henry used to say at other times, that he would hereafter make his brother a bishop in order that he might wear a gown to hide his legs. This piece of pleasantry had of course allusion to Charles's weakness in those parts of his person, and is the least amiable trait which has been related of Henry. Osborne tells us that he would occasionally taunt his brother Charles till he wept; and yet, throughout the several childish epistles which passed between the duke and his elder brother, there is not the remotest trace of any unkindly feeling. The following juvenile letters are pleasing specimens of their good understanding, and especially of the affectionate disposition of Charles. They were severally addressed by Prince Charles to his brother Henry.

"Sweet, sweet brother,

"I thank you for your letter. I will keep it better than all my graith; and I will send my pistols by Master Newton. I will give any thing that I have to you; both my horses, and my books, and my pieces, and my cross-bows, or any thing that you would have. Good brother, love me, and I shall ever love and serve you.

"Your loving brother to be commanded,
"YORK."

"Good brother,

"I hope you are in good health and merry, as I am, God be thanked. In your absence I visit sometimes your stable, and ride your great horses, that at your return I may wait on you in that noble exercise. So committing you to God, I rest your loving and dutiful brother, "YORK.

"To my brother the prince."

"Sir,

"Please your highness: I do keep your hares in breath, and I have very good sport; I do wish the king and you might see it. So longing to see you, I kiss your hands, and rest. Yours to be commanded,
"YORK.

"My maid's service to you.

"To his highness."

Among the letters, addressed to King James by his family, which are preserved in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, are several juvenile compositions, in Latin, French, and English, from Prince Charles, then Duke of York. The following is a specimen:

"Sweete,

"Sweet father, I learn to decline substantives and adjectives, give me your blessing: I thank you for my best man. Your loving son,
"YORK.

"To my father the King."

In his eleventh year, Charles was made a

Knight of the Garter. At the death of his brother in 1612, he succeeded to the Dukedom of Cornwall, and in 1616 was created Prince of Wales. His progress in learning, and especially in theological knowledge, afforded great pleasure to his father King James. "Charles," said the king to his chaplains, "shall manage a point in controversy with the best studied divine of you all." Still, however, the prince neither despised, nor lost sight of, the amusements and elegances of life. "He was perfect," says Perinchief, "in vaulting, riding the great horse, running at the ring, shooting in cross-bows,* muskets, and sometimes great pieces of ordnance." This account of his accomplishments is borne out by the testimony of other writers. He is mentioned by Sir Symonds D'Ewes as a successful tilter; and at a tournament which took place in 1619, his prowess and activity are specially mentioned.

The Count de Brienne, also mentions his breaking some lances with laudable dexterity, and Howell writes from Madrid that the prince was fortunate enough to be successful at the ring, before the eyes of his mistress the Infanta. His taste for the fine arts was early displayed, and has never been disputed.

The match between Charles and Mary, second daughter of Philip the Third of Spain, was first set on foot in 1617, and was protracted, with various hopes of success, till 1622. The accomplishment of this matrimonial project was the darling object of King James. The immense fortune which it was expected would accompany the hand of the princess; the king's ambition to unite his son with a daughter of one of the great powers of France or Spain; and especially the restitution of the Palatinate to his son-in-law, which he hoped would attend a marriage with the Infanta, rendered the scheme, however obnoxious to his subjects, irresistibly tempting to himself.

A delay of five years, if it was displeasing to an old king, was no less so to a young and romantic prince; and Charles, naturally fond of adventure, and enamoured with charms he had never seen, was induced to enter eagerly into that chivalrous project of visiting the Spanish capital, which even in the annals of knight-errantry has hardly been overmatched.

* The cross-bow was made use of for purposes of sport to a much later period than is generally supposed. About this time, Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, when on a visit at Bramshall, the seat of Edward Lord Zouch, had the misfortune to shoot a keeper with this instrument, instead of striking the deer at which he had aimed. It is a curious fact, that by this mischance, it was rendered very doubtful whether the common law of England did not necessarily suspend the archbishop from all ecclesiastical function, and render the see vacant. The question was referred to sundry bishops, (rather interested judges) and others, among whom there arose a great diversity of opinion. The decision appears to have been principally influenced by the question, whether a bishop or archbishop could lawfully hunt in his own or any other park? This difficulty was cleared away by Sir Edward Coke, who produced a law by which it was enacted that at the demise of a bishop, the king had the disposal of his hounds; from whence it was inferred that the bishop could lawfully make use of the animals in his life-time. Heylin, Life of Laud, p. 80.—The method at this time, in sporting, was for the keeper to wound the deer with his cross-bow, when two or three well-disciplined dogs were let loose, and pursued him till he fell. Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, p. 29.—On the 28th July, 1620, Thomas Norreys, Earl of Berkshire, put a period to his existence with a cross-bow.

The journey of Charles to Madrid is believed to have been originally suggested by Buckingham. This fact, indeed, is not only asserted by more than one contemporary writer, but Buckingham himself imparted to his confidant, Gerbier, that he was the author of the project. The wily favourite, jealous lest the Earl of Bristol, the king's ambassador to Spain, should obtain all the credit of conducting the match, and anxious to effect an absorbing interest in the prince's affections, by associating himself with his most private feelings, made use of every argument in his power in order to engage the prince in his designs. He was not without supporters. Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, endeavoured to soften all difficulties, and Bristol himself wrote from Madrid, that the personal accomplishments of Charles would be sure to carry the day.

Every thing having been duly concerted between the prince and Buckingham, the next step was to obtain the consent of the king. This, however, was no easy matter, for though a very wild enterprise might appear extremely smooth to two chivalrous young men, the monarch who was anxious for his heir, and answerable to his subjects for his safety, was likely to think very differently on such a question. A moment, however, was selected when the king was in an excellent humour, and Charles taking advantage of it, threw himself on his knees before his father, and earnestly entreated him to give his consent to the expedition. Buckingham was the only bystander, and anxiously awaited the reply. James, after listening with great calmness to his son's proposition, turned imploringly towards Buckingham, as if desirous to ascertain his opinion in so grave a matter. The duke on his part, naturally made use of every persuasion in his power, and eventually enforced his arguments with so much vigour and ingenuity, that added to the warmth of the prince's entreaties, the king at length reluctantly consented to the undertaking, and promised to keep it a secret from the world.

James, however, was no sooner alone, than he began to reflect more seriously on the wild folly of the scheme. The many dangers which might befall his son, and the responsibility which would accrue to himself, presented themselves so forcibly to his mind, that when the adventurers came to him at the last moment for their despatches, he told them, with tears in his eyes, how deeply he had repented of his former consent, and added, that if they renewed the subject it would go far towards breaking his heart. Buckingham retorted with the greatest insolence, that after having broken a promise so solemnly pledged, nobody hereafter would believe a word he said. He told the old king, moreover, that he must already have been guilty of an untruth, for unquestionably he had communicated their project to some rascal, whose pitiful arguments had induced him to retract his promise, adding, that he had little doubt but that he should by some means discover who his counsellor had been, and that such an interference would neither be forgotten nor forgiven by the prince.

The haughty violence of Buckingham, and the renewed entreaties of Charles, had once more their desired effect. The weak monarch again yielded,—the day was named for their departure,—their two attendants were fixed upon, and Sir Francis Cottington, who was nominated as one of their train, and who had heretofore been long a resident in Spain, was even sent for before they parted. As Cottington entered the apartment, the duke whispered in the prince's ear, that the new comer would show himself averse to the expedition: Charles retorted in the same low tone that he durst not.

The king commenced by informing Cottington, that he believed him to be an honest man, and would therefore entrust him with a secret which he must disclose to no person living: "Cottington," he added, "here is Baby Charles and Stenny, who have a great mind to go by post into Spain, and fetch home the Infanta, and will have but two in their company, and have chosen you for one;—what think you of the journey?" Cottington afterwards repeatedly mentioned, that when this important question was put to him, he trembled so violently, he could with difficulty give utterance to his words. But the king peremptorily demanding his reply, Cottington told him fairly and openly, that he believed such a step would be a deathblow to the completion of the match. He was convinced, he said, that when the Spaniards had the prince once in their hands, they would immediately make new overtures, and greatly increase their demands; and that, more especially as regarded the advancement of the Romish faith in England. On hearing this candid opinion, in the agony of his grief, James actually threw himself on his bed, and breaking out into the most pitiable lamentations, exclaimed passionately that he was undone, and that he should lose Baby Charles for ever.

The prince and Buckingham were both extremely disconcerted. The latter turned to Cottington, and told him, in an angry tone, that the king had merely asked his advice as to the best mode of traveling in Spain, of which he was competent to give some opinion, but that he had presumed to offer his advice on matters of state; adding, that he should repent the impertinence as long as he lived. "Nay, by God, Stenny," said the king, "you are very much to blame to use him so. He answered me directly to the question I asked him, and very honestly and wisely; and yet you know he said no more than I told you, before he was called in." On this occasion, however, notwithstanding Cottington's opposition, the king kept his word, and the journey was definitively settled.

CHAPTER II.

On the 17th of February, 1623, the prince retired privately from court, and came to Buckingham's house, at Newhall, in Essex. From thence they set out on the following day, (accompanied only by Sir Richard Graham, Master of the Horse to the duke,) and arrived though not without adventures, by way of Gravesend, at Dover. They had previously disguised themselves with false beards and adopted fictitious names; the prince passing as Mr. John Smith, and the duke as Mr. Thomas Smith.

The first accident which happened to them, was encountering the French ambassador, (who was, of course, well acquainted with their persons,) on the brow of the hill, beyond Rochester. Their horses, however, though merely hired at the last post, were fortunately able to leap the hedge by the roadside, and thus enabled them to escape observation. This circumstance was the more fortunate, as the ambassador, (as was then usual,) was traveling in one of the king's coaches; and their recognition by some of the royal servants would certainly have been the consequence of a personal encounter.

But a more important incident had nearly arrested their progress. In crossing the river at Gravesend, for want of silver, they had given the ferryman a gold piece. The man was equally astonished and grateful for such liberality, and supposing that his benefactors were proceeding across the channel for the purpose of fighting a duel, he thought it the kindest step he could take, to hint his suspicions to the authorities of the nearest town. Accordingly information was instantly despatched to the Mayor of Canterbury; and just as the prince and Buckingham were about to mount fresh horses, they were summoned to the presence of that important personage. The duke, finding concealment impracticable, divested himself of his beard, and privately informed the mayor who he really was:—he was going, he said, in his capacity of lord high admiral, to acquaint himself secretly with the condition and discipline of the fleet. His identity was easily proved, and the adventurers were allowed to depart. A boy, who rode post with their baggage, had also recognised their persons, but the silence of this individual was not very difficult to be bought.

At Dover they were joined by Sir Francis Cottington and Endymion Porter, who had been despatched beforehand, to provide a vessel for their conveyance across the channel. Both of these persons, from their long residence in the country, were well acquainted with the Spanish language and customs. The party, which was now increased to five, arrived safely at Boulogne, whence they rode post to Paris. On their way they fell in with two German gentlemen, who had recently seen the prince at Newmarket, and who fancied they remembered his person. The improbability, however, of their being right in their conjectures, and the apparent astonishment, and cool denial of Sir Richard Graham, when they hinted to him their suspicion, had the effect of convincing them they were mistaken.

At Paris, where the travellers remained a whole day, the prince and Buckingham, in order to disguise their features still more, provided themselves with periwigs. Trusting to this further disfigurement, they contrived, through French politeness, and the fact of their being strangers, to obtain a sight of the queen-mother at dinner. The same evening they were spectators of a masked ball at court, where all the beauty of Paris was present, and at which Charles first beheld the princess whom he afterwards married: and Buckingham, that young and light-hearted queen whom at a later period he dared to address as a lover.

The famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury happened to be ambassador at the French court, during the short sojourn of Charles. The prince, however, fearing lest the visits or attention of the ambassador might draw upon him some suspicion of his real rank, neither communicated to Lord Herbert his arrival nor his intentions, at which the latter in his memoirs discovers some slight pique. Lord Herbert tells us, that the only person in Paris who recognised the features of Charles, was a maid-servant, who had formerly sold linen in London, and who insisted to every one that she had seen the Prince of Wales.

Nothing of importance occurred from this period, till the travellers had almost set foot on Spanish ground, when their progress was again on the point of being arrested. Howell writes from Madrid,—"The prince's journey was like to be spoiled in France, for if he had stayed but a little longer at Bayonne, the last town of that kingdom hitherwards, he had been discovered:

for Monsier Grammont, the governor, had notice of him not long after he had taken post." Charles was certainly subjected to an examination before he quitted Bayonne. Grammont, the governor, told Lord Herbert, that, till the adventurers had quitted the place, he was ignorant of the prince's rank. Charles and his suite are described at this period as wearing "fine riding coats, all of one colour and fashion, in a kind of noble simplicity."

Another escape was from the hospitality of the Duke D'Epemon, who, as strangers, kindly invited the party to his chateau. Cottington, however, informed him they were persons of such low degree as to be unfit for such splendid society, and thus eluded the invitation.

The arrival of Charles and Buckingham at Madrid was altogether a surprise, even to the English ambassador, the Earl of Bristol, who, on the 10th of March, 1623, thus announces their safety to King James: "Upon Friday, which was the 7th of this month, about eight of the clock at night, the prince and my lord of Buckingham, without any other company but their postilion, arrived at my house; where my lord marquis meeting at the door with Henry Jermyn, a son of Sir Thomas Jermyn's, told him that his name was Smith, and that he had met my servant Gresly by the way, who had fallen into thieves' hands, by whom he had been very ill-used, and had all his letters taken away; he said he had got a fall, and hurt one of his legs, so that he could not come up stairs but with great pain. Whilst Henry Jermyn was making this relation unto me, Sim. Digby went to see who it was, and knew my lord of Buckingham; but dissembled it so well, that before I could come to him, he had got him up to his chamber, and went presently down to the prince, (who stood all this while in the street with his postilion,) and brought him likewise so handsomely up to his chamber, that there I found them both together, and we carried the business so dexterously, that that night they were undiscovered by any, till the next morning, by the coming of Mr. Secretary Cottington and Endymion Porter, the secret was revealed."

"The prince," writes Howell, "and the Marquis of Buckingham arrived at this court on Friday last, upon the close of the evening: they alighted at my lord of Bristol's house, and, the marquis Mr. Thomas Smith, came in first, with a portmanteau under his arm; then Mr. John Smith, the prince, was sent for, who stayed awhile on t'other side of the street, in the dark." Having written to announce his arrival to his father, the prince retired to rest.

The next day Buckingham waited on the Spanish king, and formally acquainted him with the arrival of the prince. The duke was introduced through a secret passage to his majesty's private apartment. Bristol was present, and describes the interview. "I never," he says, "saw the Spanish gravity laid aside before, nor any man more overtaken with joy than the king was, for he secretly understood of the prince's being here." His majesty instantly despatched his prime minister Olivarez to do honour to his illustrious visiter. Olivarez threw himself on his knees to Charles, and in the course of the day the king himself waited on the prince. Nothing could be more cordial than their strange interview, and after many "salutations and divers embraces," it was not till a late hour that they separated.

From this period Madrid was a constant scene of magnificence and rejoicing. Nothing was omitted that could make the prince's stay agreeable to himself, or that might banish from his mind any apprehension of being detained as a captive; a consummation, however, of this wild adventure, which was much dreaded at home, and which, to all appearance, was not unlikely to happen. In order fully to appreciate the generous forbearance of the Spanish court, we must advert to an inhospitable practice of former times; that of treating as a captive any prince who might set his foot uninvited in the dominions of another. Richard the First, of England, passing in disguise through the territories of the Archduke of Austria,—Philip the First of Spain, having been cast by a tempest on the coast of England,—James the First of Scotland, whose vessel was seized by the English;—and lastly, Mary Queen of Scots, trusting herself in the hands of Elizabeth,—were alike detained as prisoners. But this dishonourable practice, of which so many examples had been set by the English themselves, was so far from being followed by the high-minded Spaniards, that they refrained even from imposing a single fresh condition in the marriage treaty.

The people of Madrid were much struck with the romance and gallantry of the visit. The famous Lopez de Vega aroused his rapid muse on the occasion, and his verses were every where chanted in the streets.

Que, siendo Amor mi guía,
Al cielo d' España voy
Per ver mi estrella Maria.

Charles Stuart, I am,
Love has guided me far;
To the heaven of Spain
To Maria my star.

Only a short time before, the Spaniards are said to have pictured the English as a nation little removed from savages. This notion had been fostered by the priests, who even described Sir Francis Drake to their congregations as a monster, half dragon and half man. These ridiculous prejudices had been dissipated in a great degree by the recent embassy of the Earl of Nottingham; on which occasion the Spaniards had been much astonished at the splendour of his train, and the beauty of the heretical English. But when they beheld the heir of a great monarchy risking liberty and life in furtherance of a romantic enterprise;—when they became eye-witnesses of an act of gallantry, which, even in their own chivalrous annals, had scarcely been surpassed;—and when there arrived at Madrid that brilliant band of courtiers, who had hastened from England as soon as the prince's departure was publicly known, the astonishment and enthusiasm of the Spaniards knew no bounds.

But the conduct of the Spanish king, Philip the Fourth, is beyond all praise. He insisted on Charles taking precedence of himself; he set apart a principal quarter of the royal palace for his accommodation; he appointed a guard of one hundred men to attend his person; and he presented him with a golden key, which, at any hour, would give him access to the royal bed-chamber. The prisons, moreover, were every where opened; hundreds of captives were set at liberty, and a recent proclamation against excessive costliness in dress was suspended in honour of the occasion. A day was appointed for the ceremony of a public entrance into Madrid; on which occasion the prince was attended by Gondomar and the ministers of state to St. Jerome's Monastery; the place from whence, on the days of their coronation, the Spanish monarchs make their entry into the capital. Here he was magnificently feasted, the officers of state waiting on him bareheaded. As soon as the banquet was over, the king came in person to escort him into Madrid. Placing the prince on his right hand, they rode together under a rich canopy, followed by a brilliant train; the houses hung with pictures and tapestry, and the people shouting enthusiastically as they passed. The reception of Charles by the queen was no less gratifying. She presented him with several rich presents, among which were perfumes and fine linen.*

Charles, for the first time, beheld the infanta on the Sunday after his arrival. The occasion was on the Prado at Madrid. "The king, (writes Howell from the spot,) with the queen, his two brothers, and the infanta, were all in one coach, but the infanta sat in the boot with a blue riband about her arm, on purpose that the prince might distinguish her; there were above twenty coaches besides of grantees, noblemen, and ladies, that attended them. As soon as the infanta saw the prince, her colour rose very high, which we hold to be an impression of love and affection, for the face is oftentimes the true index of the heart. The people here do mightily magnify the gallantry of the journey, and cry out that the prince deserved to have the infanta thrown into his arms the first night he came."

According to a curious tract, published at the period, the meeting on the Prado was a preconcerted measure. The prince being extremely anxious to obtain a sight of the mistresses † for whom he had adventured so much, and the strictness of Spanish etiquette unfortunately precluding a formal introduction till a dispensation had been received from the pope, the King of Spain kindly hit upon the expedient of the blue riband and the Prado. The following passage is from the little work above alluded to:—"In conformity to the prince's desire, his majesty being that night acquainted with it by the conde, resolved to give his highness all satisfaction. And so he went abroad next day, at the hour appointed, which was about three o'clock in the afternoon, and to the Prado, being the certain place agreed upon between them, his majesty conducting with him the queen, his sister the infanta, the infantes Don Carlos and the Cardinal Don Fernando, his brethren; the Conde de Olivarez, and the Conde de Gondomar, following him with much of the nobility of that court, both of ladies and lords. The prince, on the other side went disguised in the Duke of Cea's coach, and was attended in the same coach by the lord marquis, [Buckingham,] the Earl of Bristol, and the Conde de Gondomar, and Sir Walton Aston; and both the king and the prince made diverse turns and returns in their several coaches, and in several parts of the town and Prado, (which is a place of recreation where the nobility is often wont to take the air,) and every one of them saw each other in a clear light, not being able to sustain from saluting each other with the hat as they passed by, though they had agreed to take no notice of one another; and this was all they did for that time. The king and all the royal company returned by night by a world of torch-light, which made a most glorious show." Howell describes the infanta as a "very comely lady, rather of a Flemish complexion than Spanish, fair haired, and carries a most pure mixture of red and white in her face."

* Rushworth, vol. i. p. 76 and 77. "These presents consisted of a great basin of massy gold, which was borne by two men; a curiously embroidered nightgown was folded in it. Two trunks bound with bands of pure gold, and studded with nails of gold, with locks and keys of gold; the coverings and linings of amber leather, and filled with fine linen and perfumes. These were accompanied by a rich writing desk, every drawer of which was full of varieties and curiosities."—D'Israeli's Commentaries on Charles I. vol. i. p. 65.

† The fact is corroborated by the Earl of Bristol in a letter to King James. "My lord marquis," he says, "having intimated the great desire the prince had, as soon as might be, to see his mistress, they acquainted the king therewith, who was so forward therein, that, notwithstanding the next day was Sunday, and in Lent, yet he dispensed with his gravity so far as to go in a coach abroad, to a place called the Prado,—which is a hole without the town, where men do take the air,—with his sister with him, and all the court, where the prince was to stand disguised in a coach to see them."—Dalrymple's Memorials, p. 154.

The personal appearance of Charles at Madrid produced, however, but little effect in hastening the marriage. He was constantly refused a private interview with the infanta; her family giving as their reason the non-arrival of the dispensation. Still a certain cold intercourse was subsequently allowed in public, on which occasion the Earl of Bristol acted as interpreter; the king, however, always took care to be at hand, in order that he might overhear the conversation. Charles really appears to have admired the infanta's person. Howell tells us that he has seen him in a thoughtful mood, with his eyes immovably fixed on his mistress for half an hour at a time; and that he has known him to remain an hour in a close coach, in a particular street, watching for the infanta to come abroad. Olivarez, the Spanish minister, remarked pointedly that the prince watched the infanta as a cat does a mouse.

It was not his own fault that Charles did not address his mistress with all the passion of nature and romance. The princess was in the habit of spending the summer mornings at a suburban residence of her brother, the Casa de Campo. Here she used to wander by the river side, gathering maydew, and perhaps musing on the gallantry and accomplishments of her chivalrous lover. Charles, hearing of these visits, rose purposely one morning very early, and with only one companion, found his way into the garden of the Casa. The infanta, however, was in the orchard, and the door between them was double locked. Charles, determined not to be baffled, climbed the wall, and though the height was considerable, sprang to the ground. The infanta was the first to perceive him, and gave a loud scream. An old marquis, who was her guardian, immediately approached the prince, and falling on his knees, conjured him to retire; adding that he should probably lose his head should he allow him to remain. The door consequently was unlocked and the prince reluctantly departed.

Jewels, the value of which is said to have amounted to one hundred thousand pounds, were forwarded from London to Madrid, and lavished by Charles and Buckingham on the Spanish ladies. "The prince," says Arthur Wilson, "presented his mistress with a necklace which all Spain could not parallel; pearls that had not been long plucked from their watery bed and had left there but few fellows." The infanta, however, declined receiving them for the present, and they were deposited in the hands of the ministers of the crown till her marriage day. It was much to the honour of the Spanish court, that when the match was broken off, and a war threatened, these jewels were returned.

James was himself very desirous that the prince and Buckingham should appear with unusual splendour at the Spanish court. In a letter to Charles, dated 17th March, 1623, he writes:—"I send you the robes of the Order [of the Garter], which you must not forget to wear upon St. George's Day, and dine together in them, which I hope in Heaven you may; for it will be a goodly sight for the Spaniards to see my two boys dine in them. I send you also the jewels I promised, with some of mine, and such of yours, I mean both of you, as are worthy the sending, for my Baby's presenting his mistress." The king concludes,—“God bless you both, my sweet boys, and send you, after a successful journey, a joyful and happy return to the arms of your dear dad.”

Another extract from one of King James's letters (in reply to the requisition of the prince and Buckingham for fresh supplies of jewels) will show how ready he was to grace his son and favourite, and to gratify their exorbitant demands:—"For my Baby's presenting his mistress, I send him an old double cross of Lorraine, not so rich as ancient, and yet not contemptible for the value;—a good looking-glass, with my picture in it, to be hung at her girdle, which ye must tell her ye have caused so to be enchanted by art magic, as whenever she shall be pleased to look in it, she shall see the fairest lady that her brother or your father's dominions can afford: ye shall present her with two pair of long diamonds set like an anchor, and a fair pendant diamond hanging at them; ye shall give her a goodly rope of pearls; ye shall give her a carcanet or collar; thirteen great ball rubies, and thirteen knots or conques of pearls; and ye shall give her three goodly peak pendants diamonds, whereof the biggest to be worn at a needle on the midst of her forehead, and one in every ear. As for thee, my sweet gossip, I send thee a fair table diamond, which I would once have given thee before, if thou would have taken it, for wearing in thy hat, or where thou pleasest; and if my Baby will spare thee the two long diamonds in form of an anchor, with the pendant diamond, it were fit for an admiral to wear, and he hath enough better jewels for his mistress, though he has of thine own, thy good old jewel, thy three Pindars diamonds, thy picture-case I gave Kate, and the great diamond chain I gave her, who would have sent thee the last pin she had, if I had not staid her."

The Lord Treasurer Middlesex made great complaints of the prodigality of Charles and Buckingham. The following is a MS. note of Sir William Musgrave to one of the tracts in the British Museum respecting the prince's journey:—"It appears by the enrolment book in the office for auditing the public accounts (vol. iii. fol. 175), that the prince's expenses for his journey into Spain, during his abode there, and for his return from thence, amounted unto £50,027, which was paid in part out of the King's Exchequer, and in part out of the Prince's Treasury." It is even asserted in a letter from Mr. Meade to Sir Martin Stuteville, that £600,000 worth of jewels had been sent from the Tower into Spain, to be at the disposal of Charles and Buckingham.

That the Spaniards entertained strong hopes of the prince's conversion to the Romish faith, and of the consequent re-establishment of the Pope's ascendancy in England, there can be but little doubt; indeed, it was generally believed by the Spanish court, that the prince had made up his mind to become a catholic before he left his own country, a fact acknowledged by Bristol himself. The Pope wrote to the Bishop of Couchen, conjuring him not to let slip so glorious an opportunity of advancing the interests of their church. He addressed letters of expostulation also to Charles and Buckingham. To the latter he writes on the 19th of May, 1623,—exhorting him not only to become a Roman Catholic himself, but to use his utmost endeavor to bring over the court and kingdom of England to that persuasion. His holiness's letter to Charles is dated the day following:—"We have commanded," he writes, "to make continually most humble prayers to the Father of Lights, that he would be pleased to put you as a fair flower of Christendom, and the only hope of Great Britain, in possession of that most noble heritage, that your ancestors have purchased for you, to defend the authority of the sovereign high priest, and to fight against the monsters of heresy." He speaks also of the projected marriage, as "having elevated him to the hope of an extraordinary advantage." Charles returned an answer which he should never have written, and in which, if he does not actually profess himself a papist, he at least intimates that he is well inclined to the Pope's authority, and that he may eventually become a proselyte to the Romish faith. Hume, alluding to this correspondence, merely observes, that the prince having received a very civil letter from the Pope, was induced to return a very civil answer.

The Court of Madrid was far from discovering any backwardness in supporting the views of the holy father. Olivarez, and others about the prince's person, were entrusted with arguments by the heads of the church, which they constantly and ingeniously enforced. It was intimated to Charles, how much his conversion would smooth the path to his marriage; and when this inducement appeared insufficient, Archbishop Spotswood says, that it was even hinted to him, that unless he embraced their religion, he could scarcely think of winning the infant. It was objected by the prince, among other arguments, that his apostacy would, in all probability, produce a rebellion in England. To this it was coolly replied by the Spanish court, that they would gladly assist him with an army against such a rebellious people.

Among other incentives to conversion, all the splendours of religious pageantry were brought into action. The architectural magnificence of their churches,—the inspiration of their music,—and the solemn sacrifice of the mass, would instil, it was hoped, into the heart of Charles an exalted notion of the catholic mode of worship, and an equal contempt of his own. The most pompous processions were exhibited before him; he was carried to such persons as were famous for pretended miracles; popish books were dedicated, and popish pictures presented to him: nor was any thing omitted that could either fire the imagination, or awe the heart into reverence. Nothing, however, could allure Charles from the religion of his country and his conscience. Indeed, his visit was very far from infecting him with a more favourable opinion of Romish tenets. On the 5th of April, 1623, the Earl of Carlisle writes to King James, from Madrid:—"I dare boldly assure your majesty, that his highness's well-grounded piety, and knowledge of the religion wherein he was bred, is infinitely confirmed and corroborated by the spectacles which he hath seen of their devotions here."

After the decease of Archbishop Usher, the following memorandum was discovered in the handwriting of that prelate:—"The King (Charles I.) once at Whitehall, in the presence of George Duke of Buckingham, of his own accord, said to me, that he never loved popery in all his life, but that he never detested it before his going into Spain.

The wishes of King James, and the prejudices of the people of England, were greatly at variance as regarded the Spanish match. The latter had been long murmuring at the increase of the Roman Catholics and the encouragement they received; but when the heir to the throne was actually engaged to a catholic princess; when articles were being drawn up, which permitted the children of the Prince of Wales to be educated among papists, and by which compact their being members of that faith would be no bar to their succession to the crown, we cannot wonder that the protestants were greatly incensed at the conduct of James. But the king was alike deaf to the murmurs of his people and the strong remonstrances of the house of commons. His only feeling was anger at their interference; and while the latter were drawing up their protest, he withdrew himself discontentedly to Newmarket, nominally on the plea of impaired health, though in reality to escape from their unwelcome importunities.

It would be impertinent to detail the many objections which preclude a union between the heir to the throne of England and a daughter of the Romish persuasion. The general fact of inexpediency is sufficiently proved by the misfortunes which the union of Charles and Henrietta Maria eventually entailed upon their posterity, and the people of England at large. Strange indeed as it may appear, no one better understood than James himself, the miseries that would probably result from such a step. In his Basilicon Doron, written expressly for the benefit of his son, Prince Henry, he had published, but a few years previously, the following sensible remarks on the subject,—"I would rather have you marry one that was fully of your own religion, her rank and other qualities being agreeable to your estate; for although to my great regret, the number of any princes of power and account, professing our religion, be but very small, and that therefore this advice seems to be the more strait and difficult; yet ye have deeply to weigh, and consider upon these doubts, how ye and your wife can be of one flesh, and keep unity betwixt you, being members of two opposite churches: disagreement in religion bringeth ever with it disagreement in manners; and the dissension betwixt your preacher and hers will breed and foster dissension among your subjects, taking their example from your family; besides the peril of the evil education of your children."

But the prospect of a splendid alliance, and a no less splendid marriage portion, was too tempting to be resisted. The articles of the Spanish treaty are still extant, and exhibit singular proofs of the indifference of James to the interests of the protestant religion. Indeed, when we discover the degrading terms which are there insisted upon; when we find the King of England, and the head of the Reformed Church, affixing his name and approval to a document, in which a sect so hostile to the interests of his people is styled officially the Holy Roman Church; when it is approved that the infanta shall not only have a private chapel for the exercise of the Romish faith, but also a public church in the metropolis; when the King of England is content to be dictated to by the King of Spain, as to the manner in which he shall govern his own subjects; when a foreign prince is allowed to alter the laws of his country; and finally, when a protestant king consents that every separate stipulation shall be allowed and approved by the pope, we cannot view the conduct of James in any other light than that of wonder and disgust. As the treaty itself is a curious document, and as it may be useful to compare it hereafter with the no less disgraceful compact between Charles and Henrietta Maria, we will transcribe the most important of the articles.

"3d.—That the gracious Infanta shall take with her such servants and family as are convenient for her service; which family, and all her servants to her belonging, shall be chosen and nominated by the Catholic King, so as he nominate no servant which is vassal to the King of England without his will and consent."

"5th.—That she shall have an oratory and decent chapel at her palace, where, at the pleasure of the most gracious Infanta, masses may be celebrated; which oratory or chapel shall be adorned with such decency as shall seem convenient for the most gracious Infanta, with a public church in London," &c.

"6th.—That the men-servants and maid-servants of the most gracious Infanta, and their servants, children and descendants, and all their families, of what sort soever, serving her highness, may be freely catholics."

"9th.—That the chapel, church, and oratory, may be beautified with decent ornaments, of altar and other things necessary for divine service, which is to be celebrated in them according to the custom of the Holy Roman Church; and that it shall be lawful for the said servants, and others, to go to the said chapel and church at all hours, as to them shall seem expedient."

"11th.—That to the administration of the sacraments, and to serve in chapel and church aforesaid, there shall be so many priests, and assistants, as to the Infanta shall seem fit, and the election of them shall belong to the Lady Infanta, and the Catholic King her brother; provided that they be none of the vassals of the King of Great Britain; and if they be, his will and consent is to be first obtained."

"15th.—That the servants of the family of the Lady Infanta, who shall come into England, shall take the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain, provided that there be no clause therein which shall be contrary to their consciences and the Roman Catholic religion, and if they happen to be vassals of the King of Great Britain, they shall take the same oath that the Spaniard doth."

"17th.—That the laws made against catholics in England, or any other kingdom of the King of Great Britain, shall not extend to the children of this marriage, and though they be catholics, they shall not lose the right of succession to the kingdom and dominions of Great Britain."

18th.—That the nurse which shall give suck to the children of the Lady Infanta (whether they be of the kingdom of Great Britain or of any other nation whatsoever), shall be chosen by the Lady Infanta as she pleaseth, and shall be accounted of her family, and enjoy the privileges thereof."

"19th.—That the bishop, ecclesiastical persons, &c. of the family of the Lady Infanta, shall wear the vestment and habit of his dignity, profession, and religion, after the custom of Rome."

"21st.—That the sons and daughters which shall be born of this marriage, shall be brought up in the company of the most excellent Infanta, at least until the age of ten years, and shall freely enjoy the right of succession as aforesaid."

"24th.—That conformable to this treaty, all these things proposed are to be allowed and approved of by the pope, that he may give an apostolical benediction, and a dispensation necessary to effect the marriage."

CHAPTER III.

It has been doubted whether the Spanish match could ever have been accomplished, even if Charles had become a convert to the church of Rome; or indeed whether the Spanish court ever sincerely intended its fulfilment. Certainly, in the early stages of its discussion, James was the mere dupe of Spanish policy.* But the negotiation was protracted during the reigns of two successive monarchs, whose opinions on the subject appear to have been widely different. Philip the Third, the father of the infanta, who died during the progress of the discussion, had certainly not the remotest intention that the treaty should ever terminate in marriage. This fact is sufficiently apparent from the following letter addressed by his son, Philip the Fourth, to his minister Olivarez: it is dated 5th November 1622.

"The king, my father, declared at his death that his intent never was to marry my sister, the Infanta Dona Maria, with the Prince of Wales, which your uncle Don Balhazer understood, and so treated this match, ever with intention to delay it, notwithstanding it is now so far advanced, that (considering all the averseness of the infanta to it), it is time to seek some means to divert the treaty, which I would have you find out, and I will make it good, whatsoever it be. But in all other things, procure the satisfaction of the King of Great Britain (who hath deserved much), and it shall content me, so it be not in the match."

It appears by this curious document, that Philip the Fourth was originally as much averse to the fulfilment of the treaty as had been his father, Philip the Third. The hope, however, of converting Charles from heresy; the latter's great popularity in Spain, and the personal interest which he had acquired in the heart of the infanta, probably turned the scale in his favour. Certainly, Bristol, the English ambassador, was fully satisfied with the sincerity of the court of Madrid. He writes to the Bishop of Lincoln,— "It may be, your lordship will hear many complaints, that the match never was, nor yet is intended; I beseech your lordship to give little belief in that kind, and the effects will now speedily declare the truth, if the fault be not on our side." Lord Herbert of Cherbury, a man of strong sense, and who, from his situation as ambassador at Paris, had much intercourse with the elder sister of the Infanta, the Queen of France, was fully satisfied with the sincerity of the Spanish court at this period; the queen, moreover, candidly confessed to him, that her sister was very well inclined towards the prince.

* Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, perfectly succeeded in convincing James of the sincerity of his court. In a letter to the Duke of Lerma, he boasts that he has lulled King James so fast asleep, that he flatters himself that neither the cries of his daughter, the Queen of Bohemia, nor of her children, nor the repeated solicitations of his parliament and his subjects in their behalf, will have the effect of arousing him from his lethargy.—Acta Regia, p. 549.

At last, about six months after the arrival of Charles at Madrid, the dispensation was received from Rome. The affair, to all appearance, was now concluded, and all anxiety at an end. But whether this important document was accompanied by secret instructions from the pope, or whether the court of Spain was willing to take advantage of the prince's undisguised anxiety to make the infanta his bride, new difficulties unexpectedly arose. The Spaniards insisted on some fresh articles, as regarded religion, being inserted in the marriage treaty, and the correspondence between the courts of London and Madrid was again renewed.

Among other articles to be imposed, it was required, and eventually agreed to on the part of Charles, that he should be open at all times to the arguments and exhortations of such of the adversaries of his faith as might be inclined to enlighten him on the subject; while, on the other hand, no one should presume to tamper, either directly or indirectly, with the religious principles of his bride. An oath was also privately taken by James, that the papists should have free exercise of their religion throughout his dominions. These additional articles having been at length duly subscribed to, so satisfied was James once more of the successful termination of the treaty, that he was heard to exclaim in the fulness of his satisfaction,— "Now all the devils in hell cannot hinder it." A bystander wittily observed, that there were no devils left in hell, for they had all gone to Spain to assist in the match.

But again new difficulties arose. When apparently on the eve of fulfilment, the demise of Pope Gregory the Fifteenth proved the final hindrance to the marriage. The Spaniards insisted that a fresh dispensation was necessary from the new pope; Charles naturally became annoyed by the frequent delays, and Buckingham, having quarreled with Olivarez, was no less disgusted with the Spanish court, and made use of every argument to persuade the prince to return to his own country. Even James himself, sanguine as he had so lately been, began to entertain doubts of the sincerity of the Spaniards. He wrote to Buckingham, that the court of Madrid could hardly entertain any cordial intention to complete the treaty, and conjured him to bring back the prince with all speed; or if the latter should be still unwise enough to remain, he charges his beloved favourite, on his allegiance, to come away, and to leave the prince to the prosecution of his own affairs.

On the 12th of September, 1623, after a magnificent audience with the queen and the infanta, Charles, leaving the marriage to be performed by proxy, at length turned his back upon Madrid. Some suspicions there certainly were, that the Spanish court intended to detain him, and it was even whispered that his departure would be a secret one. When Olivarez mentioned the latter suspicion to Buckingham, the reply of the duke did him great credit; he retorted haughtily, "That if love had induced the prince to steal out of his own country, fear should never make him run out of Spain; and that he would depart with an equipage such as became the Prince of Wales." The Earl of Rutland was at the time cruising along the Spanish coast ready to support the vaunt of Buckingham with a powerful fleet. The prince's attendants were overjoyed at their expected departure. They had long complained that they had nothing to do but play at cards.

The king of Spain and his two brothers accompanied Charles as far as the Escorial, about twenty miles from Madrid, and would even have attended him to the place of embarkation, had not the queen been fast approaching the period of her confinement. At the spot where they parted, writes Howell, "there passed wonderful great endearments and embraces in divers postures between them a long time; and in that place there is a pillar to be erected as a monument to posterity. There are some grandees, and Count Gondomar, with a great train besides, gone with him to the Marine, to the sea-side, which will be many days' journey, and must needs put the King of Spain to a great expense, besides his seven months' entertainment here. We hear that when he passed through Valladolid, the Duke of Lerma was retired thence for a time by special command from the king, lest he might have discourse with the prince, whom he extremely desired to see: this sunk deep into the old duke, insomuch that he said, that of all the acts of malice which Olivarez had ever done him, he resented this more than any. He bears up yet under the cardinal's habit, which hath kept him from many a foul storm, that might have fallen upon him else from the temporal power." The name of this personage carries back our recollection to the part assigned to him in Gil Blas; and the narrative of the prince's visit to Valladolid is not rendered less interesting, from its having taken place during the period when Le Sage sketched the manners of the Spanish grandees. This same Duke of Lerma was in fact the patron of Gil Blas. It was for Philip the Fourth, the brother of the infanta, that Gil Blas is represented as procuring the frail Catalina, and as suffering his memorable imprisonment in the Tower of Segovia.

At St. Andero, where the English fleet awaited him, Charles narrowly escaped being drowned. He had been entertaining the Spanish grandees on board his own ship, and was courteously conducting them to the shore in his barge, when the wind suddenly arose. The darkness of the night, and the fury of the storm, prevented them alike from reaching the land, or regaining the ship. The rowers becoming faint from their exertion, nothing appeared left but to trust to the mercy of the ocean, when fortunately they observed a light from one of the vessels of the fleet. It was, however, with extreme difficulty and hazard that they fetched the ship, and were safely assisted on board, not without encountering some risk of being dashed to pieces in the attempt. Waller celebrated the prince's escape in a juvenile poem, remarkable to the curious in poetical anecdote as having been written only twenty-five years after the death of Spenser.

Now had his highness bid farewell to Spain,
And reached the sphere of his own power, the main;
With British bounty in his ship he feasts
The Hesperian princes his amazed guests,
To find that watery wilderness exceed
The entertainments of their great Madrid.

Charles was no sooner in safety on the bosom of that element upon which an Englishman seldom knows fear, than his first remark was on the "great weakness and folly of the Spaniards," in having allowed him to depart out of their dominions. It was the highest compliment he could have paid to their generosity. Charles arrived at Portsmouth on the 5th of October, 1626. The event is recorded by a bust of the prince, which, with a suitable inscription, is affixed to the walls of that town, where it may still be seen. How this interesting memorial escaped the fury of the civil wars does not appear.

The return of Charles was hailed by the populace of London with a warmth of enthusiasm which has seldom been exceeded on similar occasions. Tables were spread in the streets, and wine and sack flowed every where abundantly: bonfires and the joyous peal of bells enlivened the night. In relation to his future destinies it might be likened to a scene in a ballet introduced into a tragedy; how different an appearance was presented by the streets of the capital, when Charles for the last time beheld them from the fatal scaffold! Having passed directly through London, Charles and Buckingham hastened to Royston to pay their respects to the king. Apprised of their arrival, James met them on the staircase, and throwing his arms around their necks, wept like a child.

The infanta is the person most to be pitied throughout the whole of this memorable affair, and we cannot but regret that she should have been rendered the victim of mere political expediency. She appears to have become really attached to Charles, and is said to have feelingly observed, that had he really loved her, he would never have quitted her. At his departure she caused mass to be sung daily for his prosperous voyage; she had applied herself to learn the English language; and even went down on her knees to the king to persuade him to the restitution of the Palatinate. Bristol, the English ambassador, dwells almost with enthusiasm on the infanta's feelings and her constancy. In a letter from Madrid dated 21st of September, 1623, after alluding to the prevalence of a report that Charles had no intention to fulfil his engagement, he thus writes to the prince: "I dare assure your highness, it hath not been possible for any to raise in her the least shadow of mistrust or doubt of want of your highness's affection, but she hath with show of displeasure reproved those that have presumed to speak that kind of language; and herself never speaketh of your highness, but with that respect and show of affection, that all about her tell me of it with a little wonder. There was of late in some a desire here, that, before your highness's embarking, the princess ought to have sent unto your highness some token, whereunto I assure your highness that the Countess of Olivarez was not backward, nor, as I am assured, the princess herself; but this was not to be done without the allowance of the Junta; and they for a main reason, alleged that, in case your highness should fail in what had been agreed, she would by these further engagements be made unfit for any other match; which coming to her knowledge, I hear that she was infinitely much offended, and said, that those of the Junta were mazaderos, to think her a woman for a second wooing, or to receive the parabien twice for several husbands. The truth is, that now, in your highness's absence, she much more avowedly declareth her affection to your highness, than ever she did at your being here; and your highness cannot believe how much the king, and she, and all the court, are taken with your highness's daily letters to the king and her."*

* Clarendon State Papers, Appendix, p. 19. Archbishop Spotswood writes, that the prince left Madrid because he saw nothing was really intended. He adds, that it was intimated to Charles, that "if the match should be further pressed the infanta, to es-

In the mean time, it was believed, both at London and Madrid, that the match was progressing in the most prosperous manner, and that the second dispensation was only wanting to render it definitive. At St. James's a catholic chapel was in the progress of being built, of which the Spanish ambassador had laid the foundation stone. The infanta's portrait was to be seen in every street in London, and her arrival was almost daily expected. At Madrid also, she was already styled the Princess of England; her suite had not only been selected, but had even provided themselves with their liveries; and the English ambassadors, the Earl of Bristol and Sir Walter Aston, refused, as Princess of England, to stand covered before her. "The infanta," writes Howell, "is providing divers suits of rich cloaths for his highness of perfumed amber leather; some embroidered with pearl, some with gold, some with silver. Her family is a settling apace, and most of her officers and ladies are known already: we want nothing now but one despatch more from Rome, and then the marriage will be solemnised, and all things consummated." The admiration which the prince's gallantry had excited in Madrid, by no means subsided after his departure, and even to this period is not quite forgotten. "Never," they said, "was princess so bravely wooed." In the collection of royal letters in the British Museum there is an interesting one in Spanish from the infanta to James. The neglected infanta afterwards formed a splendid alliance with the Emperor Ferdinand the Third. She died in 1646.

At last, the second dispensation actually arrived from Rome. A day was fixed by the Spanish court for the performance of the marriage by proxy; cannons were fired off as soon as the tidings became publicly known; a church was covered with tapestry for the occasion; and bonfires were lighted throughout the whole of Spain. But whether the sincerity of the Spaniards was still doubted, or whether, as is generally supposed, the arguments and personal prejudices of Buckingham induced Charles to secede from his engagement, it is now impossible to ascertain: certain it is, however, that from the court of England emanated the final interruption of the match. A message was despatched by James to Madrid, insisting that, unless the restitution of the Palatinate was positively conceded, the treaty must be considered as at an end. It was replied by the Spanish monarch, that the concession did not rest in himself, but that he was ready to assist England with an army. His word was either really doubted, or was affected to be disbelieved, and Philip, observing the English court to be determined on a breach, refused to admit the Earl of Bristol to any further audience. He insisted, also, that all correspondence with the infanta should instantly cease, and that she should no longer be regarded or addressed as Princess of England. Such was the termination of the famous Spanish match, in which the duplicity manifested by the court of Madrid at the commencement of the negotiations, was met, it would appear, by a similar line of conduct on the part of the court of England at their close.

chew the same, should presently into the house of los Descalceados, a monastery of barefooted nuns." The archbishop was certainly in a situation to acquire the best information, and his book is even dedicated to Charles, but his account is so different from that of other writers (some of whom were as likely to be as well informed as himself) that it is impossible to regard his version as correct.—Spotswood, p. 545.

CHAPTER IV.

On the 27th day of March, 1625, died King James. Within a quarter of an hour Charles was solemnly proclaimed at the court-gate of Theobald's, where his father had breathed his last. It was considered as rather ominous that Sir Edward Zouch, the Knight Marshal, instead of styling the new king the "rightful and indubitable heir," proclaimed him as the rightful and dubitable one: he was corrected in his error by the secretary.

Such is the malignity of human nature, that Charles was actually accused of having been a participator in the murder of his father. Peyton in his Divine Catastrophe, and Lilly, in his Life of Charles, speak openly of the charge; but Milton goes farther, and is base enough to lend the credit of his name to an infamous and otherwise contemptible slander, which he could not but have known to be false. Addressing Salmasius, he writes:—"I will let you see how like Charles was to Nero; Nero, you say, put to death his own mother; but Charles murdered both his prince and his father, by poison. For to omit other evidences, he that would not suffer a duke that was accused of it, to come to his trial, must needs have been guilty of it himself." Whatever the other evidences, alluded to by Milton may have been, they have certainly not descended to posterity: doubtless they owed their fanciful birth to the acrimonious republicanism of the great poet. The insinuations of Peyton and Lilly are scarcely worth recurring to, and appear solely to have originated in Charles having dissolved the parliament which accused Buckingham of having poisoned his father. Charles undoubtedly believed his favourite to be innocent, and though the line of conduct which he pursued on this occasion may be considered blameable, or at least unwise, yet the whole tenor of Charles's life must defend him from so iniquitous a charge. It must not be omitted, that, on the 24th of February, 1648, the absurd and wicked charge was revived, in the most impudent and cowardly manner, by the republican party in the house of commons. As the attack was idle, it fell harmless, and alone reflected discredit on the paltry maligners.

Notwithstanding that it was altogether in opposition to the practice of his predecessors, Charles affectionately insisted on presiding as chief mourner at the funeral of his father. Young as he was, it was the third time he had performed the same melancholy office, having previously attended his mother, and his brother Prince Henry, to their last home. The superstitious argued from the circumstance, that a career of sorrow was in store for the survivor.*

Many, indeed, were the circumstances on which, even when in the very height of his prosperity, his contemporaries founded a similar belief; and when we remember the subsequent misfortunes which befel the unhappy Charles, we cannot but regard them as curious; at the same time they are instructive as showing the temper of the times. Senhouse, Bishop of Carlisle, who had been his chaplain when Prince of Wales, was selected to deliver his coronation sermon. The bishop took for his text: Rev. ii. 10, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of Life," &c.; a passage which was considered by the superstitious as far more suitable for his funeral sermon, than as adapted to the brilliant occasion on which it was delivered: moreover, during the ceremony it was discovered that the wing of the gold dove had been completely broken off.

Charles himself, contrary to the custom of his ancestors, probably to denote the purity of his intentions, had selected a robe of white, instead of purple, as his coronation dress. Purple having been ever considered the badge of sovereignty, as white was the emblem of innocence, it was inferred that hereafter he would have to rely upon his own virtues and integrity, rather than upon the greatness of regal power. His neglecting to ride through the city, attended with that state which had graced his forefathers on the days of their coronation, was also deemed equally portentous and ill-advised.

Even the melancholy expression of his countenance was held to be ominous of future ill. When his picture was conveyed to Rome, to afford the design of a bust, the artist turned to the gentleman who brought it:—he hoped, he said, it was not the face of a near relation, for it was one of the most unfortunate he had ever seen, and, "according to all the rules of art, the person whose it was must die a violent death."

Charles himself was singularly superstitious even for the age in which he lived. It was a strange infirmity in an otherwise strong mind and religious disposition. We are assured by Lilly the astrologer, that he sent, on more than one occasion, to consult him during his misfortunes, and the fact of his having done so is supported by other authority. Charles himself mentioned to the Bishop of London a remarkable shock which he experienced at his trial. As he was leaning on his staff, the gold head broke off and fell to the ground, which he considered, as it certainly was, a singular omen.

Another weakness of Charles was to bind himself to a particular line of conduct by secret obligations. On one occasion, when on a visit at Latimer, a seat of the Earl of Devonshire, he drew Dr. Sheldon aside, and placed in his hands a paper, which he desired him to copy, and having done so, to return it to him. This document detailed the measures which he proposed to adopt for the glory of God, and for the advancement of the church; and intimated that he had privately bound himself by the most awful vow, for the purpose of insuring their accomplishment. A particular obligation was to perform public penance for the injustice he had been guilty of to Lord Strafford in consenting to his death. In delivering this paper to Sheldon, Charles solemnly conjured him, (as if he feared the penalty would fall on his own soul,) to remind him of his contract, should he hereafter ever find him in a condition to perform any one of the articles which it contained.

A similar instance of moral infirmity is recorded in the king's own language, and bears the following attestation of Sheldon.

"This is a true copy of the king's vow, which was preserved thirteen years underground, by me,

"GILB. SHELDON."

The document itself is dated Oxford, 13th April, 1646, and runs as follows:

"I do hereby promise and solemnly vow in the presence and for the service of Almighty God, that if it shall please the Divine Majesty, of his infinite goodness, to restore me to my just kingly rights, and to re-establish me in my throne, I will wholly give back to his church all those impropriations which are now held by the crown; and what lands soever I do now, or should now, or do enjoy, which have been taken either away from any episcopal see, or any cathedral or collegiate church, from any abbey, or other religious house. I likewise promise for hereafter to hold them for the church, under such reasonable fines and rents as shall be set down by some conscientious persons whom I propose to choose, with all uprightness of heart, to direct me in this particular. And I most humbly beseech God to accept of this my vow, and to bless me in the design I have now in hand, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

"CHARLES REX."

Charles was once sauntering with Lord Falkland in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, when a splendid copy of Virgil was brought, among other books, for his inspection. Lord Falkland proposed to his majesty to try his fortune by the Sortes Virgilianæ;—that is, to open the volume, and from the passage on which the eye first falls, to glean a fanciful prognostication of future events. Charles accordingly dipped into the book, and hit ominously enough on the following passage:—it forms part of the imprecation which Dido pours forth against Æneas, and is thus translated by Dryden:

Yet let a race untamed, and haughty foes,
His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose;
Oppressed with numbers in the unequal field,
His men discouraged, and himself expelled:
Let him for succour sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace!
First let him see his friends in battle slain,
And their untimely fate lament in vain;
And when at length the cruel war shall cease,
On hard conditions may he buy his peace,
Nor let him then enjoy supreme command,
But fall untimely by some hostile hand,
And be unburied on the barren sand.

Lord Falkland, observing by the king's countenance that he was concerned at the circumstance, and imagining that, should he himself open the book, he might fall upon some indifferent passage, which would naturally rob the preceding incident of its importance, instantly proposed to try his own fortune. "The lines which he chanced to select were still more applicable to his future fate: It was the beautiful lament of Evander at the untimely death of his son Pallas:

O Pallas! thou hast failed thy plighted word;
To fight with caution, not to tempt the sword:
warned thee, but in vain; for well I knew
What perils youthful ardour will pursue:
That boiling blood would carry thee too far;
Young as thou wert to dangers, raw to war!
O curst assay of arms, disastrous doom,
Preludes of bloody fields, and fights to come.

In 1624, during the lifetime of King James, the Earl of Holland had been sent into France, to sound the feelings of the French court regarding a match between Charles and Henrietta Maria. This princess was the third daughter of the deceased Henry the Great, and sister of Louis the Thirteenth, the reigning King of France. After a complicated and rather lengthy negotiation, a treaty of marriage was definitely signed at Paris, on the 10th of November, 1624. It consists of articles scarcely less disgraceful to the English court or disadvantageous to the English nation, than those of the celebrated Spanish treaty which had preceded it. Indeed so similar are the two instruments, as well in terms as in spirit, that the one would appear almost to be a transcript of the other. The only really important alteration is in the nineteenth article of the French treaty, in which it is provided that the children born of the marriage shall be brought up by their mother, not merely to the age of ten years, as had been agreed upon in the Spanish compact, but till they should attain their thirteenth year; a dangerous concession, considering the unwearying vigilance of the Romish priests, and that it comprehended a period of life when the heart is most open to impressions whether good or evil. Some secret articles were also sworn to by James and Louis. By these it was provided that, throughout England, all catholic prisoners should be set at liberty; that they should no longer be liable to be searched, or otherwise molested on account of their religion, and that the goods of which they had been despoiled should be restored.

* Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 128. The fact that the plague was raging at the time of his accession, was considered to be a prognostic of future evil; the same disease, however, was committing its havoc when his father commenced his prosperous reign. It is said that these two plagues were both generated in one parish, Whitechapel; that they broke out in the same house, and on the same day of the month. Kennett, vol. iii. p. 4.—The story of the blood of a wounded falcon falling on the neck of the famous bust of Charles, by Bernini, when on its way to Whitehall, is a singular and well-known coincidence.

The deed of dispensation, in which Louis the Thirteenth guaranteed to the See of Rome that the King of England should faithfully fulfil the articles of the treaty, is another curious document. D'Israeli, in his ingenious work, the "Curiosities of Literature," speaks of a "remarkable and unnoticed document," namely, "A most solemn obligation contracted with the Pope and the queen's brother, the King of France, to educate her children as catholics, and only choose catholics to attend them." "Had this been known," he adds, "either to Charles, or to the English nation, Henrietta could never have been permitted to ascend the English throne." It is a pity to disturb this justification of Charles, but unfortunately for that monarch, there can be little doubt but that he was perfectly well acquainted with all the circumstances of the affair; indeed, the articles mentioned by Mr. D'Israeli as most objectionable in the deed of dispensation, are inserted, at least in spirit, in the treaty itself; a document which, as a matter of course, had not only been seen, but had been solemnly sworn to, by Charles. The subject is rendered of considerable importance, when we remember that the two children of Henrietta Maria,—Charles the Second and his brother James,—who afterwards successively inherited the crown, lived and died Roman Catholics; and that it was owing to a defect in his education that the latter died an exile, and that England became the scene of revolution in 1688. With this view of the importance of the subject, it may not be uninteresting to transcribe the particular passages in the deed of dispensation, which have been referred to by D'Israeli, in order that we may compare them with the parallel ones in the actual treaty.

EXTRACT FROM THE MARRIAGE TREATY.

"Art. 7.—The free exercise of the Roman Catholic Apostolic religion shall be granted to Madame, as likewise to all the children that shall be born of this marriage."

"Art. 14.—All the domestics Madame shall bring into England shall be French Catholics, chosen by the Most Christian King; and in the room of those that shall die, she shall take other French Catholics, with the consent, however, of the King of Great Britain."

"Art. 19.—The children which shall be born of this marriage shall be brought up by Madame, their mother, till the age of thirteen years."

The marriage of Charles and Henrietta was solemnised at Paris with great splendour; the Duke de Chevreuse performing the office of proxy for Charles. The ceremony took place on a theatre, erected for the purpose before the Cathedral of Notre Dame. On the 12th of June, 1625, Henrietta arrived at Dover, and on the following night the marriage was consummated at Canterbury. The private account of these events I have deferred to the Memoir of the Queen.

Considerable pains have been taken to prove that Henrietta exercised an undue influence, both domestic and political, over her husband. One writer, without even hinting at his authority, speaks of her peremptorily insisting upon having charge of the Prince of Wales. Another writer, Horace Walpole, solely I believe, on the suspicious authority of Peyton, informs us that when Charles, on some jealousy, restrained the Earl of Holland to his house, Henrietta refused to cohabit with the king till the restraint was taken off. Such and similar instances are frequently brought forward as proofs of the uxoriousness of Charles, and many passages have been quoted, from his letters to his queen, as proofs of his spiritless submission. Certainly these memorials evince a very great respect both for her opinion and advice; but, after all, the utmost that can really be adduced is,—a too favourable opinion of her capacity, a strong attachment to a beautiful woman, and a proper gratitude for the many sufferings which she had undergone for his sake. It was Charles's great misfortune, that he was too easily wrought upon to follow the advice of others, and frequently of persons less gifted than himself. Milton says of him, in his panegyric on Cromwell,—“Whether with his enemies or his friends, in the court or in the camp, he was always in the hands of another; now of his wife, then of the bishops; now of the peers, then of the soldiery; and last, of his enemies; that for the most part he followed the worse counsels, and, almost always, of the worse men.” There is as much justice as acrimony in this remark.

But the private history of the dismissal of the queen's French servants is alone sufficient to redeem the character of Charles from all suspicion of connubial subserviency. The insufferable insolence of these people is scarcely to be conceived. Nothing could be more degrading, than that the Queen of England should have been compelled by a foreign priesthood, to walk barefooted to Tyburn; and that, not merely in the common exercise of her faith, but to glorify the memory of the detestable contrivers of the Gunpowder Conspiracy. But it appears by a letter of the period, that the indignity did not stop here. “Had they not also,” says a writer of the time, “made her dabble in the dirt in a foul morning from Somerset House to St. James's, her Luciferian confessor riding along by her in his coach! Yea, they have made her to go barefoot, to spin, to eat her meat out of tryne (wooden) dishes, to wait at the table and serve her servants, with many other ridiculous and absurd penances.”

The priests, French as well as English, had flocked in such numbers to the queen's private apartments, as to cause great disquietude to Charles. He told them, on one occasion, that he had already granted them so much liberty in public, that he had at least a right to expect exemption from domestic intrusion. But the following is the most remarkable instance of priestly interference. The king and queen were banqueting in public, and, as usual, the chaplain was proceeding to say grace, when the queen's confessor actually struck up with a Latin benediction. The king's chaplain, (of course a protestant,) naturally provoked at the interruption, gave the confessor a zealous push, and then continued the grace. On this the latter went over to the queen's side, and commenced with renewed energy his benediction. The king, however, very sensibly cut the matter short by drawing one of the dishes towards him, when the carvers instantly began their office. A soon as dinner was over, the confessor proceeded, in like manner, to return thanks; the chaplain, however, had obtained the start, when each endeavoured to drown the other by the loudness of his voice. Charles very properly took the queen by the hand, and hastily withdrew her from the disgraceful scene.

The queen's ecclesiastical retinue consisted of a young bishop, whose age was actually under thirty, and twenty-nine priests. Fifteen of these were scholars, and the remainder Theatines—an order of friars whose principal occupation was singing of psalms. Besides this promising party, there were a number of male and female attendants, who, it is asserted, swelled the French train from the original number of sixty, to as many as four hundred and forty persons. These people lost no opportunity of fomenting a quarrel between Charles and his queen; while the priests on their part, naturally enough, used every exertion to restore the Pope's authority in England. Seminaries were formed for educating children in the Romish faith; the houses of the French attendants became a rendezvous for the discontented Papists; the Catholic members of Parliament were secretly tampered with; and no opportunity was neglected of obtaining proselytes to the ancient faith. Fortunately, however, these persons overreached themselves, for they were totally mistaken in the character of Charles.

The perpetual discords and captious discontent of this foreign establishment, are alluded to in most of the letters of the period. Not satisfied with the numberless immunities which had been provided for by the marriage contract, and with putting the King of England to the charge of 240l. a day for their subsistence, they persisted in the most frivolous and harrassing complaints of ill usage and discomfort. The French, observes a letter of the period,—“Seem to be discontented, because they have not allowance to keep themselves, their wives, and children; though they have more by 7000*l.* a year, than ever Queen Anne had.” Charles was not by nature inclined to be petulant, but his temper was at length entirely overcome by the continual broils of his wife's domestics, and the manner in which they insulted the prejudices of his people. When the priests sent to complain to him that the Chapel at St. James's, which had been provided for their use by the marriage treaty, was progressing but slowly towards completion, he answered, “That if the queen's closet, where they then said mass, were not large enough, they might use the great chamber; and if the great chamber were not wide enough, they might make use of the garden; and if the garden would not suit their purpose, they might go to the park, which was the fittest place of all.” This last remark, it would seem, did not so much apply to the number of the French catholics in general, as to the concourse of English priests, who seized every opportunity of attending the celebration of mass in the queen's apartments. This assemblage, illegal as far as the English ecclesiastics were concerned, became eventually so numerous, that even the queen herself, on one occasion, rose from her seat, and rebuking the latter for their indelicate zeal, commanded them peremptorily to retire. Their numbers, however, still increasing, the proper officers of the court were at length stationed at the entrance of the queen's chapel, in order forcibly to prevent their ingress. Some indecent scenes were the consequence, the French catholics drawing their swords in defence of their English brethren, and resisting the interference of the guard.

On one occasion, in the royal chapel, a popish nobleman is described as “prating on purpose louder when the chaplain prayed.” Charles sent him a message to be silent:—“Either,” he said, “let him come and do as we do, or else I will make him prate further off.” One of these squabbles nearly cost James the Second, then a baby, his life. His nurse, being a Roman Catholic, refused to take the oath of allegiance. The court endeavoured to convert her, but in their zeal they frightened the poor woman, and spoiled her milk, so that the health of the infant suffered. It was proposed to send her away, but the queen took her dismissal so much to heart, that the oath was dispensed with, and her milk probably recovered its virtue.

The anger of Charles and his subjects had been roused to its highest pitch by a long succession of insults, and the dismissal of the whole party, whether by pacific or forcible means, became at length the resolute determination of the king. Naturally willing, however, to obtain their departure, if possible, without resorting to violent measures, and anxious, also, to avert an unnecessary rupture with the court of France, he wrote to the Duke of Buckingham, who was then in Paris, desiring him to communicate with the queen-mother on the subject.

“You must advertise my mother-in-law,” writes Charles, “that I must remove all those instruments that are causes of unkindness between her daughter and me, few or none of her servants being free of this fault in one kind or other; therefore, I would be glad that she might find a means to make themselves suitors to be gone. If this be not, I hope there can be no exceptions taken at me to follow the example of Spain and Savoy in this particular. So requiring of thee a speedy answer of this business, (for the longer it is delayed the worse it will grow,) I rest,

“Your loving, faithful, constant friend,

“CHARLES REX.

In consequence of this and other remonstrances, as well as the domestic infelicity which continued to increase between Charles and his queen, and the distinct orders which had been issued by the king, that the French retinue should forthwith quit his dominions, the Marshal de Bassompierre (perhaps the fittest person in Europe to conduct so delicate a negotiation) was despatched to England by the court of France, with the object of effecting a compromise. It was not without difficulty that Charles could be persuaded to receive the ambassador, and consequently when the subject came actually to be discussed, the meeting, as might have been expected, proved a stormy one. The king, in the heat of argument, inquired of Bassompierre why he did not at once execute his commission, and declare war? “I am not a herald,” replied the other, “to declare war, but a marshal of France, to make it when declared.” Bassompierre has himself described the meeting: “The king,” he says, “put himself into a great passion, and I, without losing my respect to him, replied to him in such wise, that, at last, yielding something, he conceded a great deal to me.” He adds: “I witnessed there an instance of great boldness, not to say impudence, of the Duke of Buckingham, which was, that when he saw us the most warmed, he ran up suddenly, and threw himself between the king and me, saying, I am come to keep the peace between you two.” However, not all the art of the accomplished Bassompierre, not even the fear of incurring a war with France, nor the tears and entreaties of Henrietta, could induce Charles to grant any important concession, and the negotiation concluded by the foreigners receiving renewed orders to depart.

Not till the very last moment, however, when the carriages and vessels were in actual readiness for their removal, had the French been acquainted with the final determination of Charles. Having fully made up his mind, he unexpectedly entered the queen's apartments for the purpose of announcing it. There, to his great indignation, he beheld a number of the queen's domestics irreverently dancing and curvetting in her presence. Taking Henrietta by the hand, he led her to a private chamber, and locked himself up with her alone. In the mean time, Lord Conway had invited the French bishop, and others of the ecclesiastics, to accompany him into St. James's Park. Here, in a straight-forward manner, he laid before them the king's unquestionable causes for complaint, and told them plainly that every one of the party, priests as well as laymen, young and old, male and female, must instantly depart the kingdom. The bishop replied that, as regarded himself, he stood in the light of an ambassador, and therefore could not possibly think of quitting the English court, unless by express directions of the king his master. However, Lord Conway informed him openly, that if he did not make up his mind to depart peacefully, there would not be the least scruple in getting rid of him by force.

Having thus communicated with the priests, Lord Conway, attended by the treasurer and comptroller of the household, suddenly made his appearance among the rest of the establishment. Acquainting them in like manner with the king's resolution, he told them that it was his majesty's pleasure that they should instantly depart for Somerset House, and there await his majesty's further instructions. The women, we are informed, commenced howling and lamenting as if they were going to execution; and, evincing the most dogged determination to remain where they were, were eventually thrust out by the yeomen of the guard, and the doors of their apartments locked behind them.

The same evening, when they were all assembled at Somerset House, the king appeared in person among them. He hoped, he said, that what he had done would not be taken amiss by his brother, the King of France;—that particular persons among them, for he would not mention names, had fostered discontent between the queen and himself, and had so embittered his domestic happiness, that further endurance would be impossible. He asked their pardon, he said, if, by thus seeking his own safety and peace of mind, he interfered with their views; and concluded by adding, that his treasurer had received orders to remunerate every one of them for their year's service.* Madame St. George, a handsome and flippant French lady, was spokeswoman on the occasion, and endeavoured to expostulate with Charles, but his reply was even more peremptory than at first. This lady was personally obnoxious to Charles, having bred more mischief between himself and the queen than all the rest of the colony put together. She had even had the impudence to intrude herself in the coach with the king and queen, at a period, too, when that honour was never on any occasion allowed to a subject.

But the bitterest task for Charles to perform, was to encounter the sobs and remonstrances of Henrietta. That she might not behold the departure of her favourites from Whitehall, Charles, when he parted from her, had locked the door of her apartment. Her furious conduct on this occasion exceeded all bounds; she actually tore the hair from her head, and cut her hands severely by dashing them through the glass windows in the violence of her rage.

These events took place in the early part of July, 1626; and yet, notwithstanding the king's firmness and extreme anxiety on the subject, we find the French still domiciled at Somerset House after more than a month had elapsed. The patience of Charles being now entirely worn out, he dictated the following note—evidently in hearty anger—to the Duke of Buckingham:—

“Steenie,

“I have received your letter by Dic Grème; this is my answer:—I command you to send all the French away to-morrow out of the town, if you can by fair means (but stick not long in disputing) otherwise force them away, driving them away like so many wild beasts until you have shipped them, and so the devil go with them.

* In a little work, published at this time, entitled “The Life and Death of that matchless mirror of magnanimity, Henrietta Maria de Bourbon,” the king's speech is as follows:—

“Gentlemen and Ladies,

“I am driven to that necessity as that I am personally come to acquaint you, that I very earnestly desire your departure into France. True it is, the deportment of some amongst you hath been very offensive to me, but others again have so dallied with my patience, and so highly affronted me, as I cannot, I will not, longer endure it.” p. 14.

Let me have no answer, but of the performance of my command. So I rest,

"Your faithful, constant, loving friend,

"CHARLES REX.

"Oaking, the 7th of August, 1626."

Four days afterwards, appears the following passage in a letter of the period, dated 11th August, 1626. "On Monday last was the peremptory day for the departure of the French; what time the king's officers attending with coaches, carts, and barges, they contumaciously refused to go, saying they would not depart till they had order from their king; and above all, the bishop stood upon his punctilios. 'This news being sent in post to the king, on Tuesday morning his majesty despatched away to London the captain of the guard, attended with a competent number of his yeomen, as likewise with heralds, messengers and trumpeters, first, to proclaim his majesty's pleasure at Somerset House gate; which, if it were not speedily obeyed, the yeomen of the guard were to put it in execution, by turning all the French out of Somerset House by head and shoulders, and shutting the gate after them. Which news, as soon as the French heard, their courage came down, and they yielded to be gone the next tide.'"

The appointed hour having arrived, Lord Conway, together with the treasurer and comptroller, proceeded to Somerset House, to witness the departure of the malcontents. Lord Conway, with his colleagues, first attended the bishop to the door of his coach, where this captious gentleman again made a stand, praying, as a last favour, that he might be allowed to wait for the midnight tide, and thus escape the observation and ridicule of the crowd. The request was a natural one, and was civilly granted.

It required four days, and nearly forty carriages, to transport the expelled catholics to Dover. At first they appeared extremely dogged and sullen, but the good fare, and kind entertainment, which every where awaited them on the road, and the natural vivacity of their country, gradually dispelled their feelings of disgust: still, the derision of the mob must have been any thing but agreeable. As Madame St. George was stepping into the boat at Dover, a bystander took an aim at her strange head-dress with a stone. An English gentleman, who was escorting her, instantly quitted her side, and running his sword through the offender's body, killed him on the spot.

CHAPTER V.

The liberality of Charles, when he found it imperative on him to dismiss the queen's French attendants, had been kindly and munificent in the extreme. The list of donations is preserved among the Harleian MSS., and amounts to 22,672*l*. Not content, however, with this profuse generosity, the women commenced such a disgraceful and sweeping attack on the queen's wardrobe, that they actually left but one gown and two "smocks to her back." Probably jewels and other articles of value were likewise purloined, for even the lords of the council interfered, and it was attempted to enforce a restitution: we are informed, however, that an old satin gown was all they could be prevailed on to return. The same roguery was also attempted in the queen's stables, her master of the horse, the Count de Scipieres, laying claim to all the horses and furniture under his charge.

But the most ingenious attempt was one of extortion, in which the queen herself, from a weak regard for her favourites, consented to be a party concerned. They drew up a long list of various sums, for which they asserted Henrietta to be their debtor, amounting in all to 19,000*l*. The queen at first took the debt upon her, but on being earnestly questioned by Charles, eventually acknowledged the imposture.

Surely there is no part of the foregoing narrative which does not tend to exonerate Charles from the sweeping accusation of matrimonial tameness, which has been so often and so sedulously brought against him. He has himself left us an account of what he endured at this period. Naturally anxious to justify his conduct to his brother-in-law, the French king, he despatched Lord Carlton as his ambassador to Paris, and, in his instructions to that nobleman, enters into a full detail of the queen's behaviour, and of his own feelings. This curious document was originally published, by order of the parliament, in the "King's Cabinet Opened," in which interesting collection it may be consulted by the curious.

That Charles, at this period, had frequent misunderstandings with his queen, there can be no question; the fault, however, was most decidedly on the part of Henrietta; indeed, if we are to consider as authentic the instrument just alluded to, and it certainly bears all the features of truth, there can be little doubt but that, at this period, she constantly behaved herself towards him with the most insufferable insolence. Their quarrels were doubtless fomented by Buckingham, who trembled lest the queen should obtain an undue influence over her husband. "The Queen of England," says Madame de Motteville, "related to me, that quickly after her marriage with King Charles the First, she had some dislike to the king, her husband, and that Buckingham fomented it; that gentleman saying to her face, that he would set her and her husband at variance, if he could." It is evident, from the account given by Bassompierre of his embassy into England, and also from the letters of the time, that Henrietta was almost daily either in tears or in a passion. Bassompierre mentions the circumstance of the king entering an apartment in which he was conversing with Henrietta, when, it appears, she instantly "picked a quarrel" with her husband;—"the king," he adds, "took me to his chamber, and talked a great deal with me, making me complaints of the queen, his wife." With the dismissal of the French train, peace and comfort seem for the first time to have visited the domestic privacy of Charles.

The accusation which has been brought against Charles, of having been unfaithful to his marriage, rests almost entirely on the assertions of the republican triumvirate, Milton, Peyton, and Lilly, whose charges are as vague as their minds were prejudiced.

But the most unfair attack is that of Milton. "Have you the impudence," he writes to Salmasius, "to commend his chastity and sobriety who is known to have committed all manner of lewdness in company with his confidant the Duke of Buckingham?" This the republican and "holy poet" must have well known to be false. It is to be observed that no authority whatever is adduced for any one of these charges; that the name of no lady is even so much as hinted at; and that the writers of this wretched scandal, especially Milton and Peyton, were rancorous and bigoted to the last degree, and we shall have little difficulty in rescuing the character of Charles from their impudent and malignant aspersions.

So little ground is there, indeed, for accusing Charles of adultery, that it may be questioned whether any single instance can be brought forward of his having, even before marriage, been engaged in an intrigue. Peyton of course comes forward with one of his unsupported scandals, and informs us that, when unmarried, he "had for his mistress a great married lady by whom he had a boy," and that at the christening he presented the child with 8000*l*. There is, however, a letter extant from Charles, when he was Prince of Wales, addressed to the Duke of Buckingham, which may, perhaps, lead to a doubt of his immaculacy. It has certainly reference to some intrigue in which Charles was engaged, but whether that intrigue was of an amorous or of a political nature, the reader must judge for himself.

"Steenie,

"I have nothing now to write to you, but to give you thanks both for the good counsel you gave me, and for the event of it. The king gave me a good sharp position; but you took away the working of it, by the well-relished comfits ye sent after it. I have met with the party, that must not be named, once already; and the culler of writing this letter, shall make me meet with her on Saturday, although it is written to-day, being Thursday. So assuring you that the business goes safely on, I rest your constant friend,

CHARLES.

"I hope you will not show the king this letter; but put it in the safe custody of Mr. Vulcan."

With half a nation for his enemies, including numbers too willing to blacken his character, on little or no foundation, and filling an exalted situation, where the most unimportant action was eagerly watched and noted down, it is impossible not to believe, that if Charles had been an immoral character, it would have descended trumpet-tongued to posterity. The few clumsy charges which have been brought forward may be considered, perhaps, as the strongest evidence of his unsullied virtue.

Indeed, the unimpeachable morality of Charles procured for him from his contemporaries the expressive title of the White King. The name appears to have had some allusion to the dress which he wore at his coronation, and partly perhaps, to an absurd construction of an ancient prophecy, published by the astrologer, Lilly, with which he endeavoured to identify Charles. At the funeral of the king, the snow fell thick upon the black velvet pall which covered his coffin. "It was all white," says his faithful follower, Sir Thomas Herbert, "the colour of innocence. So went the White King to his grave." Osborne gives him the same title, but of course introduces it in derision.

The court of Charles was scarcely less strict than that of his puritanical successor, Oliver Cromwell. Every species of immorality was regarded with horror, and even levity was confined within proper bounds. The king set the example of decency, and his courtiers followed it. In the Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson, a valuable compliment is paid by his republican lady to the well-regulated propriety of the court of Charles. "The face of the court," she says, "was much changed in the change of the king; for King Charles was temperate, chaste, and serious, so that the fools and bawds, mimics and of preventing their too frequent recurrence, are investigated by the philosophic physician, are carried into practical operation by a code of sanitary law, and are sedulously watched over, as one of their most sacred and important public duties, by the government of the country. At home, the health, which is the life of the great mass of the population, is not considered worth a thought, except at times of impending danger, when thought is vain—when the pestilence rages in the midst of us, we run wildly about in search of relief—when, having completed its ravages, it finally disappears from our towns and cities, we are too happy to dismiss it also from our thoughts, and to forget all inquiries as to the means of prevention for the future, in congratulation on our preservation for the present. Our boards of health, hastily and crudely organised in the hour of difficulty and danger, when the danger and difficulty, by the mercy of Divine Providence, have been got over, are immediately dispersed—the fast days and the thanksgiving days have had their day—the contests between the contagionists and the non-contagionists are contagious no longer—the advocates of tar water, and the advocates of hot water, lay down their arms—specifics and the people who recommended specifics are alike forgotten—cajepout oil is a drug in the market, and brandy is no longer consumed under false pretences!

The pestilence is over—but the danger is not; that which has been, may be again—and the best time to escape a danger is surely that, when our judgment is unclouded by the prospect of imminent risk, and we as yet contemplate the danger at a distance.

But the danger never is at a distance. There exists, in great cities, an under-current of pestilence at all times and in all seasons—typhus, for example, is ever at work among us—it is true, at work obscurely, because its ravages are among the obscure—among those who live precariously from day to day, in low, unventilated, and densely populated neighbourhoods, where bad drainage, bad air, bad water, and bad smells, perpetuate the epidemics they originate, and whose miserable inhabitants form the never-failing and ever-dying population of our fever hospitals. We know nothing of this—we see nothing of this; the progress of the sick poor from their miserable “rookeries” to the hospital, and from the hospital to the grave, is silent and unobserved. Let a brace of dukes, however, or a few members of the house of commons, or even an East India director, be carried off, and we begin to hear of the epidemic—it then begins to be “dreadful,” “shocking,” and so forth. “To think of the Duke of Doodle—so excellent a man, only seventy-six—being so suddenly cut off!”—and Viscount Noodle, too, in the prime of life—a man equal to two bottles of port a-day—“is dreadful to think of!” The epidemic, dreadful to think of as it is, runs its allotted course, and the popular alarm keeps pace with it—infectants yet unborn, and aged people yet alive, are reported to have died of it—topers are said to be dead, and have a narrow escape of being buried alive, who are discovered, on more minute examination, to have been only dead-drunk—and every soul, without exception, carried off during the epidemic, has been carried off, if you believe your ears, by the epidemic—physicians are “looking up,” chemists and druggists in full work—post-horses, moreover, are in demand, and the great world gallops off en masse to save itself in the country—while the trading, mercantile, and middling classes, who are compelled to remain, bethink themselves of their unrepented sins, and liberally subscribe for white-wash!

It is impossible to calculate how much human life might be prolonged—not only prolonged, indeed, but, what is of still greater importance, how much the condition of humanity might be improved in great cities—by legislative interference. It is melancholy to reflect how little has, in this respect, been done. One of the first, one of the surest, one of the most practicable methods of ameliorating the condition of the poor, is the amelioration of the habitations of the poor. Take two men; put one into a comfortable cottage—not one of your gimcrack, rose-encircled cottages, constructed to exhibit the taste of the landlord more than to administer to the comfort of the tenant; but a clean, snug, and commodious habitation. Locate the other in a pig-stye: the one will degenerate into a hog, the other will “learn to venerate himself as man.” There is very little reasonable doubt, that if the design of Sir Christopher Wren for rebuilding the city of London, after the great fire, had been adopted, the value of human life in the metropolis would have improved; and it is equally certain that the plan for the regeneration of the city of Westminster, devised by the learned and talented Mr. Bardwell, if carried into effect, would be a good measure of morality as well as of architecture. An avenue carried from the east end of Oxford street through the “rookeries” of St. Giles’s into Holborn, would be a more effectual, safe, and permanent preventive of vice and crime, than if Meux’s Brewery were converted into an enormous penitentiary, and a couple of juvenile thieves were to be suspended in terrorem over the principal entrance every morning before breakfast. The making easy, safe, and accessible roads, is the very first element of civilisation, and is no less applicable to the wilderness of London, than to the wilderness of the Mississippi. We venture to hope that the legislature may spare a little time from the squabbles of contending factions, and petty personal triumphs in debate, to devote to carrying out the Report of the Metropolitan Improvements Committee, if it were only for the novelty of the thing. It would be worth a statesman’s while to give his best energies, for once, to objects practically philanthropic, than which nothing can be more so than an attempt to improve the habitations of the poorer classes of the inhabitants of the British Metropolis. We are far from having a desire to undervalue the benevolent exertions of those who labour to relieve the spiritual destitution of the London poor. Their task is a high and holy one, and their intentions must command the respect even of those who doubt the efficacy of their labours. The more we see, however, of human nature, whether in great cities or in the country, the more we are convinced that nothing can be done by the distribution of tracts, for instance, by preaching in the open air, by visiting the poor at their wretched habitations; in comparison with the moral predisposition that may be induced by the less direct, but far more efficacious system of improving first their temporal condition.

The prime essentials to human existence, in crowded cities, are pure water, pure air, thorough drainage, and thorough ventilation—which last are only applications of the water and the air—and last, though by no means least in importance, the facility of taking exercise within a convenient distance. Thus, every city has its public pulmonary organs—its instruments of popular respiration—as essential to the mass of the citizens as is to individuals the air they breathe. Paris boasts her Boulevards, her gardens of the Tuilleries, her Champs Elysées, and her Bois du Boulogne—Madrid, her far-famed Prado, where the monarch and the meanest of the people assemble to take the air, “their custom always of an afternoon”—Rome, her spacious Corso—Naples, her Mola and Strada di Toledo—and, last, Vienna enjoys her Glacis, no longer bristling with artillery, no longer enlivened with the “pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war,” but crowded with a peaceful, gay, and happy population. Within our own islands, Dublin recreates her sons in the Phoenix Park, a spot unrivaled in its display of the softer features of rural scenery—Edinburgh rejoices in her King’s Park, to which there is nothing equal for solitary grandeur and romantic seclusion within a like distance of a metropolitan city anywhere to be found—and the mighty modern Babylon pours her pent-up population through the various avenues of her parks. Well, indeed, and happily, have these been designated “THE LUNGS OF LONDON.”

There is not only much matter of historical importance connected with the several parks of London, scattered about in the various statistical books of surveys, but a good deal of material for picturesque description. Why it is that the historical records have not, by some curious inquirer, been collected and arranged, or why the natural and artificial advantages of these charming retreats from the coil and hum of men have not been thought worthy of description, must, I suppose be attributable to our habitual negligence of that which we see every day, and which, by being continually presented to our eyes, takes no hold upon the imagination or the memory, but is, as it were, of itself, a continual picture, and of itself a perpetual record. We are not to be deterred from our proposed feeble attempt at description, by any dread of the suspicion of cockneyism. Nature is beautiful exceedingly, whether in the parish of St. James’s or the parish of St. Kilda; and whatever contributes materially to the recreation and the health of numbers, is, by that circumstance alone, raised above the level of neglect, and has dignity sufficient to demand attention.

The Lungs of London, then, consist of several great divisions or lobes, embracing the west end of the town, and extending round to the northward, commencing, we may say, at the entrance to the Horse Guards, and extending through St. James’s Park, the Green Park, Hyde Park, and Kensington Gardens, forming a continued thoroughfare of several miles, in a direct line towards the northwest. To the north, the Regent’s Park extends from the upper end of that noble avenue, Portland Place, as far as the base of Primrose Hill, with a transverse diameter almost equal to its length, and containing within its circumference between five and six hundred acres of valuable land. This is the northern lobe of the Lungs of London. The eastern side of the city is lamentably destitute of breathing places for the pent-up citizens, as is also the borough of Southwark. Lambeth is somewhat more open; its Bishop’s Walk, affording a pleasing view of the river, and an agreeable promenade of a too limited extent.

The several divisions of the great respiratory organs we have noticed, are worth a distinct consideration; and, as we will understand them better by ocular demonstration, the curious reader will take his hat and stick. I will be his humble cicerone, and tell him all I know of the history of the parks of our metropolis, as we go along.

THE GREAT RAILWAY CONTRACTOR.

The will of Hugh M'Intosh, Esq., late of Bloomsbury Square, in the county of Middlesex, the great railway contractor, whose name is familiar to most of our readers, has just been proved in the Prerogative Court of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury in Doctors' Commons, by his son, David M'Intosh, and Timothy Tyrrel, Esqs., the executors. The personal property of the deceased is sworn to be under the value of £300,000, and a stamp duty of £3750 has been paid on the probate. The will is contained in one sheet of paper, and, singular to relate, without making any bequest of his property, so that the whole of the immense fortune will go to the widow and children, in the same manner as if he had died intestate, with the exception, that in the event of his having died without a will, the duty to government would have been £5625, consequently saving £1875. The deceased was originally of humble occupation, but by perseverance and industry accumulated the immense fortune which he died possessed of. The whole of the London and Greenwich Railway was built by him, and also the greater portion of the East India Docks. Mr. M'Intosh was a native of Nairnshire. He wrought for some time as a common labourer on the Caledonian canal, and afterwards removed to Lancashire, where he first took small contracts, by which he saved a little money. He then went to London, and was in a short time extensively engaged on the West India Docks. This established his reputation as a contractor of public works, and he soon became a leading man in that department; and by native talent, integrity, enterprise, and industry, he became possessed of the large fortune which he left behind him. His reputation as a public contractor rests on many useful and durable works, both in this country and on the continent; while his kindness of heart is attested in the grateful recollection of many young men whom he assisted by his advice, and in many instances more substantially befriended.

GENIUS WORSHIP.

By W. Thompson, B. A.

THE VESTIBULE.

Matur'd in sleep, its columns form'd of air.
I built a temple, and recalling oft
Its visionary chambers, made me there
A cell for warm heart-worship. Sweet and soft Comes every thought, what time this fane aloft
Rears up its unsubstantial dome, to greet
The solemn hour of peace, and doubly sweet
In inward calm the tributary lay
To frame, and there, on bended knee, to pay
You homage, O ye Shades! that there united meet.

NICHE FIRST.—SPENCER.

We owe thee much, thou intellectual sire,
Whose offspring, nurtur'd on ambrosial food,
Were very giants. At thy fervent fire
Did many light their torches; what was rude
Became all smoothness; what was evil, good.

And though thy children overtop thine height,
Though their young fame makes pale the ancient light
Of glory that around thee plays, yet still None seeks thy page without a rapture-thrill—
And still thy volumes old are monuments of might.

NICHE SECOND.—SHAKESPEARE.

Lord of the tear and laugh! how coldly tame
The hymn of one poor voice uprais'd to thee!
Thee, who the praise of all the earth may'st claim.
Nor unregarded Nile, with voice of glee,
Proclaims it to Hymettus constantly.
To the queen-city of the sister hills
In turn he pours it, whilst from her the rills
Of Italy take up the swelling lay,
Which speaking Hadriatic waves convey,
Till each fair scene thou knew'st, with thankful music thrills.

NICHE THIRD.—MILTON.

To do thee homage worthily, thou bard
Of things above the earth, who dares aspire
To him must fall an union rare and hard,— Hebrew sublimity and Grecian fire—
Lore of the closet and a silver lyre,
Swept by a hand that from the cope of heaven,
From earth beneath, and ocean wildly driven,
Hath gathered stores of beauty. Say to whom
Yet born, or still within the future's womb,
This combination strange shall e'er again be given.

NICHE FOURTH.—SCOTT.

The very essence of creative health
Breathes its full freshness on thy storied song:
Man—maiden—sprite grow wondrous in the wealth,
Of rapid thought and action: that belong
To all, the lored in good, the steel'd in wrong;
They are the gifts to make a poet's tome
A book of pictures, and to fasten home
The fancy, sick with unsubstantial shade,
With hints of beauty—from her wand'ring, made Happy with scenes defined, where guided she may roam.

NICHE FIFTH.—SHELLEY.

On Nature's acts of wonder thou didst gaze,
Ev'n as the full-orb'd infant watches still
A mother's motion; unto thee her ways
Were joy. Thy spirit from the Grecian rill,
Had of a holy madness drunk her fill,
And Plato—lov'd Athenian—lent the bowl
Its deepest treasur'd sweets. Benighted soul!
That so didst fail to learn one truth from him—
To seek, when thought's bewilder'd aisle grew dim,
The guiding beams that clear round Israel's altar roll!

NICHE SIXTH.—BYRON.

Least honour'd—yet how fair!—of this bright band!
Whom beckoning glory and the spurs of scorn
Goaded to speed; whom slander from thy land
Of birth, and hate, had mercilessly torn:
Nearest whose vengeful heart was ever worn
An amulet of scorpions, hind'ring still Incoming kindness or departing ill!
Pierce eloquence, faint promise of amend,
And fiery fancy furnish claim to blend Thine image with the shades that this calm shelter fill.

NICHE SEVENTH.—HEMANS.

Sole sister in this constellated group
Of brothers! yet most worthy thou to share
Their stellar brightness, nor condemn'd to stoop
To them, like vision-stars of old. I bear
A scroll of pity from the dark despair
Of Silvio, prison'd in an Austrian cell,
Traced in thy tremulous hand—and oh! too well
It brings to dear remembrance all thy fate,
Thy spirit is the prisoner, and the grate
That girds it, is the world whose chillness none dispel.

NICHE EIGHTH.—WORDSWORTH.

Thou stand'st, to give her mysteries a voice,
Before the oracle of Nature; thou,
Upon her tripod throned, may'st well rejoice,
And bear a thankful gladness on thy brow,
For loyally thou keep'st thy priestly vow,
And in the accents of simplicity,
When word to thought is link'd, and may not be Dissever'd without loss, dost summon home
Those who in gewgaw temples straying roam
To Nature's smiling hearth, her roof of majesty.

SCRAPS.

The art of Mosaic work was very general in ancient Greece and this species of magnificence was so recherche, that it was used even to ornament ship! Hieron, King of Syracuse, built one, where all the story of the Iliad was represented in small stones! This vessel was the work of Archimedes, and was sent as a present to Ptolemy Philopater. Among other curiosities of this kind, was a grotto decorated with figures in Mosaic. This art came from Greece to Rome, before the war with the Cimbr, according to Pliny; but began to be in vogue only in the time of Sylla.

A NEW JURY.—The following lines are said to have been handed in court, to a beautiful young lady, who was attending a trial at Warwick Assizes:—

Whil'st petty offences and felonies smart,
Is there no jurisdiction for stealing one's heart!
You, fair one, will smile and cry, "Laws I defy you,"
Assured that no peers can be summoned to try you;
But think not that paltry defence will secure ye,
For the Muses and Graces will just make a jury.

It is an observation suggested by all history—and by none more than by that of James and his successor,—that the religious spirit, when it mingles with faction, contains in it something supernatural and unaccountable; and that, in its operations upon society, effects correspond less to their known causes than is found in any other circumstance of Government—Hume, Jac. I. c. 47.

James I. granted licenses to ale houses, &c., by powers given to private patentees.
Bacon was impeached in 1621,—he was fined 40,000 pounds—which was afterwards remitted.

GEORGE VILLIERS,

DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

"When this extraordinary man with the figure and genius of Alcibiades, could equally charm the presbyterian Fairfax, and the dissolute Charles; when he alike ridiculed that witty king and his solemn chancellor; when he plotted the ruin of his country with a cabal of bad ministers, or equally unprincipled, supported its cause with bad patriots,—one laments that such parts should have been devoid of every virtue; but when Alcibiades turns chemist; when he is a real bubble and a visionary miser; when ambition is but a frolic; when the worst designs are for the foolish ends, contempt extinguished all reflection on his character.

"The portrait of this duke has been drawn by four masterly hands. Burnet has hewn it out with his rough chisel; Count Hamilton touched it with that slight delicacy that finished while it seems but to sketch; Dryden caught the living likeness; Pope completed the historical resemblance."—Walpole.

"In these portraits there are so many traits of resemblance, we may infer they are all from good likenesses.

"He built the finest towers of cards imaginable, and had an agreeable voice. Miss Stuart had no aversion to scandal; and the duke was both the father and mother of scandal; he made songs and invented old women's stories with which she was delighted; but his peculiar talent consisted in turning into ridicule whatever was ridiculous in other people, and in taking them off even in their presence, without their perceiving it; in short he knew how to act all parts, with so much grace and pleasantry, that it was difficult to do without him, when he had a mind to make himself agreeable; and he made himself so necessary to Miss Stuart's amusement that she sent all over town to seek for him, when he did not attend the king to her apartments.

"He was extremely handsome, and still thought himself much more so than he really was; although he had a great deal of discernment, yet his vanity made him often mistake civilities as intended for his person, which were only bestowed on his wit and drollery."—De Grammont.

Bishop Burnet says, he "was a man of noble presence. He had a great liveliness of wit, and a peculiar faculty of turning all things into ridicule, with bold figures, and natural descriptions. He had no sort of literature, only that he was drawn for some years into chemistry and thought he was near finding the philosopher's stone. He had no principles of religion, virtue, or friendship,—pleasure, frolic, or extravagant diversion was all that he laid to heart. He was true to nothing, for he was not true to himself. He had no steadiness nor conduct; he could keep no secret, nor execute any design without spoiling it. He could never fix his thoughts, nor govern his estate, though then the greatest in England. He was tied about the king, and for many years he had a great ascendant over him; but he spake of him to all persons with that contempt, that at last he drew a lasting disgrace upon himself. And at last he ruined both body and mind, fortune and reputation equally. The madness of vice appeared in his person in very eminent instances; since at last he became contemptible, and poor, and sickly, and sunk in his parts, as well as in all other respects, so that his conversation was as much avoided as even it had been courted."—History of his own times.

Dryden's well known character of him is in these lines.

"In the first rank of these did Zimri stand;
A man so various, that he seem'd to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome;
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was every thing by starts and nothing long;
But, in the course of one revolving moon
Was chemist, fidler, statesman and buffoon.
Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking,
Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
Blest madman, who could every house employ,
With something new to wish or to enjoy:
Railing and praising were his usual themes,
And both to show his judgment, in extremes;
So over violent or over civil,
That every man with him was god or devil.
In squandering wealth was his peculiar art,
Nothing went unrewarded but desert;
Beggard by fools, whom still he found too late,
He had his jest, and they had his estate;
He laugh'd himself from court, then sought relief,
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief.
Thus wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left."

Absalom and Achitophel.

The last scene of this nobleman's life is thus described by Pope.

"In the worst inn's worst room,
The floors of plaster and the walls of dung,
On once a flock-bed, but repaired with straw,
With tape-tied curtains, never meant to draw;
The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
Great Villiers lies;—alas! how changed from him,
That life of pleasure and that soul of whim!
Gallant and gay, in Clieveden's proud alcove
The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and Love;
Or just as gay at council, in a ring
Of mimic'd statesmen, and their merry king.

No wit to flatter left of all his store!
No fool to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends."

Moral Essay.

PRINCE RUPERT.

Born with the taste of an uncle whom his sword was not fortunate in defending, Prince Rupert was fond of those sciences which soften and adorn a hero's private hours, and knew how to mix them with his minutes of amusement, without dedicating his life to their pursuit, as those who, wanting capacity for momentous views, make serious study of what is only the transitory occupation of a genius. Had the court of the first Charles been peaceful, how agreeably had the prince's congenial propensity flattered and confirmed the inclination of his uncle! How the muse of arts would have repaid the patronage of the monarch, when, for his first artist she would have presented him with his nephew! How different a figure did the same prince make in a reign of dissimilar complexion! The philosophic warrior who could relax himself into the ornament of a refined court, was thought a savage mechanic, when courtiers were only voluptuous wits. Let me transcribe a picture of Prince Rupert, drawn by a man who was far from having the least portion of wit in that age, who was superior to its indelicacy, and who yet was so overborne by its prejudices that he had the complaisance to ridicule virtue, merit, talents. "He was brave and courageous, even to rashness; but crossgrained and incorrigibly obstinate; his genius was fertile in mathematical experiments, and he possessed some knowledge of chemistry; he was polite even to excess, unseasonably; but haughty, and even brutal, when he ought to have been gentle and courteous; he was tall, and his manners were ungracious; he had a dry hard faced visage, and a stern look, even when he wished to please; but when he was out of humour, he was the true picture of reproof." What a pity that we, who wish to transmit this prince's resemblance to posterity on a fairer canvass, have none of these inimitable colours to efface the harsher likeness! We can but oppose facts to wit, truth to satire. How unequal the princes! yet what these lines cannot do, they may suggest—they may induce the reader to reflect, that if the prince was defective in the transient varnish of a court, he, at least, was adorned by the arts that polish, which can alone make a court attract the attention of subsequent ages.—Horace Walpole—Catalogue of Engravers, p. 135.

MUSIC.

The sovereigns of France always patronised the Grand Opera or Academie Royale. Under Napoleon and the Restoration, when its expenses were scarcely half of what they now amount to, the opera derived above 800,000 francs a year from the public treasury and civil list of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. The matériel of this opera is valued at 4,000,000 of francs. It is obliged to give 150 representations in the year.

The salary of one singer only now exceeds what the whole opera cost a hundred years ago, when the total expense of the personel, including singers, dancers, the orchestra, machinists, tailors and dress makers, amounted only to 67,050 livres. At that period a premier chanteur was paid 1500 livres per annum, a premier danseur 1,000, and a premiere danseuse 900—sums for which Taglioni would scorn to perform a mazurka, or Ellsler a cachucha. Times are indeed wonderfully altered, as regards dramatic emoluments, and foreign artistes, although at no period, perhaps, has there been a greater competition in these professions. At no place has the increase been more remarkable than at the Italian opera in London, where under the management of Handel, Lenosino, an Italian singer, had 1,500 guineas for a season, and another, Tassinelli, after a short stay in England amassed a fortune, purchased an estate in his native country, and proving at least grateful to the source of his opulence, erected and dedicated a temple in his realms to "English Folly." Yet Lenosino and Tassinelli would have marvelled if they had lived to witness the engagements of Catalani who, as an intelligent lessee of the opera tells us, "exactd terms unparalleled in the annals of foreign extortion." What those terms were we know not precisely, but have every reason to believe they have been much exceeded by those of her fair successors. Malibran in 1829, was engaged at the London Opera, at seventy-five guineas a night with a benefit, and at the Italian Opera at Paris in 1830, at 1,175 francs per night. After three seasons in Paris and two in London, as her biographer tells us, she had accumulated 24,000*l*. In 1833, she was engaged at Drury Lane at 150*l*. per night, and her next engagement at the same house, was at the rate of 3,775*l*. for thirty nights. At Milan, subsequently, her engagement with the Duke Visconte was 420,000 francs with a palace for her residence, a carriage, and a free table, for one hundred and eighty performances. Julia Grisi, as was lately proved before a French court of law, realises about 10,000*l*. a year by her performances and concerts in London and Paris. Rubini is stated by a French print, to have made an income of 4,000*l*. per annum, and it will be no fault of the British public, if his comrades do not thrive equally well after the memorable battle fought and won for one of them in the last season of her Majesty's Theatre. Madame Demoreau Cinti receives, we believe, some 60,000 francs from the Opera Comique, a sum however, not extravagant, when we compare that great singer with the more prosperous prima donna of the Italian Opera. Taglioni's receipts at St. Petersburg, Vienna, and London, would perhaps be deemed more extraordinary still, if they could be accurately stated, though they might prove reasonable enough when compared with what the New World is yielding to Fanny Ellsler, who is stated to have been engaged for Havana at the rate of 4000*l*. for one month of salutation. After these details the emoluments of the singers now in vogue in Italy need not surprise. According to a statement just published on the continent, they are as follows:—Mariani (who lately demanded 6,000*l*. for a season at Paris, 24,000*l*.; Salvi, 2,000*l*.; Donzelli, 2,800*l*.; Riena, Poggi, and Pendazzi, from 1200*l*. to 1600*l*.; Rouconi and Marini, about 1800*l*.; Mesdames Straponi, Schoberlechner, and Rouzi, 2000*l*.; Madame Marini, 1400*l*.; Mademoiselle Francilla Pixis, 1600*l*.; and Madame Ungher, 2800*l*.

Composers have their due share in the golden patronage which the 19th century has extended to the lyric drama. Rosini leads a melancholy life at Bologna, with an income rated at 4000*l*.; Meyerbeer must have, by his compositions, added a large revenue to the one he has derived from a wealthy father. If Doniretti, with his prolific pen and present vogue, be not on the high road to fortune, it must be his own fault.—Foreign Quarterly.

TIME.

I saw a child whose youthful cheek
Glow'd with health's golden bloom,
And light did from his young eyes break,
And his sweet face illumine:
The song he sang was "Dance! prepare
To tread a measure light!"
And his hand held a mirror, where
The Sun was imaged bright:
On wings as swift as love's he flew,
Blushing like morning's prime;
And flowers across his path he threw,
And that child's name was Time.

I saw a man, whose ample brow
Was furrow'd deep with care;
And now despair, and rapture now,
By turns were pictured there:
The song he sang was "Heap and hoard,
And scale Ambition's height,"
And his hand grasp'd a keen-edged sword
Of majesty and might.
Around him throng'd a numerous train,
Wealth, Fame, and Power sublime:
While his breast swell'd with fancies vain,
And his name too was Time.

I saw an aged, shrivell'd form,
With hollow eyes and blind;
He crouch'd beneath the pelting storm,
And shook with every wind.
His song was "Life's fair tree is fell'd,
It yields before the blast;"
And his lean hand an hour-glass held,
Whose sands were ebbing fast.
Across his path dark phantoms roved,
Of Age, and Want, and Crime,
His wings seem'd clipt, yet swift he moved,
And still his name was Time.

Oh! how Time changes! and man too,
Doth with the Wizard change;
Borrow his every form and hue,
And in his footsteps range;
And now his mirror, now his sword,
And now his hour-glass seize:
Thou fool! why is thy mind still stored
With trifles such as these?
Spurn this world for a better home,
Where his wings cannot soar;
Where chance and change shall never come,
And Time shall be no more!

Rosini, who has been for two or three years in Italy, has expressed in a letter, his earnest desire to visit Paris, in order, says the great composer, "that I may once again hear an Italian Opera, which I despair of doing till I return to your city."—Foreign Quarterly.

THE LUNGS OF LONDON.

Follow me, if you please, sir, through this little gate—take care of the steps—there are exactly six—now, give me your arm—this is the Birdcage Walk—that classic structure to our left, the military chapel—to the right you see Storey's Gate—immediately in the rear are "our chambers," and exactly in front, half hidden by its own umbrageous foliage, is the charming enclosure—step this way—the charming enclosure of

ST. JAMES'S PARK.

When I enter this park, my notions of government, let me tell you, become highly monarchical. I touch my hat to the memory of our kings who devised and confirmed to us these places of harmless recreation, and am more and more established in my contempt for your close-fisted, shabby, commercial republicans, who, if they got their greasy paws upon this place once again, would cut down the timber, (as they did before,) steal the ducks, and sell the grounds by auction. Brother Jonathan, when he takes a stroll this way, forgets, for at least five minutes, to boast his "free and independent" citizenship, and begins to think that kings and queens, after all, are not quite so black as they are painted! For this park, and the pleasure it affords us, we are indebted to our monarchs—let us enjoy their munificent gift and be thankful. Let us remember that the citizens have never planted a shrub for our recreation—that they have never set apart an acre of their corporation lands to give us, our wives, and our children, a mouthful of fresh air; let us never forget that they have shut up the noble Thames,

"Deep and yet clear—though gentle yet not dull; Strong without rage—without o'erflowing full;"

for the mere lucre of gain, although the sight of it, the lord mayor and aldermen know in their hearts, is light to a Londoner's eyes, and music to his ears. Let us never forget that the legislature treated Mr. Buckingham's bill, for the establishment of public walks near great towns, with almost silent contempt; and although they pass I know not how many enclosure bills every session, it was not without much unseemly debate that they were prevailed upon to grant, for the recreation of the commoners, thus dispossessed without compensation of their immemorial inheritance, as much of the land enclosed as you could whip a cat in. Then, again, as to private individuals, as little or less, if less were possible, is to be expected from them;—an attempt is fresh within our recollection of the lord of the manor of Hampstead to enclose the heath, which, owing to the vigilance of an honest independent member of parliament, was crushed in the bud. Primrose Hill, too, was marked out for enclosure by some of the joint-stock "sack-em-up" companies, for the purpose of being converted into a second-hand coffin manufactory, or something of that sort; this scheme went to the right-about, and a man may still forget his cares and troubles, as well as bring home a week's stock of unbought health, from a morning or evening stroll, to dear, delightful, rural Primrose Hill. No thanks, however, to lord mayors, aldermen, or citizens for this—no thanks to either house of parliament—no thanks to lords of manors, who would enclose the sun of heaven himself, if they could let out his rays at so much a year; such is the selfish love of lucre—natural, I had almost said, to man, in an artificial state of society like ours, at least a second nature, which makes his interest the catamites, of the former court, grew out of fashion; and the nobility and courtiers, who did not quite abandon their debaucheries, had yet that reverence to the king, to retire into corners to practise them."

The amusements of Charles were such as conferred honour on genius, and gave encouragement to virtue and the arts. There is no writer of the period whose productions are not more decent than those of either the preceding or subsequent reigns. Walpole, who hated equally the king and his politics, in a passage not unworthy of the occasion, has at least done justice to his taste, and the high refinement of his court. "During the prosperous state of the king's affairs, the pleasures of the court were carried on with much taste and magnificence. Poetry, painting, music and architecture, were all called in to make them rational amusements; and I have no doubt but the celebrated festivals of Louis the Fourteenth, were copied from the shows exhibited at Whitehall, in its time the most polite court in Europe. Ben Jonson was the laureat; Inigo Jones, the inventor of the decorations; Laniere and Ferasbosco composed the symphonies; the king, the queen, and the young nobility danced in the interludes." To the names given by Walpole, we may add those of Milton and Selden. The "Masque of Comus," written by the former, and the scenic contrivances of the latter, may afford some conception of the rational amusements of the court of Charles. Marshal Bassompierre mentions his state introduction to Charles and Henrietta:—"I found the king," he says, "on a stage raised two steps, the queen and he in two chairs, who rose at the first bow I made them on coming in. The company was magnificent, and the order exquisite." This was a high compliment from the most elegant man in Europe, and perhaps, the best judge of his time as to the merits of such a scene.

Among the Strafford Letters we find numerous allusions to the amusements of the court of Charles as described to the Earl of Strafford by his amusing correspondent Mr. Garrard. On the 9th of January, 1633, the latter writes: "I never knew a duller Christmas than we had at court this year, but one play all the time at Whitehall, and no dancing at all. The queen had some little infirmity, the bile, or some such thing, which made her keep in; only on Twelfth Night she feasted the king at Somerset House, and presented him with a play, newly studied, 'The Faithful Shepherdess,' which the king's players acted in the robes she and her ladies acted their pastoral in last year. I had almost forgot to tell your lordship, that the dicing night the king carried away in James Palmer's hat, 1650. The queen was his half, and brought him that luck; she shared presently 900*l.* There are two masques in hand, the first of the Inns of Court, which is to be presented on Candlemas day, the other the king presents the queen with on Shrove Tuesday, at night. High expenses; they speak of 20,000*l.* that it will cost the men of the law."

Again, Mr. Garrard writes to the earl on the 27th of February following:—"On Monday after Candlemas day, the gentlemen of the Inns of Court presented their masque at court: there were sixteen in number, who rode through the streets in four chariots, and two others to carry their pages and musicians, attended by an hundred gentlemen on great horses, as well clad as I ever saw any: they far exceeded in beauty any masque that had formerly been presented by those societies, and performed the dancing part with much applause. In their company there was one Mr. Read, of Gray's Inn, whom all the women and some men cried up for as handsome a man as the Duke of Buckingham."

It may be interesting to insert the dramatic personæ of one of those celebrated masques, once the glory of Whitehall. The following is the court "play bill," at the performance of the Cæsum Britannicum, of which Carew, one of the most elegant of love poets, was the author, and Inigo Jones the inventor and director of the machinery.

Even the political misfortunes, which began to press upon Charles, could not altogether destroy his interest in the fine arts; and though their splendour had certainly somewhat faded, his favourite masques continued still to be a source of enjoyment. Algernon, Earl of Northumberland, in a letter to his sister, the Countess of Leicester, dated 5th December, 1639, thus writes: "The king and queen have begun to practise their masque: a company of worse faces did I never see assembled than the queen hath gotten together upon this occasion, not one new woman amongst them. My Lady Carnarvon conditioned before she would promise to be of the masques, that it should not be danced upon a Sunday, for she is grown so devout by conversing with my Lord Powis and the Doctor, that now she will neither dance nor see a play upon the Sabbath. I assure you their majesties are not less busy now than formerly you have seen them at the like exercise."*

Charles was not only well informed in all matters of court etiquette, and in the particular duties of each individual of his household, but enjoined their performance with remarkable strictness. Ferdinando Masham, one of the esquires of his body, has recorded a curious anecdote relative to the king's nice exaction of such observances:—"I remember," he says, "that coming to the king's bedchamber door, which was bolted on the inside, the late Earl of Bristol, then being in waiting and lying there, he unbolted the door upon my knocking, and asked me, 'What news?'—I told him I had a letter for the king. The earl then demanded the letter of me, which I told him I could deliver to none but the king himself: upon which the king said,—'The esquire is in the right; for he ought not to deliver any letter or message to any but myself, he being at this time the chief officer of my house; and if he had delivered the letter to any other, I should not have thought him fit for his place.'" It seems that, after a certain hour, when the guard was set, and the "All-night" served up, the royal household was considered under the sole command of the esquire in waiting.* "The king," says Lord Clarendon, "kept state to the full, which made his court very orderly, no man presuming to be seen in a place where he had no pretence to be."

* Collins's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 621. In a letter of the time it is said, "The Masquing House is nearly ready, and 1400*l.* is appointed for the charge of a masque at Twelfth Night." Collins's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 531.—Mr. D'Israeli says, "The fullest account I have found of one of these entertainments, which at once show the curiosity of the scenical machinery and the fancy of the poet, the richness of the crimson habits of the gentlemen, and the white dresses, with white herons' plumes and jewelled head dresses, and ropes of pearls, of the ladies, was in a manuscript letter of the time, with which I supplied the editor of Jonson, who has preserved the narrative in his memoirs of that poet." "Such were the magnificent entertainments," says Mr. Gifford, in his introduction to Massinger, "which, though modern refinement may affect to despise them, modern splendour never reached, even in thought."—Curr. of Lit. vol. v. p. 923.

Although Charles formed many friendships from among his own subjects, he never lost sight of the dignity of his own station, and was peculiarly tenacious of any undue familiarity when the license emanated not from himself. When in the west of England, during the civil troubles, Dr. Thomas Wykes, Dean of Burien in Cornwall, an inveterate punster, happening to be riding near him, extremely well mounted,—"Doctor," said the king, "you have a pretty nag under you; pray how old is he?" Wykes, unable to repress, even in the presence of majesty, the indifferent conceit which presented itself;—"If it please your majesty," he said, "he is in the second year of his reign" (rein). Charles discovered some displeasure at this unlicensed ribaldry. "Go," he replied, "you are a fool."

Though kind and considerate to those about him, the manners of Charles, unfortunately for himself, were by nature far from either graceful or conciliating; and considering the peculiar period in which he lived, and how influential is the well-timed civility of a king, the deficiency was a real misfortune. It was afterwards said of his son, Charles the Second, that he denied favours with more grace than his father bestowed them.

The unfavourable impression conveyed by the manners of Charles, was owing, in a great degree, to a natural impediment in his speech. At times he stammered so painfully that it was with difficulty he could bring out a word. This infirmity would seem to have been hereditary, for his father's tongue is described as being too large for his mouth, and Charles himself was unable to speak till he was four years old. It is remarkable that this imperfection left him at his trial, and that he addressed his inhuman judges on that memorable occasion with extraordinary fluency and ease. Lilly, who heard him, authenticates the fact.

* Pegges's Curialia, vol. i. part 1, p. 23. Charles was probably well aware, of what modern wisdom seems inclined to forget, that the vulgar are easily caught by appearances, and that the trappings of monarchy are in no slight degree its supporters. We naturally call to mind an anecdote, related by Walpole, of the conduct of a certain Spanish ambassador who abandoned a Congress because he was unable to obtain precedence over the French deputy. On his return to his own court, he waited on the king and explained his conduct. "What!" said the indignant monarch, "could you think of abandoning such an important business for the sake of a ceremony!" The ambassador piqued at the reflection, answered with great spirit: "A ceremony! What is your majesty yourself but a ceremony!" It may be remarked that Sir Henry Wotton used wittily to define an ambassador, as "a man sent abroad to tell lies for the good of his country."

There was undoubtedly, however, in Charles, a want of tact in his general address, as well as an impediment in his speech. This defect of manner will, perhaps, be best exemplified by the following lively passage, which occurs in a letter from the Countess Leicester to her husband, when the latter was ambassador at Paris: it is dated 14th March, 1636:—"Since my coming to town, I have been twice at the court, because I did not see the king the first time, but from the queen I received then expectations of her favour to you: the elector also made me some compliments concerning you, much handsomer than I expected from him. In his majesty, I found an inclination to show me some kindness, but he could not find the way; at last he told me, that he perceived I was too kind to my husband when he was with me, which kept me lean, for he thought me much fatter than I used to be. This short speech was worse to me than an absolute silence, for I blushed, and was so extremely out of countenance, that all the company laughed at me."

The learning and accomplishments of Charles were of no ordinary kind. He was an excellent mathematician; well read in the history and laws of his country, and had studied divinity as deeply as any of his contemporaries. He perfectly understood the French, Spanish, and Italian languages, and was conversant with and appreciated the classics. He had studied carefully the arts and manufactures, and himself observed, that he believed he could earn his livelihood by any one of them except "weaving in tapestry." He said at another time, that, were he compelled to make choice of a profession, he would not be a lawyer:—"I could not," he added, "defend a bad cause, nor yield in a good one." His conference with Henderson, and especially his negotiation with the parliamentary commissioners, on which latter occasion he combated, unaided, the arguments of some of the wisest men in England, afford high proof of the vigour of his intellect and the depth of his scholastic knowledge. The highest compliment ever paid to the mental powers of Charles, proceeds from his adversary Henderson himself. This famous disputant and theologian,—this gifted presbyterian, on whose controversial genius the hopes of thousands of enthusiasts were fixed,—who was to have annihilated the arguments of his sovereign, and to have made him a convert to presbyterianism,—thus speaks of the illustrious antagonist, over whose arguments and principles he had anticipated an easy conquest:—"I do declare before God and the world, whether in relation to kirk or state, I found his majesty the most intelligent man that ever I spoke with; as far beyond my expression as expectation. I profess that I was oftentimes astonished with the solidity and quickness of his reasons and replies, wondered how he, spending his time in sports and recreations, could have attained to so great knowledge; and must confess, that I was convinced in conscience, and knew not how to give him any reasonable satisfaction; yet the sweetness of his disposition is such, that whatsoever I said was well taken. I must say that I never met with any disputant of that mild and calm temper, which convinced me that such resolution and moderation could not be without an extraordinary measure of the Divine grace. I dare say if his advice had been followed, all the blood that is shed, and all the rapine that is committed, should have been prevented." Charles, like his father, held literature in great respect. On one occasion, when with the army at Oxford, he sent to the Bodleian library to borrow a book. He was told that by the rules of the institution, no book was permitted to be lent out of the library. Instead of persisting in his request, he went instantly to the Bodleian, and examined personally the volume he required.

Charles, among his other accomplishments, is said to have been a painter; and it has even been affirmed that Rubens corrected some of his drawings. That great artist, in one of his letters, mentions as one of his chief inducements to visit England, that he has been credibly informed the prince of that country is the best judge of art in Europe.

Few of our kings have had the least perception of the beautiful. Charles the First is undoubtedly the only monarch of this country to whom the arts may be considered as under an obligation. His collection of statues, paintings, models, and antiquities, must have been superb in the extreme; and but for the interruption of the civil troubles, and the tasteless devastation which followed, the cabinet of the court of England would still have been the envy of the polite world. Besides objects of taste, such as had descended to him from former monarchs, he had himself collected for many years with vast labour and expense. He had added to his gallery of pictures the entire cabinet of the Duke of Mantua, considered the most splendid in Europe. The price of paintings on the continent rose, it is affirmed, to double their value, in consequence of a competition between Charles and Philip the Fourth of Spain, another royal collector. It has even been asserted, that Charles was once on the point of an agreement with Vandyke, that, for the immense sum of eighty thousand pounds, he should adorn the walls of the banqueting house at Whitehall with the ceremonies of the order of the garter. Such a building, embellished by such an artist, would indeed have been the glory of Europe. The banqueting house, however, in the reign of Charles, was decorated with some of his choicest pictures; and we find him refusing to permit one of the queen's favourite masques to be performed in it, lest the lights should damage the collection: the incident, however trifling, is a proof of his care for the arts.

We have several other evidences of the taste and refinement of Charles. At Mortlake he patronised a manufacture of tapestry, which, but for the age of barbarism which followed, might have rivaled the boasted Gobelins of Paris. He delighted in the company of learned men, and in their society is said to have been more social and at his ease than on any other occasion. He loved and understood music, and was himself a pupil of Cooper's, and performed on the viol di gamba. He was a friend of the poets, especially of Ben Jonson, and of May, the translator of Lucan. Milton speaks of Shakspeare as the "closet companion of his solitudes."

To the patriots and avengers of 1648 we are indebted for the loss of the magnificent collection of Charles. It is to be regretted that the conductors of popular convulsions have been rarely men of refinement. The year before the death of Charles, his splendid effects, his unique cabinet, the delight of his leisure hours, were directed by the parliament to be sold. Some ignorant individuals, who styled themselves commissioners, were appointed the appraisers. The inventory took a year in drawing up, and the collection three years in selling. The catalogue is preserved among the Harleian MSS., and is entitled, "An Inventory of the Goods, Jewels, Plate, &c., belonging to King Charles I. sold by order of the Council of State from the year 1649 to 1652."

Each article or lot had its price previously fixed, and nothing could exceed the gross barbarity and want of taste in the valuation. This Gothic insensibility and ignorance, however, mattered little; for except a slight occasional competition, the price given seldom exceeded the appraisement. It is curious to discover what in those days was considered the value of pictures, which are now deservedly regarded as beyond price. The celebrated cartoons of Raphael were valued at only £300, and what is more remarkable were "knocked down" without a purchaser. The six following pictures alone brought a price which could be considered as equivalent to their worth.

A Sleeping Venus, by Corregio, sold for 1,000l.—A Madonna, by Raphael, 2,000l.—A Picture, by Julio Romano, 500l.—A Madonna and Christ, by Raphael, 800l.—A Venus and Pard, by Titian, 600l.

The following have been mentioned as remarkable for the insignificant sums at which they were purchased.

The Woman taken in adultery, by Rubens, 20l.—Peace and Plenty, by Rubens, 100l.—Venus attired by the Graces, by Guido, 200l.*

The Duke of Buckingham and his brother, one of the finest efforts of Vandyke, was valued at 30l. and sold for 50l. Christ, the Virgin, and "many Angels dancing," by Vandyke, was also only valued at 40l. Walpole informs us, that his father afterwards gave 700l. for this picture, and that it had been previously twice sold for upwards of 1,000l. Titian's pictures were generally appraised at 100l. But the valuation of the following list is really ludicrous.

The valuable collection of coins sold, on the average, at about a shilling a-piece. The pictures, together with the furniture of nineteen palaces which had belonged to Charles, and the remains of the jewels and plate which had not already been sold for the maintenance of the royal cause, fetched the comparatively trifling

* The following account of various sums, paid by Charles I. to Vandyke and Rubens, will, doubtless, be considered as curious.

"To Sir Anthony Vandyck, for divers pictures, viz. our own royal portraiture; another of Monsieur, the French King's brother; and particular of the Archduchess, at length, at 25l. a-piece. One of our royal consort; another of the Prince of Orange; and another of their son, at half-length, at 20l. a-piece. One great piece of our royal self, consort, and children, 100l. One of the Emperor Vetellius, 30l.; and for mending the picture of the Emperor Galbus, 5l.

To Sir Anthony Vandyck, 444l. for nine pictures of our royal self, and most dearest consort the queen; 40l. for the picture of our dearest consort the queen, by him made, and by our command delivered unto our right trusty and well-beloved cousin and counsellor, the Lord Viscount Wentworth, our Deputy of Ireland.

sum of one hundred and eighteen thousand and eighty pounds, ten shillings and sixpence.

It has been remarked as a singular circumstance, that a sale so magnificent, and so extensive as to occupy three years in its accomplishments, should have failed in exciting a greater degree of attention in foreign princes. This apathy, however, may in some degree have originated in feelings of delicacy. Lord Clarendon mentions incidentally, that some of the king's pictures, as well as the rich furniture of his palaces, were privately purchased by the Spanish envoys for their master. The unsettled state of the public mind in England may account for the want of taste displayed in our own country upon this melancholy occasion. Those who had alike the mind to appreciate and the power to purchase, had been displaced by those who had neither. It may here be remarked, that some idle toys, obtained probably for the amusement of Henrietta, or the decoration of her apartments, were purchased at large prices, while, as we have already seen, the works of the first artists were valued at sums which, in these days, would scarcely exceed the annual interest of their purchase-money.

CHAPTER VI.

The history of the civil wars has been recounted in more than one painfully interesting narrative, and is so familiar to the reader, that repetition would be but tedious and unprofitable. Nevertheless, in a work professedly devoted to private history, it is impossible to pass over in silence so remarkable a period in the personal history of Charles as his captivity and his death.

The battle of Naseby was decisive to the fortunes of Charles, and from henceforward he virtually ceased to be a king. It was at the close of this action that he is said to have ridden along the ranks, animating his men with his voice and hand, and imploring them not to desert him in his need: "One charge more," he exclaimed, "and we recover the day." His courage, indeed, has never been called in question, even by his most furious maligners, and on more than one occasion elicited the admiration of even his enemies. During the course of the civil struggles, that courage had ever appeared as eminent on the field of battle, as it afterwards shone illustrious on the scaffold. But now, surrounded by enemies on all sides, he retired to Oxford, which had been faithful to him during every change, and where, for the last time, he was regarded and respected as a free monarch. But Fairfax was fast approaching with a victorious army. The prospect of being led away captive by his own subjects: the thought of their triumphant shouts; of becoming the dependant of absurd enthusiasts and ruined projectors, was too humiliating to endure. Accordingly, though not till Fairfax was within three days' march of Oxford, the king decided on flight. But even at the moment of departure he had scarcely made up his mind which way to turn, or in what friend to trust;—whether to proceed to London, or to throw himself on the generosity of the Scottish army. About a month before he quitted Oxford, he addressed a letter to Lord Digby, in which is the following characteristic passage: "I desire you," says the high-minded monarch, "to assure all my friends, that if I cannot live as a king I shall die like a gentleman, without doing that which may make honest men blush for me."

Charles selected but two individuals as the companions of his flight. These were his faithful follower Ashburnham, and Dr. Hudson, a clergyman, who was intimately acquainted with the features and by-parts of the country through which the fugitives must necessarily pass. The king himself was disguised as the servant of Ashburnham. On the night of the 27th of April, 1646, orders having been given at the different gates of the town to allow to three persons a free pass, Charles proceeded over Magdalen Bridge, and commenced his sorrowful journey. The principal reliance of the fugitives was in an old pass which they had procured from an officer of the royal army, and which afterwards proved of the greatest assistance. Even at their first stage, Dorchester in Oxfordshire, where a troop of dragoons were quartered, they escaped examination by its means.

From Dorchester they proceeded, by way of Henley and Maidenhead, as near to London as Brentford, where Charles again hesitated as to the expediency of throwing himself on the honour of the parliament, and the loyalty of the citizens. At Benson, they had been closely questioned by a party of horse, but Ashburnham asserting they belonged to the commons, they were again allowed to proceed. One circumstance caused them great annoyance: a soldier in Ireton's regiment had actually joined company, and proceeded with them from Netlebed as far as Slough. This man, perceiving the liberal manner in which Hudson distributed money to the guards, turned to the king, whom (being dressed as a servant and having a saddlebag before him,) he naturally regarded as his equal, and inquired if his master was of the house of lords? Charles answered calmly, that his master was merely of the lower house.

At Brentford, they turned their faces towards the north, and after some stay at Harrow on the Hill, came to Uxbridge, where they deceived another guard with their pass. At Hillingdon, a village near that town, they remained about three hours; and here the king endured another painful conflict, as to whether he should proceed further northward, or return to London and throw himself on the generosity of his subjects. After a severe struggle, it was decided, however, that they should prosecute their original intention, and they therefore proceeded cautiously towards St. Albans. In passing through that town they were encountered by an "old man with a halbert," who inquired to what party they belonged! Hudson told him to the parliament, and throwing him a sixpence they again proceeded on their way. But they had scarcely left St. Albans above a mile behind them, when they perceived a horseman galloping towards them at his utmost speed. Charles and Ashburnham, in some consternation, turned out of the direct road, while Hudson faced about to meet the suspicious person. It proved, however, to be merely a drunken cavalier, who passed on his way without taking any notice of the party, or even of the salutation of Hudson, who civilly greeted him. From hence the king proceeded through Ladbrough in Leicestershire, Stamford Downham in Norfolk, (near which place he passed the night at a common village inn,) and at length arrived at Newark, where he formally delivered himself to Lord Leven, the general of the Scottish army. It may be remarked, that it was nine days after his quitting Oxford, before the parliament received the least intimation of the king's proceedings. They were naturally much discomposed at his flight, and had issued a proclamation, threatening instant death to whoever should harbour the royal fugitive.

Charles ere long had sufficient reason to repent the step which he had taken. He neither experienced that attachment from the Scots which he had anticipated, nor even that ordinary respect which misfortune had a right to claim. His person was closely guarded, and he was refused all communication and correspondence with those who were dear to him; while, at the same time, he was daily insulted by pulpit insolence, or wearied by pulpit absurdity. One would have thought that afflicted majesty,—that the extreme of human misfortune,—a monarch deprived of his throne, his freedom, and his children, might have been compassionated under any circumstances, and might even have claimed respect from political zealots or the wildest of religious fanatics. But the surly and acrimonious covenanters were as devoid of humanity as they were of taste, and the captive and traduced monarch was daily insulted by their unfeeling exhortations and pious barbarity. Among other instances of his being personally affronted by these zealots, the following is well known. In the very presence of the persecuted monarch, one of their preachers had appointed, as part of the service of the day, the psalm which commences,

"Why dost thou, tyrant, boast thyself,
Thy wicked deeds to praise?"

As soon as the words were given out, the king rose from his seat, and calmly proposed to substitute the psalm, which thus begins,

"Have mercy, Lord, on me I pray,
For men would me devour."

The congregation kindly sided with Charles, and sang the more appropriate version.

From the time of that great national stain, the iniquitous sale of his person by the Scottish army, till we find him a prisoner of the parliament in his own house at Holdenby, there is little remarkable in the king's personal history. The tidings of that atrocious transfer, and the proposed change of keepers, were first communicated to him by letter. He was amusing himself at chess at the time: but so far was he from being agitated at the important change which awaited him, that he continued the game with the same apparent interest, and the same undisturbed placidity of manner.

Holdenby, or Holmby House, in Northamptonshire, was one of his own nineteen palaces, where he had passed some of the happiest moments of his youth. When Duke of York, it had been purchased for him by his mother, Anne of Denmark, who little anticipated that it would hereafter become the prison of her favourite child. It had originally been built by Lord Chancellor Hatton, and shortly after receiving the last visit of Charles, was pulled down by a decree of the parliament. During his journey to this place, Charles was received with every show of affection, and sometimes even with enthusiasm by his subjects. On his arrival we are told, "very many country gentlemen, gentlewomen, and others of ordinary rank, stood ready there to welcome the king, with joyful countenances and prayers."*

* Herbert, p. 45.—"It is noteworthy," says Herbert, "that through most parts where his majesty passed, some out of curiosity, but most (it may be presumed) for love, flocked to behold him, and accompanied him with acclamations of joy, and with their prayers for his preservation; and, that not any of the

At Holmby his situation was somewhat improved. There was at least the appearance of a court; he was allowed the services of persons whom he could trust, and the society of those whom he loved. It is remarkable, too, that the parliamentary commissioners waited on him with all due observance at his meals. In order to defray in part his household expenses at this period, according to a proposition of the committee of revenue, dated 5th February, 1647, the communion plate at Whitehall was sacrilegiously melted. The committee report to the house of commons, that the "vestry plate, hitherto set upon the altar of his majesty's chapel at Whitehall," consists as follows:

A paire of great candlesticks, two gilt layres, one gilt shipp, a square basonn and fountaine, two gilt vases, a silver rodd.

Charles, though restricted in liberty, was not altogether deprived of amusement:—and no man could have greater resources in himself. In the mornings he either rode out on horseback, or paced up and down the gravel walks at Holmby. He was a fast walker, and the Earl of Pembroke, the "memorable simpleton," who was generally forced upon him as his companion, had some difficulty in keeping pace with him in the exercise. Bowls was a game in which Charles had ever taken great pleasure; and as there was no bowling-green at Holmby, he constantly rode over, either to Althorp or Harrowden, (the latter a house of Lord Vaux,) where he might divert himself with his favourite amusement. The commissioners were commonly his companions in the sport. It would be difficult to imagine a more remarkable scene than that of the recent competitors for sovereignty becoming peaceful rivals in such a homely diversion.

In one of his excursions to Harrowden, he encountered, under peculiar circumstances, the face of an old friend. During the period Charles was a prisoner of the Scots at Newcastle, he had despatched a faithful adherent, Major Bosville, to Paris, with an important letter to the queen. Bosville, having obtained a reply, continued several days lurking in the neighbourhood of Holmby, before an opportunity offered of delivering his despatch. Three nights he spent at the meanest cottages, and twice slept under furze bushes in the open air. At last, disguised as a countryman, and with a fishing rod in his hand, seizing an opportunity of the king riding over a narrow bridge, he surreptitiously placed the important document in his majesty's hands. Unfortunately the commissioners witnessed the movement; but Charles told them it was merely a letter from the queen, containing a recommendation that the prince should serve in the French army during the next campaign. Bosville was afterwards examined by the wary commissioners, but whether he suffered for his loyalty does not appear. The gallant soldier, it seems, had made up his mind to force the letter into the hands of Charles, even though he should be surrounded by the parliamentary guards, and with their pistols pointed at his head.

Many similar attempts at communicating with the captive monarch were prevented by the watch-troopers, who guarded the king gave those country people any check or disturbance, as the king passed, that could be observed, a civility his majesty was well pleased with." Herbert, vol. v. p. 14. Heath says, that he was "gratulated all the way to Holmby by the people, as in a progress."—Chron. of the Civil Wars, p. 128.

fulness of the parliament. One Mary Cave, of a decent family at Stanford, had been enlisted in the royal cause, and had engaged to deliver a letter to the king. She happened to be acquainted with the landlady of one of the parliamentary captains, who was at that time employed as a guard over his sovereign. The landlady had requested the officer to obtain, for her young friend, the honour of kissing the king's hand, to which the latter had good naturedly consented. But in the mean time the landlady had acquainted her husband with the design, which the man, unwilling to risk a discovery, immediately imparted to the captain. The young lady, coming unsuspectingly to Holmby on the day appointed for her interview with the king, was instantly seized, and by order of the commissioners underwent a strict search. Fortunately nothing was discovered on her person, but some days afterwards an important letter was found behind the hangings of the room, which it was supposed, during her investigation, she had ingeniously contrived to conceal.

What greatly distressed the king was, his being denied not only the attendance of his domestic chaplains, but even all intercourse whatever with the ministers of his own church. He had twice addressed a solemn appeal to the parliament on this subject, and though the house of lords showed every inclination to gratify him, the commons sternly withheld their consent. Offers of ghostly assistance, indeed, were constantly made to him by the puritan preachers, who were in attendance on the commissioners. These people, among other intrusions, were ever hovering about the royal table, with the object of pronouncing the benediction; but Charles always said the grace himself, and sometimes even in an audible voice. "The parliament," says Neal, "appointed two of their clergy, Mr. Caryl and Mr. Marshall, to preach in the chapel, morning and afternoon, on the Lord's day, and to perform the devotions of the chapel on week days; but his majesty never gave his attendance. He spent his Sundays in private, and though they waited at table, he would not do so much as admit them to ask a blessing." He was, however, invariably civil to his persecutors, and though himself refraining from being present at their hours of worship, he laid no restraint on his attendants.

But an act of oppression, which shortly followed, sunk far more deeply into the heart of Charles. One day the commissioners waited on him in a body, and, acquainting him with the spirit of some new instructions which they had received, requested him, with great apparent humility, to dismiss, with only two exceptions, the loyal and affectionate servants who had been long attached to his person. Two of the grooms of the bed chamber, Maxwell and Mawle, to whom were afterwards added Harrington and Sir Thomas Herbert, were alone permitted to attend him in future. At dinner the same day, when the faithful train came as usual to wait on him, he informed them of what had passed, and added that they must hereafter cease to regard him as their master. The scene which ensued was affecting in the extreme. They offered up the most fervent prayers for the king's safety and happiness, and after respectively kissing his hand, retreated with all the expressions of the most poignant distress. Charles himself was so much moved, that he retired to his bed-chamber, and giving orders that no one should intrude on his privacy, spent the remainder of the day in solitude and grief.

It is remarkable that neither misery nor confinement had the least effect on the health of Charles, and that during the whole period of his sufferings he never once had need of a physician. This was, no doubt, owing in a great measure to the abstemiousness of his diet. It was his custom to eat but sparingly, and seldom of various dishes. His attendant, Herbert, says, that "he drank but twice every dinner and supper, once of beer, and once of wine and water mixed, only after fish a glass of French wine; the beverage he himself mixed at the cupboard, as he would have it; he very seldom ate and drank before dinner, or between meals."

One afternoon the king was at Althorp, amusing himself at bowls with the commissioners, when information was brought to them that a large and suspicious-looking body of horse was on its way to Holmby. The king was immediately hurried back to that place, and the commissioners, after some consultation, agreed to stand on their defence. At midnight the troopers arrived, and after drawing up in regular order before the house, and placing guards at all the avenues, their leader demanded admittance. This person was no other than Cornet Joyce, the son of a tailor, and perhaps the most impudent ruffian on record. Though merely armed with verbal directions from Cromwell, who was himself perfectly unauthorised to issue them, he alike laughed at the power of the parliament and the reverence which is commonly attached to the person of a king.

On his knocking for admission the commandant of the garrison inquired his name and business. He replied that his name was Joyce: that he was a cornet in Colonel Whaley's regiment, and that his object was to speak with the king. The commandant inquired from whom? Joyce told him from himself, at which the others very naturally gave a contemptuous laugh, but Joyce told them it was no laughing matter. In the mean time the soldiers within the garrison and those without had been sociably conversing together; and having discovered that both parties belonged to the same army, and were attached to the same cause, the former immediately opened the gates, and Joyce quietly took command of the house.

Having posted sentinels over the commissioner's apartments, he hastened to that part of the house where the king slept. With a cocked pistol in his hand, he knocked loudly at the door of the grooms of the bed chamber, through whose apartment he must necessarily pass, before he could gain admission to that of the king. These gentlemen, having ascertained from him his name and object, came to the gallant determination of sacrificing their lives sooner than admit the intruder. In the mean time, the king having been awakened by the disturbance rang the silver bell he was in the habit of keeping by his bedside, at which Maxwell hastened to his chamber, while the others defended the outer door. Charles being made acquainted with the cause of the tumult, positively refused to rise, and Joyce, though exceedingly exasperated, was at length persuaded to retire.

The next morning the king rose somewhat earlier than usual, and the cornet, having been admitted to his presence, told his majesty with the utmost confidence, and almost in as few words that he came to remove him from Holmby. The king asked him whither he was to go? Joyce told him to the army. Charles naturally requested to see his instructions. "Your majesty shall be soon satisfied," said the other; and drawing up his men, a fine troop and well clad, in the inner court, pointed them out from the window to Charles. "Your warrant," said the king, smiling, "is written in fair characters, and is legible without spelling."

On the 3d of June, 1647, after a residence of four months, the king departed from Holmby. He was attended in the same coach by three of his commissioners, the Earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, and Lord Montague; the rest followed on horseback. According to Herbert, who was present, the king was the merriest person of the party.

The fact seems to have been, that Charles was extremely well pleased with his removal to the army. He had long entertained a notion that the most influential officers were secretly his friends, and that by their means he should eventually regain possession of his rights. "Sir," he once said to Fairfax, "I have as good interest in the army as yourself." Cromwell and Fairfax both denied that Joyce had received his authority from them, but Charles insisted that he could not believe them unless they hung him up for his insolence. Cromwell, however, could not conceal the elation which he felt at the success of the enterprise. "Now," he said, "that I have the king in my hands, I have the parliament in my pocket."

It is impossible indeed to doubt that Cromwell was at the bottom of this daring outrage. Hobbes of Malmesbury observes justly in his Behemoth—"I cannot believe that Cornet Joyce could go out of the army with a thousand soldiers to fetch the king, and neither the general nor the lieutenant-general, nor the body of the army take notice of it." With regard to the force with which Joyce was supported, the accounts are extremely conflicting. Heath, as well as Hobbes, mentions them as a thousand strong; Dr. Barwick as fifteen hundred; Sanderson, on the king's authority, as five hundred, and Clarendon as fifty. Herbert, who was on the spot, merely speaks of them as a "body of horse," and in another place as a "troop." Major Huntingdon, in his "Reasons for laying down his commission," says expressly, in speaking of Joyce's exploit, that "Lieutenant General Cromwell had given him orders at London to do what he had done, both there and at Oxford."

From Hinchinbrook, where the king passed the first night, he came to Childerley, a house of Sir John Cutts, about four miles from Cambridge. Hither the fellows and scholars of the university flocked to him in great numbers, and with every demonstration of loyalty and respect. He was also respectfully attended at this place by many of the principal officers of the army. Among the number were Cromwell, Ireton, Lambert, and Whaley. Several of them knelt to him and kissed his hand. With Cromwell and Fairfax he had frequently long interviews, and received from them the most unbounded professions of fidelity.

From Childerley, Charles was removed to his own palace at Newmarket. Here, to his great satisfaction, he was at last freed from the attentions of Cornet Joyce, whose sanctified manners and vulgar familiarity had continued to annoy him since their departure from Holmby. Charles, when at Childerley, had endeavoured to bring this offensive person to trial, and had summoned a council of war for the purpose; Cromwell's influence, however, was too powerful, and Joyce escaped unpunished.

At Newmarket the king experienced a greater degree of freedom and kindness than had hitherto been his lot. He was allowed to take exercise on the heath, either in his coach or on horseback; his chaplains were permitted to attend him, and he was treated generally by the officers of the army with civility and respect. He dined in public as in former days; his presence-chamber was thronged with the neighbouring gentry; and when he went abroad, he was received with loud acclamations by the people. Sir Philip Meadows, who was at Newmarket during the king's visit, assured Lord Dartmouth, that Charles's was the only cheerful countenance to be seen in the place.

On the 24th of June, 1647, the king left Newmarket for Royston, another royal mansion. Here he stayed two days, and from thence removed to Hatfield, where he remained till the end of the month. At Windsor he passed another two days, and thence came to Caversham, a seat of Lord Craven, not far from Reading. While at this place, he was allowed the exquisite pleasure of again embracing his children. He met them at Maidenhead, in which town they remained and passed the evening together. Cromwell, who himself knew the feelings of a father, was present at their first interview. He afterwards described the scene to Sir John Berkeley as one of the most affecting he had ever witnessed. "I met with him" [Cromwell,] says Berkeley in his Memoirs, "about three days after I came to Reading, as he was coming from the king, then at Caversham. He told me that he had lately seen the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the king and his children, and wept plentifully at the remembrance of it." Ludlow corroborates the fact, and informs us that while Cromwell was telling the story, the tears rolled down his cheeks. Charles had the satisfaction of passing two whole days with his children, while a prisoner at Caversham. During his residence at this place, the unfortunate king used to pay frequent visits to the bowling-green in the retired parish of Whitechurch, then belonging to the ancient family of Lybbe, and at present to their descendant Lybbe Powys, Esq. The bowling-green still remains (1839) and near it is a small building which used to afford shelter or refreshment to those who indulged in the game. Mr. Powys, in his residence, Hardwick House, has the picture of the old lady who lived in this building, and who used to wait on the king during his occasional visits.

At Woburn, whither the king was next removed, he met with an affectionate and even splendid reception. From thence he was removed to Latimers, a seat of the Devonshire family; and after remaining brief periods at Moore Park near Rickmansworth, Stoke near Windsor, then the seat of the Huntingdons, Oatlands, and other places, he at length arrived at Hampton Court in the middle of August, about ten weeks after his departure from Holmby.

Charles was extremely gratified with the last change, and appeared even more cheerful than before. "He dines abroad," says Sanderson, "in the presence chamber, with the same duties and ceremonies as heretofore, where many of the gentry are admitted to kiss his hand. After dinner he retires to his chamber; then he walks into the park or plays at tennis; yesterday he killed a stag and a buck." The court again presented in a great degree its former magnificence; the nobility flocked round his person; his servants returned to their respective duties; and the chaplains performed their offices in the royal chapel. The king was allowed to hunt with the Duke of Richmond; the officers of the army continued to treat him with respect, and Cromwell came often to see him, and was admitted to long conferences. Certainly there is reason to doubt whether that extraordinary man was not, at this period, well inclined towards his sovereign. There is a tradition of a secret compact, by which on the restoration of the king to his rights, Cromwell was to receive ten thousand a year, the earldom of Essex, and the Garter. The treaty, it is said, was broken off by the discovery of an autograph letter from Charles to his queen, in which the king stated, that the promise being altogether compulsory, he should feel himself justified, when restored to liberty and power, in declining to fulfil the conditions. This story becomes somewhat remarkable, when compared with the following curious anecdote, related by Morrice, the chaplain of Lord Orrery, in his memoirs of that nobleman.

"One day," says Morrice, "Lord Broghill was riding, with Cromwell on one side of him and Ireton on the other, at the head of their army, when they fell into discourse about the late king's death. Cromwell declared, that if the king had followed his own mind, and had had trusty servants about him, he had fooled them all. And further said, that once they had a mind to have closed with him; but upon something that happened, they fell off from that design again. My lord, finding Cromwell and Ireton in a good humour, and no other person being within hearing, asked them if he might be so bold as to desire an account, first, why they once would have closed with the king? and secondly, why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him, he would satisfy him in both his queries. 'The reason,' says he, 'why we would once have closed with the king was this: we found that the Scots and the presbyterians began to be more powerful than we; and if they made up matters with the king, we should have been left in the lurch: therefore, we thought it best to prevent them, by offering first to come in upon any reasonable conditions. But while we were busied in these thoughts, there came a letter from one of our spies, who was of the king's bed chamber, which acquainted us, that on that day our final doom was decreed; that he could not possibly tell what it was, but we might find it out if we could intercept a letter sent from the king to the queen, wherein he declared what he would do. The letter, he said, was sewn up in the skirt of a saddle, and the bearer of it would come with the saddle upon his head, about ten of the clock that night, to the Blue Boar Inn in Holborn; for there he was to take horse, and to go to Dover with it. This messenger knew nothing of the letter in the saddle, but some persons in Dover did. We were at Windsor when we received this letter; and immediately upon the receipt of it Ireton and I resolved to take one trusty fellow with us, and with troopers' habits to go to the inn in Holborn; which accordingly we did, and set our man at the gate of the inn where the wicket only was open, to let people in and out. Our man was to give us notice when any person came there with a saddle, whilst we, in the disguise of common troopers, called for cans of beer, and continued drinking till about ten o'clock; the sentinel at the gate then gave notice, that the man with the saddle was come in. Upon this we immediately arose, and as the man was leading out his horse saddled, came up to him with drawn swords, and told him that we were to search all that went in and out there; but as he looked like an honest man, we would only search his saddle and so dismiss him. Upon that, we ungirt the saddle, and carried it into the stall, where we had been drinking, and left the horseman with our sentinel: then ripping up one of the skirts of the saddle, we there found the letter of which we had been informed; and having got it into our own hands, we delivered the saddle again to the man, telling him he was an honest man, and bidding him go about his business. The man, not knowing what had been done, went away to Dover. As soon as we had the letter, we opened it; in which we found the king had acquainted the queen that he was now courted by both the factions, the Scottish presbyterians and the army; and which bid fairest for him should have him; but he thought he should close with the Scots sooner than the other. Upon this, added Cromwell, 'we took horse, and went to Windsor; and finding we were not likely to have any tolerable terms from the king, we immediately from that time forward, resolved his ruin.' This story, curious as it is, must be received with some degree of caution.

The army had somewhat more humanity than the parliament, and permitted frequent interviews between the king and his children. The first time that he met them, after coming to Hampton Court, was at Sion House, the residence of the Earl of Northumberland, under whose charge they had for some time been placed. When they beheld their persecuted father, "they fell down on their knees," says a bystander, "and begged his blessing." Charles embraced them most affectionately, and appeared overjoyed to find them in such perfect health, and so kindly treated. From this period they were constantly permitted to pass the day at Hampton Court, or Charles would ride over to them at Sion.

At these affecting interviews, Charles omitted no opportunity of instilling virtuous principles into the minds of his young children. He conjured the Duke of York, then about fourteen, in the event of any accident befalling his unfortunate father, to transport himself into Holland, where he was certain of being affectionately received by his elder sister, the Princess of Orange. He desired the Princess Elizabeth never to marry, unless with the consent of her mother and her brother Charles; always to be obedient to them both, and to the queen especially, except in matters of religion; conjuring her, whatever misfortunes might befall the Church of England, that she should always be constant in that faith. The necessity of faithfully adhering to the truths enjoined by that church, Charles had ever solemnly impressed on his family. On the 22d of March, 1645, he addresses to Prince Charles the following solemn appeal—"Once again, I command you, upon my blessing, to be constant to your religion, neither hearkening to Romish superstitions, nor the seditions and schismatical doctrines of the Presbyterians and Independents; for know, that a persecuted church is not thereby less pure though less fortunate."

CHAPTER VII.

The circumstances which induced Charles to fly from Hampton Court, and the details of that ill-advised measure, have been variously related by our historians. It is, however, agreed on all hands, that his dread of assassination was the principal motive. Anonymous letters, advertising him of his danger, had for some time been daily conveyed to him; and the king himself, in a letter to the parliament which was afterwards found in his bed-chamber, gave it as the special reason of his flight: "I cannot deny," he says, "that my personal security is the urgent cause of this my retirement." To this we may add the testimonies of Sir John Berkley and Ashburnham, the companions of his flight. "I did most humbly beg of him," says the latter in his narrative, "that he would be pleased to say whether really and in very deed he was afraid of his life in that place, for his going from thence seemed to us a very great change in his affairs. His majesty protested to God, that he had great cause to apprehend some attempt upon his person, and did expect every hour when it should be." After every consideration, it appears most probable that Charles was, after all, a mere puppet in the hands of Cromwell;—that the latter had been previously perfectly well acquainted with the proposed time and manner of the king's intended flight;—that it was Cromwell himself who had caused the fear of assassination to be conveyed to the mind of his victim; and that, in fact, Charles merely fell into a pit which had been prepared for him by that arch-traitor and extraordinary man. It was, undoubtedly, the policy of Cromwell to remove the king as far as possible from the parliament, and to surround him with his own creatures. The latter measure could only be effected by devising some plausible excuse for enforcing a more rigorous confinement, while both objects would naturally be accomplished by a flight, which the projector would contrive should be unsuccessful. Cromwell is even said to have privately intimated to Charles, through his relation Colonel Whaley, that he could no longer be responsible for his safety. There is not the slightest doubt but there was a traitor in the court of Charles, and that his most secret counsels were instantly conveyed to Cromwell. It is remarkable too, that Colonel Hammond, the Governor of the Isle of Wight, to whom Ashburnham afterwards entrusted the king's person, should have left London almost at the same time that Charles departed from Hampton Court; and that too at a particular crisis, when there was no ostensible motive for his returning to his post, and when the agitations in the army rendered it important to his own interests that he should remain in London. The fact is the more curious, since Ashburnham, it appears, had made up his mind that the king should entrust himself with Hammond some time before their departure from Hampton Court. Dr. Barwick, who was likely to be well informed, in the life of his brother, Dr. Peter Barwick, has the following passage: "Cromwell, by his holy cheats, seduced the good king into the Isle of Wight, and confined him in Carisbrook Castle," &c. and Andrew Marvell, the friend of Cromwell, and from his situation likely to have had some insight into the secret history of the period, in his ode on the return of Cromwell from Ireland, has the following lines:

And Hampton shows what part
He had of wiser art,
When, twining subtle fears with hope,
He wove a net of such a scope,
That Charles himself might chase,
To Carisbrook's narrow case.

It is but fair, however to remark, that Milton, Cromwell's Latin Secretary, strongly denies, in his panegyric on the Protector, that he was the deviser of the flight. It has even been asserted that some local arrangements, and especially the removal of the guards to a greater distance from the king's apartments, were owing to the machinations, and were a part of the plan of Cromwell. That the guards were thus removed is undoubted, though Hume, who passes over the circumstances of the king's flight in rather an apathetic manner, assures us that they were even doubled before his departure. The expression used by Colonel Whaley, to Linthall, the speaker, is curious: "I could no more," he says, "detain the king, if he had a mind to go, than I could keep a bird in a pound." Heath goes so far as to assert, that the king's visit to the Isle of Wight was publicly talked of in that island long before his arrival, and that the guards were removed on purpose to give him free egress from Hampton Court.

On a dark and tempestuous night, the 11th of November, 1647, the king, pretending to be indisposed, had retired at an early hour to his own chamber. When all appeared to be quiet, accompanied by Ashburnham, Sir John Berkley, and Mr. Legge, all of them in disguise, he passed through the vaults of the palace into the garden. From hence, a private door admitted them to the banks of the Thames, where a boat was in readiness, which conveyed them across the water to Thames-Ditton, where they discovered their horses waiting.* The account left us by Sir John Berkley is curious:—"On the Wednesday, as I take it," he says, "we had orders to send spare horses to Sutton, in Hampshire, a place where I never had been, and the Thursday after, his majesty, with Will. Legge, came out at the closing of the evening, and immediately went towards Oatlands, and so through the forest, where his majesty was our guide, but lost our way, though we were all acquainted with it, the night being excessively dark and stormy." Having wandered at least ten miles out of their proper course, it was daybreak when they reached the inn at Sutton, where they discovered a committee of the county sitting "about the Parliament's business." Their horses were immediately ordered out, and they proceeded on their way to Southampton. Even at this period Charles appears to have been undecided in what quarter to seek refuge, and at his desire all four of the fugitives led their horses down the next hill, for the purpose of conferring on the subject.

At length they arrived on the sea shore, not far from Southampton. The king, being disappointed in a vessel which he appeared to expect—for Ashburnham seems to have been the only person in his confidence,—they turned their horses' heads towards Titchfield, the residence of the Countess Dowager of Southampton, to whom Charles made no scruple of discovering himself.

At Titchfield, the king again deliberated with his friends, as to the next step they should take. During the debate, Ashburnham proposed that they should cross over to the Isle of Wight; as Hammond, though a friend of Cromwell, and the son-in-law of Hamden, was the nephew of the king's favourite chaplain. The details of that "fatal mistake," are well known. Ashburnham and Berkley were despatched to the island, with directions on no account to inform the governor of the king's place of abode, unless they could obtain the most solemn promise of protection, and an assurance that, if Hammond were unable to defend his majesty, at least he would not detain him. On reaching Carisbrook, they learnt that Hammond had just ridden towards Newport, whither they proceeded and fell in with him. Berkley immediately took him aside, and acquainted him that the king was in the neighbourhood, but without naming his hidingplace. "Hammond," says Berkley, "grew so pale, and fell into such a trembling, that I did really believe he would have fallen off his horse, which trembling continued with him at least half an hour after." Hammond, as is well known, declined entering into any engagement, expressing, however, a strong attachment to the king's person—but alleging the duty which he owed to his superiors.

* Lord Clarendon's account of the king's flight is, in one respect, somewhat different. "They discovered," he says, "the treading of horses at a back door of the garden into which his majesty had a passage out of his chamber, and it is true that way he went, having appointed his horse to be ready at an hour," &c.—History of the Rebellion, vol. v. p. 488. It is improbable that Charles should have had a horse on the Middlesex side of the river. The river, as is well known, flows immediately under the walls of the garden; and the utmost distance to Thames-Ditton ferry can hardly exceed half a mile.

Such a result to their negotiation intimated anything but the security they required; and yet Ashburnham, with inconceivable rashness, actually brought back the governor with him to Titchfield. Charles, when acquainted with the result of the expedition, could not conceal the bitterness of the moment, "Oh Jack!" he said, "thou hast undone me!" Ashburnham, as Berkley tells us, "wept bitterly," and offered to despatch the governor, but the king rejected the proposal. Charles had no choice but to submit, and accordingly, accompanied Hammond to the Island.

In the mean time the inmates of Hampton Court were amazed and confounded at the discovery of the king's flight. In all the minor details connected with the untoward enterprise, there is great difficulty in arriving at the truth. Hume curiously mentions that it was an hour before the king was missed, while Lord Clarendon seems to imply that the event did not transpire till the next morning:—"They who went into his chamber," he says, "found that he was not there, nor had been in his bed that night." But the real fact seems to have been, that Charles took his departure immediately after dark, (which in the month of November, would be at an early hour,) and that he was missed about three hours after he had commenced his flight.* Colonel Whaley, who had the charge of his person, in his official despatch to the speaker, minutely details the circumstances of the discovery. "As for the manner,

* Whitelock says, "November 12. Letters from Lieutenant-General Cromwell, to the house, of the king's going away. That the commissioners and Colonel Whaley missing him at supper, went into his chamber and found him gone, leaving his cloak in the gallery, and some letters of his own handwriting upon the table." Rushworth says, "November 11. This night came the unexpected news of his majesty's escape from Hampton Court. About nine of the clock, the officers who attended him wondered he came not forth of his chamber, went in, and missed him within half an hour of his departure." It appears from the Journal of the house of commons, that Cromwell's letter to the house was dated November 11, twelve at night, and mentions nine o'clock as the hour of the king's departure. It is evident, however, that as no one had been him set off, and as his keepers had all along believed him to be safe in his apartment, the exact hour of his flight could not as yet have been ascertained. Sir John Berkley, who accompanied Charles from Hampton Court, mentions especially that he "came forth at the closing of the evening."

Mr Speaker, of the king's going away, it thus:—Mondays and Thursdays were the king's set days for his writing letters to be sent into foreign parts. His usual time of coming out of his bed-chamber on those days, was betwixt five and six of the clock. Presently after he went to prayers: and about half an hour after that to supper: at which times I set guards about his bed-chamber, because he made no long stay after supper before he retired himself thither.

"About five of the clock," proceeds Whaley, "I came into the room next his bed-chamber, where I found the commissioners and bed-chamber men: I asked them for the king. They told me, he was writing letters in his bed-chamber. I waited there without mistrust till six of the clock. I then began to doubt; and told the bed-chamber men, Mr. Maule and Mr. Murray, I wondered the king was so long a writing. They told me he had, they thought, some extraordinary occasion.

"Within half an hour after, I went into the next room to Mr. Oudart, told him I marvelled the king was so long a writing. He answered, 'he wondered too.' But withal said, 'the king told him he was to write letters to the Princess of Orange,' which gave me some satisfaction for the present.

"But my fears with the time increased. So that, when it was seven of the clock, I again told Mr. Maule, I exceedingly wondered the king was so long before he came out. He told me he was writing. I replied, possibly he might be ill, therefore, I thought, he should do well to see, and to satisfy both myself and the house, that were in fears of him. He replied, the king had given strict commands not to molest him, therefore durst not; besides he had bolted the door to him.

"I was then extreme restless in my thoughts; looked oft in at the keyhole, to see whether I could perceive his majesty, but could not. Pressed Mr. Maule to knock, very oft, that I might know whether his majesty were there or not: but all to no purpose. He still plainly told me, he durst not disobey his majesty's commands.

"When it drew towards eight of the clock, I went to Mr. Smithby, keeper of the privy lodgings, desiring him to go along with me the back way through the garden, where I had sentinels, and we went up the stairs, and from chamber to chamber, till we came to the chamber next to his majesty's bed-chamber; where we saw his majesty's cloak lying on the midst of the floor, which much amazed me.

"I went presently back to the commissioners and bed-chamber men, acquainted them with it; and therefore desired Mr. Maule again, to see whether his majesty was in his bed-chamber or not. He again told me he durst not. I replied, that I would then command him, and that in the name of the Parliament; and therefore desired him to go along with me. He desired that I would speak to the commissioners to go along with us. I did; we all went.

"When we came into the room next the king's bed-chamber, I moved Mr. Maule to go in. He said, he would not except I would stand at the door. I promised I would, and I did.

"Mr. Maule immediately came out, and he said the king was gone. We all then went in, and one of the commissioners said, it may be the king is in his closet. Mr. Maule presently replied and said, he is gone.

Parties of horse and foot were instantly despatched to search the lodge in the park, as well as Ashburnham's house at Ditton and other places; and measures were still taken for the king's discovery, when the news of his being prisoner in the Isle of Wight was received by the parliament. Among other papers which were found in the king's bed-chamber after his flight, was a kind letter to Colonel Whaley; who, however faithful to his employers, had failed in being a rigorous or unfeeling guardian. The document throws some light on the amiable character of Charles, who never lost sight of private duties, even in the most exciting moments of his life.

"Colonel Whaley,

"I have been so civilly used by you and Major Huntingdon, that I cannot but by this parting farewell acknowledge it under my hand, as also to desire the continuance of your courtesy, by the protecting of my household-staff and movables of all sorts which I leave behind me in this house, that they be neither spoiled nor embezzled. Only there are here three pictures which are not mine, that I desire you to restore; to wit, my wife's picture in blue, sitting in a chair, you must send to Mrs. Kirk; my eldest daughter's picture, copied by Belcan, to the Countess of Anglesey; and my Lady Stanhope's picture to Cary Raleigh. There is a fourth, which I had almost forgot; it is the original of my eldest daughter; it hangs in this chamber over the board next the chimney, which you must send to my Lady Aubigny. So being confident that you wish my preservation and restitution, I rest your friend.

"CHARLES REX.

"P.S.—I assure you it was not the letter you showed me yesterday that made me take this resolution, nor any advertisement of that kind. But I confess that I am loth to be made a close prisoner under pretence of securing my life. I had almost forgot to desire you to send the black grew-bitch to the Duke of Richmond."

On landing in the Isle of Wight, the king passed the first night at Cowes. It may be remarked that, in 1713, the minister of Newport exhibited to a person, (from whom Bishop Kennet had the story,) an old and curious carved bedstead, on which King Charles rested on that eventful night. On the head-board were engraved in gilt letters the words, "Remember thy end." The king, taking it as an omen of his approaching death, knelt and prayed fervently by the bed-side.*

From Cowes, Charles was conducted by Colonel Hammond to his memorable prison at Carisbrook. As he passed through Newport, a lady presented him with a damask rose, which, notwithstanding the inclement season of the year, still flourished in her garden; accompanying the graceful offering with an ardent prayer for his happiness. The king thanked her kindly, and seemed much gratified, and even affected, by the attention.

For a brief period Charles was treated at Carisbrook with every demonstration of respect. His chaplains were again allowed to attend him; his old servants repaired to him as before, and he was permitted to ride about the island as he pleased. But the days of bitterness were fast approaching; his chaplains were first removed, and then came an order that all whom he had longest loved and most confided in should be discharged from their attendance. This last seems to have been a heavy blow to Charles, and he could with difficulty conceal his grief. "Such," says Herbert, "as were at that time in the presence, noted it; but not knowing the occasion of his majesty's sadness, they seemed full of grief, as by their dejected looks was visible. But the king beckoning with his hand to Mr. Ashburnham and others, he told them what the governor had communicated. Next day, after the king had dined, those gentlemen came altogether, and prostrating themselves at his majesty's feet, prayed God for his preservation, and, kissing his hand, departed. From this period the king was precluded from his usual rides, his recreation being entirely confined to the lines of the castle. The barbacan, however, had been converted by Hammond into a bowling-green, and afforded him some amusement. A "pretty summer-house" had also been constructed on the ramparts, whither he frequently retired to commune with his own thoughts. The bowling-green on the barbacan at Carisbrook, with its turf steps; the walls of the old castle frowning above it, and its beautiful marine view, is as perfect at the present moment as if it had been laid down but yesterday. A great portion of his time, at this period, was passed by Charles either in the study of the Bible or in earnest prayer.

It is worthy of remark, that during his confinement at Carisbrook, persons afflicted with the evil continued to resort to him in infinite numbers, and from the remotest parts. Throughout the Isle of Wight the kind-hearted inhabitants were much affected by the misfortunes of their king, and at their assemblies openly expressed their indignation at the treatment which he received. There was on the island a gallant man, of a good family, one Captain Burly, who had formerly commanded one of the king's ships of war. When the fleet became disloyal to its sovereign, Burly was dismissed from his post by the parliament; but willing to serve his master in any capacity, he shortly afterwards entered the royal army. In his new profession he soon rose to an important command, and only when the royal cause was utterly lost, retired to his native island and to the society of his early friends. He had lived thus for some time, beloved and respected, when, observing the indignation of the people, he one day, with more chivalry than discretion, caused a drum to be beat, and placing himself at the head of a small body of loyalists, called out to them to follow him, and he would lead them to the rescue of their king. Among the assembly, however, were some cooler heads than his own, and the project was forced to be dropped. "Poor Burly," as Lord Clarendon styles him, paid the forfeit of his rashness. The gallant fellow was condemned to be hung, drawn and quartered; and with many unnecessary circumstances of barbarity, the sentence was carried literally into execution.

Herbert has supplied us with a list of books in which the king most delighted at this period. Next to the Holy Scriptures, he says, his majesty preferred "Bishop Andrew's Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Dr. Hammond's Works, Villalpandus upon Ezekiel, Sand's Paraphrase on the Psalms of David, Herbert's Divine Poems, Fairfax's translation of Tasso, and Spenser's Faery Queene."

When at Carisbrook, Charles himself clothed his melancholy feelings in poetry. The verses in question, which extend to a considerable length, were omitted in the collection of the king's works, but were printed shortly afterwards by his biographer, Perinchief. Burnet, who seems to have been ignorant of the latter fact, mentions in his Lives of the Dukes of Hamilton, that "he had them from a very worthy gentleman who attended on Charles, and copied them from the original." "The mighty sense and great piety of them," he adds, "will be found to be beyond all the sublimities of poetry, which are not yet wanting here." Even Walpole condescends to speak well of them. "The poetry," he says, "is uncouth and unharmonious; but there are strong thoughts in them, some good sense, and a strain of majestic piety." It may be doubted if too high praise has not been passed upon this production: the following verses are certainly far from happy:

Tyranny bears the title of taxation,
Revenge and robbery are reformation;
Oppression gains the name of sequestration.

My loyal subjects, who, in this bad season,
Attend (by the law of God and reason,)
They dare impeach and punish for high treason.

Next at the clergy do their furies frown;
Pious episcopacy must go down;
They will destroy the crossier and the crown.

Churchmen are chained, and schismatics are freed,
Mechanics preach, and holy fathers bleed;
The crown is crucified with the creed.

The Church of England doth all faction foster,
The pulpit is usurped by each impostor;
Ex tempore excludes the pater noster.

Hume justly observes, that the truth of the sentiment, rather than the elegance of expression, renders them very pathetic.

The following couplet also composed by Charles in the treaty chamber at Newport, has been preserved by Nicholas Oudart,—

A coward's still unsafe, but courage knows
No other foe but him who does oppose.

It was the custom of Charles at this period, to insert mottoes, or remarkable verses, in the blank pages of his favourite authors. In many of them he wrote the words Dum spiro spero,—while I breathe I have hope. In another book he had inserted the following couplet, probably from Boethius,—

Rebus in adversis facile est contemnere vitam;
Fortiter ille facit, qui miser esse potest:

Which may be thus translated—

In grief 'tis easy to despise the grave;
Who dares be wretched is the truly brave.

And again, from Claudian,

Fallitur egregio quisquis sub principe credit
Servitium; nunquam libertas gratior extat,
Quam sub nege pio.

There is no slavery in a good man's rule;—
But ne'er does liberty more grateful spring,
Than 'neath the empire of a pious king.*

After a confinement of several months at Carisbrook, Charles was removed to the house of a private gentleman at Newport, where his friends were once more permitted to visit him. This change was rendered necessary in consequence of the personal negotiation which was pending between Charles and the parliamentary commissioners; there being a want of space and other facilities, at Carisbrook, by which the treaty could commodiously be carried on. The change was an agreeable one to Charles, who had been long in constant dread of assassination. To Sir John Bowring he said: "I have had a sad time of it, since the two houses imprisoned me in this castle, expecting every hour when I should be murdered." One day at Newport, the king beckoned Sir Philip Warwick to the window where he was standing, and pointing out to him a little humpbacked man in the street, inquired if he knew who he was. Sir Philip answering that he had never seen him before,—"I show him to you," said Charles, "because he was the best companion I had for three months together at Carisbrook, where he used to light my fires." Sir Philip Warwick relates another slight incident which occurred about the same period. "One evening," he says, "the king's favourite dog scraping at the door, his majesty desired Sir Philip to let in Gipsy." "I perceive," said the latter, as he opened the door, "that your majesty loves greyhounds better than spaniels." "Yes," replied Charles, "for they are both equally attached, and the greyhound is no flatterer." The interesting apartments which witnessed these scenes, are now occupied by the free school at Newport. The famous treaty chamber is the present school room.

The commissioners, who presided at the treaty, were much surprised at the melancholy change, which sorrow, rather than time, had produced in the appearance of Charles. Though less than a year had elapsed since they had last seen him at Hampton Court, his hair had become almost entirely gray. Since the expulsion of his servants, too, he had worn nearly the same clothes, and had allowed his beard and the hair of his head to grow at will. Nevertheless his mind appeared as clear as ever, and his cheerfulness and manly dignity were even more conspicuous than before.

Previously to his quitting Carisbrook, Charles, it may be mentioned, had entertained more than one project of escape. There are extant several letters, which passed between the king and one of his faithful followers, relative to the mode of his intended flight. In one of them, without date, Mr. Firebrace thus writes to the king:—"This night I have thought of a new project, which, by the grace of God, will effect your business. 'Tis this: In the back-stairs' window are two casements, in each two bars: one of the bars, in that next the door, shall be cut, which will give you way enough to go out. I am certain the top of the hill comes within a yard of the casement, so that you may easily step out, and keep close to the wall till you come to a hollow place, (which you may observe as you walk tomorrow,) where with ease you may go down and so over the outworks. If you like this way, it shall be carried on thus. Hen. C—— shall cut the bar, and do up the gap with wax or clay, so that it cannot be perceived. I have already made it loose at the top, so that when you intend your business, you shall only pull it, and it will come forth. You must sup late and come up so soon as you have supped. Put off your George and on your gray stockings, and on notice to be given you by Hen. C——, come into the back-stairs and so step out. We shall meet you, and conduct you to your horses, and then to the boat."

Charles writes in reply to this letter, 26th April, 1648:—"I have now made perfect trial, and find it impossible to be done: for my body is much too thick for the breadth of the window, so that unless the middle bar be taken away I cannot get through. I have also looked upon the other, and find the one much too little, and the other so high, that I know not how to reach it without a ladder; besides, I do not believe it so much wider than the other, as that it will serve; wherefore, it is absolutely impossible to do any thing to-morrow, at night." All difficulties, however, having been removed, on a particular night horses were placed in readiness, and a vessel was provided for his transportation, when the design was unfortunately discovered. Charles, it appears, had been furnished with a saw and file, with which instruments, after considerable labour, he had succeeded in sawing through one of the bars of the window. At midnight, the hour agreed upon with his friends without, he was proceeding to make his escape, when he perceived, what was extremely unusual, some persons in conversation below. Suspecting that his purpose had transpired, he closed the window hastily, and retired to bed. In the mean time, Hammond, who seems to have been acquainted all along with what was passing, entered the king's apartment, and perceived, by the bar which had been removed, that his suspicions had been correct.

A second attempt at escape, which proved equally unfortunate in its result, is recorded both by Clarendon and Ashburnham. Charles, on this occasion, placing faith in the vulgar notion, that where the head can make its egress, the body can invariably follow, had inserted his head through the bars; but was unable, by forcing himself either backwards or forwards, to extricate himself from his painful situation. In this predicament he was compelled to call for assistance, and the design transpired.* There is much reason to suppose, that had Charles descended from the window, he would have been fired at by a traitor below; indeed, the suspected person, one Rolph, was afterwards tried at Winchester assizes for the conspiracy. The trial, however, was a mere juggle; Rolph was placed under no kind of restraint; the jury were prejudiced in his behalf, and even the judge interfered in his favour. The consequence was, that the bill was ignored by the grand jury;—the same, nearly to a man, who had recently condemned poor Burly to an untimely end.

CHAPTER VIII.

About the close of the treaty of Newport, when all hope of accommodation was evidently at an end, Charles was standing at a window, employed in dictating to Sir Philip Warwick, when a thought seemed suddenly to strike him. "I wish," he said, "I had consulted nobody but myself; for then, as where in honour or conscience I could not have complied, I could have

* Ashburnham says in his Narrative: "Having discovered upon trial, that he could pass his body between the bars of the window of his chamber, because he found there was room enough for his head, (the rule being that where the head can pass the body may,) but most unhappily he mistook the way of measure, for instead of putting forth his head side ways, he did it right forward, by which error, when all things were adjusted for his escape the second time, and that he thought to put in execution what he thought so sure, (his passage through the window,) he stuck so fast in it, and (as he was pleased to send me word) did strain so much in the attempt, as he was in great extremity, though with long and painful struggling he got back again." See also Sir John Browning's account of Secret Transactions in the Isle of Wight.

easily been positive; for with Job I would willingly have chosen misery than sin." While he spoke these words the tears gathered in his eyes and rolled down his cheeks. "They were the biggest drops," adds Sir Philip, "that ever I saw fall from any eye; but, recollecting himself, he turned presently his head away, for he was loth it should be discerned." His parting with the commissioners was affecting. "My lords," he said, "I believe we shall scarce see each other again; but God's will be done. I have made my peace with him, and shall undergo, without fear, whatever he may suffer men to do to me."

The time had now approached when Charles was to bid farewell to the Isle of Wight, and Colonel Cobbit, with a party of horse, was despatched thither to conduct his removal. The king had already received some intimation of what would happen, and was strongly pressed by his friends to make another effort to escape; but he was at this time on his parole, and peremptorily refused to break it. The affectionate entreaties of the Earl of Lindsey and Colonel Cook, produced not the slightest effect. After combating their arguments for some time—"Good night," said the king, "I shall go and take my rest."—"Which, I fear," rejoined Cook, taking up the words, "will not be long." Charles perceiving Cook to be much discomposed:—"Ned," he said, "what troubleth you?" Cook replied, "that it was his majesty's danger, and the disinclination which he showed to adopt any measures which might avert it." "Were your trouble greater," replied Charles, "I would not forfeit my word to alleviate it."

The morning after this conversation, Colonel Cobbit presented himself to the king, and formally intimated to him his instructions. He refused, however, to acquaint the king of his destination, or even to satisfy him whether his instructions were from the parliament or from the army. After a brief colloquy, Cobbit pressed his majesty to enter his coach, which, he added, had been already prepared for his use. Charles turned sorrowfully to bid farewell to those faithful servants, whom he probably never expected to meet again: like those about him, he seemed fully satisfied that it was to be his last journey, and that he was proceeding to a violent death. "Never," says Herbert, who was present, "was beheld more grief in men's faces, or greater fears in their hearts, the king being at such a time, and in such a manner hurried away, they knew not whither; but no remedy appearing, the noblemen, the venerable persons, and other his majesty's servants, approached to kiss the king's hand, and to pour forth supplications to Almighty God to safeguard and comfort his majesty in that his disconsolate condition." Charles, who on similar melancholy occasions had been the most cheerful of the party, betrayed the mental suffering which he endured. As he was entering his coach, Cobbit, without any invitation, showed an intention of entering it also, but the king, by pointedly opposing his foot, made him sensible that the intrusion was as unpalatable as it was insolent. The Duke of Richmond was allowed to attend him for the distance of two miles. His only other companions were Herbert, Harrington and Mildmay, his carver. When the Duke of Richmond kissed the king's hand, on taking his melancholy farewell, Charles desired that he would carry back his kind remembrance to the Earl of Lindsey and Colonel Cook:—"Tell Colonel Cook from me," he said, "never to forget the passages of this night."

A more wretched spot can scarcely be conceived, than that in which Charles once again found himself a prisoner. Hurst Castle stood about a mile and a half into the sea, on a cold and gloomy promontory, remarkable for its noxious vapours, and so unwholesome that the guards were constantly compelled to be changed;—"a dismal receptacle," observes Herbert, "for so great a monarch, the greatest part of whose life had been so full of earthly glory." "The captain of this wretched place," adds Herbert, "was not ill-suited to the scene around. At the king's going ashore he stood ready to receive him with small observance; his look was stern, his hair and large beard were black and bushy; he held a partisan in his hand, and a great basket-hilt sword by his side: hardly could one see a man of more grim aspect, and no less robust and rude was his behaviour: some of his majesty's servants were not a little fearful of him." This tremendous personage, however, appears to have been a mere bully; for his rudeness having been complained of to his superior officer, he sunk into the insignificant underling.

During the three weeks that Charles remained at Hurst, there was little to divert the melancholy of his thoughts. His walks were confined to a shingly shore, the nature of which rendered his favourite exercise extremely unpleasant; his accommodations were slender in the last degree; and his apartment was so dark that he required candles at noonday. Indeed, from the time he was first a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, his personal luxuries had never been very carefully attended to. He told Sir Philip Warwick, that "though he had never complained, yet he had frequently been in want even of clean linen."

At the latter part of the king's stay at Hurst, about midnight, an unusual noise was heard in the castle. The drawbridge was let down, and the sound of horses' feet was plainly perceptible. The noise awoke the king, who rang his silver bell for Herbert, and desired him to ascertain the cause of the disturbance. The whole, however, that Herbert could discover, was that Major Harrison had arrived at the castle with a troop of horse. The king said nothing at the time, but desiring Herbert to attend in the outer room, composed himself to prayer. In less than an hour he opened the door, and appeared to be in so much affliction that Herbert could not refrain from tears. "I am not afraid," said the king, "but do you not know that this is the man who intended to assassinate me?"—adding, "this is a fit place for such a purpose. Herbert," he said, "I trust to your care; go again, and make further inquiry into his business." Herbert shortly returned, bringing with him the information that his majesty was immediately to be removed to Windsor. At this news the king appeared much pleased, little imagining, however, that it was to be but another step to the block.

Two days after this event, the king bade adieu to Hurst, and commenced his journey towards London. At Winchester, he met with much respect, and an appearance of loyalty to which he had been long a stranger. The bells of the town were rung; the mayor and aldermen received him at his entry, and presented him with the keys and mace of the city; the gentry flocked in numbers to welcome him, and the people hailed him with acclamations. He passed the night at a gentleman's house at Farnham, where he was waited on by several officers of the army, and by several of the influential persons in the neighbourhood. His manner at this period was at least that of a cheerful, if not of a happy man.

The next day he dined at Lord Newburgh's house at Bagshot, where another wild scheme had been devised for his escape. Lord Newburgh having ascertained, while the king was yet at Hurst, that he would shortly be removed to Windsor, had sent privately to his majesty, recommending, that before he reached Bagshot, he should contrive to lame the horse which he rode; adding, that he would then supply him with a fresh one out of his own stables, which he would undertake should be one of the fleetest in England. Had this plan succeeded, Charles was to have waited till the night set in, (by which time they would probably have been in the heart of Windsor forest, with the windings of which he was well acquainted) when he was to set spurs to his horse, and gallop away from his keepers. Accordingly, Charles, who appears to have regarded the plan as a feasible one, (as had previously been agreed upon,) expressed a strong desire to dine at Bagshot, and as they approached Lord Newburgh's house, made great complaints of the horse which he rode, and expressed his intention of providing himself on the first opportunity with another. At Bagshot, however, the information was conveyed to him, that the horse in which he had so much trusted had been lamed but the day before. Even had this accident not happened, it is difficult to believe that he could have escaped the vigilance, or at least the pistols of his keepers.

At Windsor he was treated with much civility by Colonel Whichcot, the governor of the castle. For some time he seemed to take an interest in passing events, and we find him casually sending the seeds of some Spanish melons to be planted in the Queen's gardens at Wimbledon. He generally walked on that part of the terrace which looks towards Eton, and which also happened to be the aspect of his apartments. When Whichcot informed him that, in a few days, he was to be conveyed to Whitehall, "God," he said, "is every where alike, in wisdom, power, and goodness." It was here that the first intimation was conveyed to him of those extraordinary proceedings, which in a few days were to follow. When the probability of a public trial was announced to him, he retired to his own chamber, and passed a considerable time in solitude and prayer.

On the day fixed for his departure from Windsor he passed through a double line of soldiers to the round tower, or keep, where his coach was in readiness to receive him. At the last moment, he was allowed an interview with the unfortunate Duke of Hamilton, who was also a prisoner in the castle. The duke fell on his knees, and kissing the king's hand, exclaimed in a passion of grief, "my dear master!" Charles replied, "I have indeed been so to you." But the meeting was not allowed to be protracted, and after a tender and solemn farewell, the kind monarch and the loyal subject were separated for the last time. At the great gate of the castle, at the end of Peascod Street, as well as in the market-place, the king was successively joined by different bodies of soldiers, who placed themselves under the command of Major Harrison, and followed close behind the royal coach. One Proctor, in his evidence at the trial of Hugh Peters, thus describes his encountering them on the road. "Having occasion," he says, "to go from London to Windsor, the day that the king was brought from thence a prisoner, a little on this side Brentford I saw a great troop of horse: I did conceive what the cause was, having heard the king was to be brought up to his trial. After I had passed some number of horses, at last I espied the prisoner at the bar immediately before the king's coach, riding singly before the coach-horses, and the king sitting alone in the coach. My lord, I did put off my hat, and he was graciously pleased to put off his hat. The troopers seeing this, threw me into the ditch, horse and all, where I stayed till they passed by, and was glad I escaped so." It was probably about this period that the fanatical buffoon, Hugh Peters, pressed his spiritual assistance upon his persecuted sovereign: "I did intend," said the republican, "to preach before the poor wretch, but the poor wretch would not hear me." Passing through Brentford and Hammersmith, the cavalcade at length conducted the king to St. James's, the scene of many happier days, and the last prison of the persecuted monarch.

On his arrival at St. James's, the first act of Charles was to retire to his own chamber, where he continued some time in prayer and in the perusal of the Bible. For about the period of a fortnight he was treated with some regard to his exalted rank, though with little respect to his private feelings. Although the principal nobility, his favourite servants, and his domestic chaplains, were excluded from his society, he was still attended with some degree of former state. He dined publicly in the presence-chamber: the gentlemen of his household waited on him at his meals, and the cup, as usual, was presented to him on the knee. Nevertheless the strictest guard was placed over his person, and only one of his followers, the affectionate Herbert, was permitted to attend him in his bed-chamber. But even the mockery of respect was continued but for a few days. It was decreed, at one of the councils of the army, that henceforward all state ceremony should be dispensed with, and that the number of domestics, and even the dishes supplied to his table, should be diminished. When this unfeeling and parsimonious curtailment, and the absence of many faithful faces, were first witnessed by Charles, and when his restricted meal was brought into his presence by common soldiers—"There is nothing," he remarked, "more contemptible than a despised prince." From this time he caused his food to be conveyed into his own chamber, and ate his dinner in private.

In one of the suppressed passages of Lord Clarendon's history, there is a heart stirring account of the king's sufferings at this period, but it scarcely appears to be borne out by the testimony of other writers. According to the noble historian, a guard of soldiers was forced upon him, night as well as day, even in his bed-chamber, where they smoked and drank as if they had been among their own comrades in the guard-room. The king, it is added, was confined entirely to his bed-chamber, where he was compelled to perform his devotions, and whatever nature requires, in the presence of these rude companions.

A project had been set on foot to effect his escape, but the usual fatality attended it. Ashburnham says, in his Narrative; "I laid the design of his escape from St. James's, and had attempted it, had he not been close restrained that very day it was to be put into execution, of which there are three persons of honour yet living who were to have had equal shares in that dutiful action; but man proposeth and God disposeth, and no creature is able to resist his power." It may be remarked that such soldiers as had once guarded the king, were never again selected for the same duty. It was apprehended that their feelings might be too much wrought upon by such a scene of piety and distress.

Charles, though in daily fear of private assassination, to the last could scarcely comprehend the possibility of a public trial and execution. He believed that he might be imprisoned for life, that monarchy might be abolished in his person, or that his son might be called upon to reign in his room, but the awful catastrophe which followed, he seems scarcely to have regarded as a possible disaster. However, on the 9th of January, 1649, to the astonishment of the citizens of London, and the indignation of the majority, a sergeant-at-arms rode solemnly into the middle of Westminster Hall, and, with the sound of drums and trumpets, proclaimed the approaching trial. On the 19th, the king was conveyed in a sedan-chair from St. James's through the park, to his usual bed-chamber at Whitehall, at the door of which a guard of soldiers was placed. In order to have Herbert nearer his person, he desired him to bring his pallet-bed into his own chamber.

The next day he was conveyed in a sedan-chair to the house of Sir Robert Cotton, on the bank of the Thames, near the west-end of Westminster Hall. King Street and Palace Yard were lined on each side with soldiers, between whom the unhappy monarch passed; Herbert, the only one of his servants who was allowed to attend him, walking by his side bareheaded.

Shortly after his arrival at Cotton House, he was summoned by Colonel Hacker to attend that self-constituted tribunal, the proceedings of which cannot but be viewed with mingled feelings of astonishment and abhorrence. Apart from the amazing spectacle of a great nation sitting in judgment on his sovereign, and from the melancholy considerations suggested by the position of Charles, the scene which presented itself must have been imposing and magnificent in the extreme. At the upper, or south end of the hall, on benches covered with scarlet, and raised one above the other, sat the judges whose numbers amounted to about seventy. In the centre, on a raised platform, was placed a chair of state for the President Bradshaw; it was covered with crimson velvet, as was also a desk placed before him for his use. Immediately facing Bradshaw, was placed a chair of velvet for the king: and in the space between them was a table, covered with a rich Turkey carpet, on which the mace and sword of justice were laid, and at which the two clerks of the court were seated. On either side of the hall, galleries had been erected for the convenience of spectators; and behind, and on the right and left of the king, were the soldiers and officers of the court; Cook, the solicitor for the self-styled people of England, standing on the king's right hand. A strong bar ran across the centre of the hall, behind which were crowded the populace in a dense mass.

Even the leads and windows of the hall were filled with soldiers. This was not so much a precaution to prevent the escape or rescue of the king, as to protect the persons of the judges. Bradshaw, the president, stood in no slight danger of assassination. One Burghill, a royalist, had made up his mind to shoot him, but his intention being discovered, he was instantly arrested: fortunately, the soldiers who guarded Burghill becoming intoxicated, he was enabled to escape. Bradshaw was well aware of his danger, and procured a high-crowned beaver hat lined with steel. This remarkable relic, with a suitable Latin inscription, was afterwards presented to the Museum at Oxford, where it is still preserved.

The king, on entering Westminster Hall, was received from the custody of Colonel Hacker by the sergeant-at-arms, who conducted his majesty to the bar. After looking sternly at his judges, and on the galleries on each side of him, he seated himself without either taking off his hat, or showing the least respect for the court. Some minutes afterwards he rose from his chair, and turning round, fixed his eyes steadily on the guards and the crowd of people behind him. While the charge was being read, he sat unmoved and maintained his usual placidity of countenance; while at some of the more absurd or daring allegations he was occasionally observed to smile. "One thing was remarked in him," says Mrs. Hutchinson in her Memoirs; "that when the blood spilt in many of the battles, where he was in his own person, and had caused it to be shed by his own command, was laid to his charge, he heard it with disdainful smiles and looks and gestures. He stuck not to declare in words, that no man's blood spilt in this quarrel troubled him but only one, meaning the Earl of Strafford."

When the name of Fairfax, the lord general, had been called over, and no answer was returned, a female voice exclaimed from one of the galleries, "He has more wit than to be here;" but when, in the course of reading the charge, the proceedings were stated to be on behalf of the people of England, the same mysterious voice called out still louder—"No, not the hundredth part of them! It is false—where are they?—Oliver Cromwell is a traitor." The utmost confusion was the consequence, and Col. Axtell even desired the soldiers to fire into the gallery from whence the voice issued. It was discovered, however, that Lady Fairfax, the wife of the general, and a daughter of the House of Vere, was the daring person; she was instantly compelled to retire.* Lady Fairfax was not the only voice which was that day raised for majesty in distress. As he passed through the hall to Cotton House, on returning from the court, there were loud cries of "God save the king!" an unexpected manifestation of public feeling which was gratefully acknowledged by the persecuted monarch.

Charles, by the advice, it is said, of Sir Matthew Hale, persisted in denying the authority of the court. Undoubtedly, it was the wisest and most dignified course he could have adopted; besides having the effect of shortening the proceedings, and, consequently, his own sufferings. The behaviour of Bradshaw was inconceivably brutal. When, at the close of the day's proceed-

* "I was present," says Sir Purbeck Temple, "at all the trials of the king, and very near him. I heard the king demand from Bradshaw, by what authority and commission they proceeded thus strangely to try him. Then I heard the Lady Fairfax, and one Mrs. Nelson, my sister, after the exhibiting of the charge in the name of the Commons assembled in Parliament, and the good people of this kingdom, against Charles Stuart King of England; I say, I heard the lady cry out from a gallery over the court, 'Not half the people! It is false; where are they or their consents? Oliver Cromwell is a traitor.' Upon which I heard Axtell cry out, 'Down with the whores!—shoot them,' which made me take further notice of him."—Trial of the Regicides, p. 185.

ings, he ordered the guards, with a surly insolence of manner, to remove the prisoner, Charles pointed with his cane to the sword on the table, "Sir," he said, "I do not fear that." As soon as the proceedings were over, the king was again conducted to Cotton House, where he passed the night; Herbert making up his bed on the floor and sleeping by his side. The next day being Sunday, afforded him a respite, and he spent many hours with Bishop Juxon, either in prayer or religious conversation.

On the following morning, the 22d of January, the king was again placed before his judges. On this occasion, having been brought to Westminster by water, although the soldiers who guarded him wore their caps as usual, the watermen positively refused to sit covered in his presence.

The number of his judges had increased from sixty-seven to seventy. As Charles entered the hall, the soldiers raised loud cries for justice, some of the officers joining in the clamour. It seems to have been the only instance in which he changed countenance; but the pang was easily conquered, or at most was but momentarily displayed. A bystander, Sir Purbeck Temple, describes the indignities which were heaped upon the mild and suffering monarch. In his evidence at the trial of Colonel Axtell, "I saw him [Axtell]," he says, "the most active person there; and during the time that the king was urging to be heard, he was then scoffing, entertaining his soldiers, laughing aloud: whilst some of the soldiers, by his suffering, and, I believe, procurement, did fire powder in the palms of their hands, that they did not only offend his majesty's smell, but enforced him to rise up out of his chair, and with his hand to turn away the smoke; and after this he turned about to the people and smiled upon them, and those soldiers that so rudely treated him."

As he was quitting Westminster Hall on the second day, one of the soldiers, as he passed by, exclaimed, "God bless you, sir!" The king thanked him, but the man's officers, overhearing the benediction, struck him severely with his cane on the head. "Methinks," said Charles, "the punishment exceedeth the offence." One person was actually brutal enough to spit in his face; the king quietly wiped it away. "My Saviour," he remarked, "suffered more than this for me." The man who was guilty of this brutality is supposed to have been Augustine Garland, a lawyer, and one of the king's judges: Garland, however, positively denied the fact. When the soldiers had conducted Charles to his apartment, he fell on his knees in prayer; but even quiet was a boon denied to him. "When they had brought him to his chamber," says Perinchief, "even there they suffered him not to rest; but thrusting in and smoking their filthy tobacco, they permitted him no privacy to prayer and meditation." The king asked Herbert if he had heard the cry of the soldiers in the morning. Herbert answered that he had, and that he could not but wonder at their vehement animosity. "I am well assured," said the king, "that the soldiers bear no malice to me: the cry was no doubt given by their officers, for whom the soldiers would do the like, were there occasion." To another person he had remarked,—"Poor souls, for a little money they would do as much against their commanders."

On the third day of the trial, the twenty-third day of January, the king was again guarded to the hall as formerly. Nothing of importance occurred, except that the gold head of his cane fell off, a remarkable incident, which he considered to be an evil omen. When he returned to Cotton House in the evening, the populace pressed on him notwithstanding the soldiers, and many exclaimed, "God preserve your majesty," demanding blessings from Heaven on their afflicted king. Charles appeared much gratified, and repeatedly returned them thanks for their good wishes and prayers.

On the morning of the fourth and last day, the day of condemnation, Bradshaw's wife rushed into her husband's chamber at Westminster, where he had been lodged for safety and convenience, and beseeched him by his hopes of happiness here and hereafter, to absent himself from the horrid work. "Do not," she said, "sentence this earthly king, for fear of the dreadful sentence of the King of Heaven. You have no child, why should you do such a monstrous act to favour others?" Bradshaw pushed her away. "I confess," he said, "he has done me no harm, nor will I do him any, except what the law commands." The man, it appears, was intoxicated with the extraordinary position in which he was placed,—the insignificant lawyer had risen to be the judge of his sovereign, the elected chief magistrate of the people of England. This day the president entered the hall in his scarlet gown, a signal to Charles that his doom was fixed, and that before another sun had set, his sentence would be pronounced.

After a vulgar, tiresome, and absurd tirade from Bradshaw, the O, yes! was made, and silence commanded in the court. The clerk then read the sentence. After reciting the act of the self-called Commons of England, (for Charles was certainly not tried by the representatives of the people, at least by a free, full, and constitutional House of Commons,) it proceeded to accuse him of being the author and continuer (which, being untrue, it was impossible to prove,) of the late unnatural, cruel, and bloody wars, and consequently guilty of high treason, and of all the murders, rapines, burnings, spoils, desolations, damages, and mischiefs, occasioned by and committed during the said wars; "for which treasons and crimes," it proceeded, "this court doth adjudge that he, the said Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the good people of this nation, shall be put to death, by severing his head from his body." When the sentence was read the king smiled calmly, and lifted up his eyes as if pleading for that mercy in Heaven which he was denied by his persecutors upon earth.

Bradshaw stood up. "The sentence now read and published," he said, "is the act, sentence, judgment, and resolution of the whole court." On this, as had already been agreed upon, the whole of the judges also rose, as a tacit acknowledgment of their acquiescence and consent. The king with the same placid smile, inquired of the president if he would hear him for a few moments.

Bradshaw.—Sir, you are not to be heard after the sentence.

Charles.—No, Sir?

Bradshaw.—No, sir, by your favour. Guards, withdraw your prisoner.

Charles.—I may speak after the sentence, by your favour, sir. I may speak after the sentence, ever. By your favour—

Bradshaw.—Hold!

Charles.—The sentence, sir; I say, sir, I do—

Bradshaw.—Hold!

Charles.—I am not suffered to speak! Expect what justice the people will have.

Before he could say more, the king was removed by the guards. The regicides accounted for their cruel and infamous refusal to listen to the condemned monarch, by an argument too absurd even to be plausible. 'The king, they said, being accounted dead in law, a hearing could not be permitted. As Charles passed, for the last time, through that famous hall, the banqueting room of the kings his ancestors, and the trial scene of more than one of his own friends, and of many of the greatest and most brilliant of their day, he was insulted in the grossest manner by the poor hirelings whom he passed; the soldiers smoking their tobacco in his face, and throwing their pipes before him in his path, besides heaping on him the lowest and most virulent abuse.

From Westminster he was conveyed, in a sedan chair, through a double line of soldiers, to his chambers at Whitehall. As he passed through King street, the more respectable inhabitants, many of them with tears in their eyes, stood at their stalls and windows, and beheld the scene of harassed and fallen majesty, with audible prayers for his safety or eternal happiness. After a lapse of two hours he was removed to St. James's, where he passed the three remaining days of his life.

CHAP. IX.

The necessity of religion, and the advantages of a virtuous life, were never more beautifully exemplified than in the last hours of Charles. His accumulated miseries—the loss of power—the brutality of republicanism, and the horrors of dissolution, were nothing to a mind prepared like his; to the brave man—the pious Christian—the conscientious monarch. How well did he say to Lord Digby, "Either I will live as a king, or die like a gentleman." There was nothing of that fanatical enthusiasm, or those false and rapturous ecstasies, which constituted the zeal and sanctity of his persecutors—his death was that of a good man, who forgave his persecutors, and trusted in his God. His dignity and his fortitude too, were all his own. Bishop Juxon, his spiritual adviser, was a cold dry man, but little calculated to excite an adventitious enthusiasm in the last hours of life. With the assistance of this prelate, the king prepared himself for the latest scene. While he sent the kindest remembrances to his friends, he gave directions that he should by no means be interrupted in his preparation for death. "I know," he said "my nephew, the Elector, will endeavour it, and other lords that love me, which I should take in good part, but my time is short and precious, and I am desirous to improve it the best I may in preparation. I hope they will not take it ill that none have access to me but my children. The best office they can do now is to pray for me." The same night, according to a contemporary journal, "The Moderate Intelligencer,"—"he commanded his dogs should be taken away, and sent to his wife, as not willing to have any thing present that might take him off from serious consideration of himself. Being desired to say somewhat, how far he was guilty of the death of his father, and the rebellion of Ireland, he said, 'with reverence of God be it spoken, he had done nothing that he needed to ask pardon for.'" When some of the dissenting ministers requested permission to pray with him, he told them he had already selected his ghostly adviser; at the same time, thanking them for their offer, and desiring they would remember him in their prayers.

On one of the intermediate nights between his trial and execution, the king took a ring from his finger, on which was an emerald set between two diamonds, and delivering it to Herbert, desired him to proceed with it to a certain house in Channel Row, at the back of King street, Westminster, where he was to deliver it to the lady of the house without saying a word. This person was Lady Wheeler, the king's laundress. Having obtained the watchword from Colonel Tomlinson, Herbert, proceeded, on a dark night, to the spot which the king had designated. Having obtained admittance, he was told by the lady to wait in the parlour till she returned. She shortly afterwards re-entered the room, and placing in his hands a small cabinet closed with three seals, desired him to deliver it to the same person from whom he had received the ring. The next morning, in Herbert's presence, the king broke the seals, when the cabinet was found to contain a number of diamonds and jewels, most of them set in broken insignia of the Order of the Garter. "This," said the king, "is all the wealth which I have in my power to bequeath to my children."

The day before his execution, the Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Gloucester were allowed to take a last farewell of their unfortunate father. The princess, an extraordinary child, was deeply affected; and the little duke, taking his impression from the scene around him, wept almost as bitterly. They both fell on their knees and craved their father's blessing. The king raised them up and kissed them affectionately. Placing the princess on his knee, he desired her to tell her brother James that he must no longer regard Charles as his elder brother, but as his sovereign; adding that it was his dying wish they should love one another, and forgive their father's enemies. He told her not to grieve for him, for he died for the laws and liberties of the land, and for the maintenance of the protestant religion. He desired her to tell her mother that his thoughts had never strayed from her, and that his love had survived to the last. He then gave her his blessing, enjoining her to convey it to her brothers and sisters, and to remember him to all who were dear to him, "But, sweetheart," he said, "you will forget this." "No," she replied, "I shall never forget it while I live;" and bursting into tears afresh, promised to write down whatever he had said to her.

Then he took the Duke of Gloucester on his knee. "Sweetheart," he said, "they will cut off thy father's head." The child looked wistfully in his face. "Mark, child, what I say: they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king;* but mark what I say; you must not be made a king, as long as your brothers Charles and James are alive; for they will cut off your brothers' heads when they catch them, and cut off thy head at last; and, therefore, I charge you not to be made a king by them." The child replied, "he would be torn in pieces first," an answer from one so young, which evidently afforded great pleasure to the king. He then presented them with his jewels, and while the tears rolled down his cheeks, kissed them both fondly, and prayed the Almighty to bless them. He watched their departure with a father's grief, and as the door of the apartment was closing on them, moved hastily towards them from the window where he was standing, and folding them in his arms, again kissed and blessed them, and bade them farewell for ever.

The remainder of the day was spent in prayer and meditation. Bishop Juxon preached a sermon before him, taking for his text, Romans ii. v. 16: "In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ," &c. When the discourse was at an end he received the sacrament, and afterwards continued till a late hour of the night in conversation with the bishop. After his departure he remained about two hours praying and reading by himself. He then, as night approached, called to Herbert to place his bed on the floor by his own. Herbert enjoyed but little rest, but the king slept calmly for about four hours.

On the fatal morning, about two hours before day-break, he awoke, and drawing back his curtains, called to his faithful attendant, whom he perceived much troubled in his sleep, from the effect it seems of a remarkable dream.* "Herbert," he said, almost playfully, "this is my second marriage day; I would be as trim as may be to-day, for before night I hope to be espoused to

* Herbert relates the substance of this dream, in a letter to Dr. Samways, dated 28th August, 1680. "For some hours his majesty slept very soundly; for my part, I was so full of anguish and grief, that I took little rest. The king, some hours before day, drew his bed curtain to awaken me, and could, by the light of a wax-lamp, perceive me troubled in my sleep. The king rose forthwith; and as I was making him ready, 'Herbert,' said the king, 'I would know why you were disquieted in your sleep?' I replied, 'May it please your majesty, I was in a dream.' 'What was your dream?' said the king; 'I would hear it.' 'May it please your majesty,' said I, 'I dreamed, that as you were making ready, one knocked at the bed-chamber door, which your majesty took no notice of, nor was I willing to acquaint you with it, apprehending it might be Colonel Hacker. But knocking the second time, your majesty asked me if I heard it not? I said I did; but did not use to go without your orders. Why then, go know who it is, and his business. Whereupon I opened the door, and perceived that it was the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Laud, in his pontifical habit, as worn at court; I knew him, having seen him often. The archbishop desired he might enter, having something to say to the king. I acquainted your majesty with his desire; so you bade me let him in. Being in, he made his obeisance to your majesty in the middle of the room, doing the like also when he came near your person; and, falling on his knees, your majesty gave him your hand to kiss, and took him aside to the window, where some discourse passed between your majesty and him, and I kept a becoming distance, not hearing any thing that was said, yet could perceive your majesty pensive by your looks, and that the archbishop gave a sigh; who, after a short stay, again kissing your hand, returned, but with his face all the way towards your majesty, and making his usual reverences, the third being so submissive, as he fell prostrate on his face on the ground, and I immediately stepped to him to help him up, which I was then acting when your majesty saw me troubled in my sleep. The impression was so lively, that I looked about verily thinking it was no dream.' The king said my dream was remarkable, but he is dead; yet, had we conferred together during life, 'tis very likely (albeit I loved him well) I should have said something to him might have occasioned his sigh."—Memoirs of Sir J. Herbert, p. 219.

CARDINAL MAZARINE.

On his death (1661) Louis XIV. and his court appeared in mourning, an honour not common, though Henry IV. had shown it to the memory of Gabrielle d'Estrées. Voltaire, who appears unwilling to ascribe much ability to the Cardinal, takes an opportunity, on occasion of his death, to make the following observation:—"We cannot refrain from combating the opinion, which supposes prodigious abilities, and a genius almost divine, in those who have governed empires with some degree of success. It is not a superior penetration that makes statesmen, it is their character. All men, how inconsiderable soever their share of sense may be, see their interest nearly alike. A citizen of Bern or Amsterdam, in this respect, is equal to Sejanus, Ximenes, Buckingham, Richelieu, or Mazarine, but our conduct and our enterprises depend absolutely on our natural dispositions, and our success depends upon fortune."

Age of Louis XIV.

CHARLES SECOND.

The person given to us by Monk was a man without any sense of his duty as a prince—without any regard to the dignity of his crown—without any love to his people—dissolute, false, venal, and destitute of any positive good quality whatever, except a pleasant temper, and the manners of a gentleman.—Burke.

NELL GWYN.

Of the early part of Nell's life, little is known but what may be collected from the lampoons of the times; in which it is said that she was born in a night cellar, sold fish about the streets, rambled from tavern to tavern, entertaining the company after dinner and supper with songs. Other accounts say she was born in the cellar in the coal-yard in Drury Lane, and that she was first taken notice of when selling oranges in the play-house. She belonged to the king's company at Drury Lane, and, according to Downes, was received as an actress a few years after that house was opened, in 1663. Bishop Burnet speaks of her in these terms:—"Gwyn, the indiscreetest and wildest creature that ever was in a court, continued to the end of the king's life, in great favour, and was maintained at vast expense. The Duke of Buckingham told me that when she was first brought to the king, she asked only a maintenance of 500*l.* a year, and the king refused it. But when he told me this about four years after, he said she had got of the king above sixty thousand pounds. She acted all persons in so lively a manner, and was such a constant diversion to the king, that even a new mistress could not drive her away."—History of his own times.

Mrs. Gwyn is thus noticed in one of Madame Sevigne's letters:—"Mademoiselle de Kerouaille, (Dutchess of Portsmouth) has not been disappointed in any thing she proposed. She desired to be mistress to the king, and she is so. She has a son, who has been acknowledged and presented with two duchies. She amasses treasure and makes herself feared and respected by as many as she can. But she did not foresee that she would find a young actress in her way, whom the king dotes on; and she has it not in her power to withdraw him from her. He divides his care and his time between these two. The actress is as haughty as Mademoiselle. She insults her, she makes grimaces at her, she attacks her, she frequently steals the king from her, and boasts whenever he gives her the preference. She is young, indiscreet, confident, wild, and of an agreeable humour; she sings, she dances, she acts her part with a good grace. She has a son by the king, and hopes to have him acknowledged. As to Mademoiselle, she reasons thus:—"The Duchess," says she, "pretends to be a person of quality; she says she is related to the best families in France; whenever any person of distinction dies, she puts herself in mourning. If she be a lady of such quality, why does she demean herself to be a courtesan? She ought to die with shame. As for me it is my profession; I do not pretend to any thing better. I pretend the king ought to acknowledge his son and I am well assured he will, for he loves me, at least, as well as his Portsmouth." This creature gets the upper hand and embarrasses and discountenances the Duchess extremely."—Letter 92.

Mr. Pennant says:—"She resided at her house in what was then called Pall-mall. It is the first good one on the left hand of St. James's Square, as we enter from Pall-mall. The back room on the ground floor was (within memory) entirely of looking glass, as was said to have been the ceiling."—London, p. 101.

At this house she died in the year 1691, and was pompously interred in the parish church of St. Martins-in-the-Fields; Dr. Tenneson, then vicar, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, preaching her funeral sermon. Cibber says Nell died a great penitent, "in all the contrite symptoms of Christian sincerity."

SIR PETER LELY

Was born in Westphalia 1617, and came to England in 1641. Walpole observes, "If Vardyck's portraits are often tame and spiritless, at least they are natural; his laboured draperies flow with ease, and not a fold but is placed with propriety. Lely supplied the want of taste with clinquant, his nymphs trail fringes and embroidery through meadows of purling streams. Add that Vandyck's habits are those of the times; Lely's a kind of fantastic night-gown fastened with a pin. The latter was, in truth, the ladies' painter; and whether the age was improved in beauty or in flattery, Lely's women are certainly much handsomer than those of Vandyck. They please as much more as they evidently meant to please. He caught the reigning character, and —On the animated canvass stole

The sleepy eye, that spoke the melting soul.

I do not know whether, even in softness of the flesh, he did not excel his predecessor. The Beauties of Windsor are the Court of Paphos, and ought to be engraved for the memoirs of its charming biographer, Count Hamilton."—Anecdotes of Painting.

LETTERS.

Agreeable trifling—or what the French call badinage—is accounted among the merits of letter-writers. Here are a few examples.

A letter of introduction, (Madame Sevigné to her daughter.)

"Voila Monsieur Magaloti—who is setting out for Provence, and whose desires I willingly gratify with a letter of introduction; knowing you will be glad to see a man of merit, who will speak you both French and Italian, a man whose amiable qualities are extolled by the whole court—a man, in a word, who carries you two pair of shoes from Georget."

The ladies have had very amiable rivals in their special province, among the opposite sex. An example of Horace Walpole.

"Two days ago, about four o'clock in the afternoon, and about an hour after dinner; from all which you may conclude we dine at two o'clock—as we were picking our teeth round a littered table, and in a crumby room, Gray in an undress, Mr. Conway in a morning gray coat, and I in a trim white night gown, and slippers, very much out of order, with a very little cold—a message discomposed us all of a sudden, with a service to Mr. Walpole from Mr. More, and that, if he pleased, he would wait on him. We scuttled up stairs in great confusion, but with no other damage than the flinging down two or three glasses, and the dropping a slipper by the way. Having ordered the room to be cleansed out, and sent a very civil response to Mr. More, we began to consider who Mr. More should be. Is it Mr. More of Paris? No. Oh, 'tis Mr. More, my Lady Tenham's husband? No, it can't be. A Mr. More then that lives in the Halifax family? No. In short, after thinking of ten thousand more Mr. Mores, we concluded it could be never a one of them. By this time Mr. More arrives; but such a Mr. More! a young gentleman out of the wilds of Ireland, who has never been in England, but has got all the ordinary language of that kingdom; has been two years at Paris, where he dined at an ordinary with the refugee Irish, and learnt fortifications, which he does not understand at all, and which yet is the only thing he knows. In short he is a young swain of very uncouth phrase, inarticulate speech, and no ideas."—H. Walpole to Rich. West.

From Lord Byron to Mr. Moore.

As I wish the soul of the late Antoine Gallani to rest in peace, (you will have read his death published by himself in his own newspaper,) you are requested particularly, to inform his children and heirs that of their "Literary Gazette," to which I subscribed more than two months ago, I have only received one number, notwithstanding I have written to them repeatedly. If they have no regard for me, a subscriber, they ought to have some for their deceased parent, who is undoubtedly no better off in his present residence for their neglect. If not, let me have my francs, they were paid by Missiaglia the Venetian bookseller. You may also hint to them that when a gentleman writes a letter, it is usual to send an answer. If not, I shall make them "a speech," which shall comprise an eulogy of the deceased.

The name of Captain Morrice, so famous amongst the wits of George Third's time, is, we believe, but little known to many of the readers of our own. He was the companion of such men as Fox, Sheridan, Curran, The Prince of Wales, &c. &c., and was not inferior to any of them, either as a wit or a conversationist—as a lyric poet he, perhaps, surpassed them all, and they all occasionally tried their hands at this species of composition. We do not remember anything of Sheridan's so fine as the following singularly beautiful Anacreontic.

ANACREONTIC SONG.—By CAPTAIN MORRICE.

For which he received the prize of the Gold Cup from the Harmonic Society.

Come, thou soul-reviving cup,
And try thy healing art;
Light the Fancy's visions—
And warm my wasted heart.
Touch with glowing tints of bliss,
Mem'ry's fading dream;
Give me, while thy lip I kiss,
The heaven that's in thy stream!

In thy fount the Lyric Muse
Ever dipp'd her wing,
Anacreon fed upon thy dew,
And Horace drained thy spring!
I, too, the humblest of the train,
There may spirit find,
Freshen there my languid brain—
And store my vacant mind!

When, blest cup, thy fires divine
Pierce thro' Time's dark reign,
All the joys that once were mine,
I snatch from Death again;

And, tho' oft fond anguish rise
O'er my melting mind,
Hope still starts to sorrow's eyes—
And drinks the tear behind!

Ne'er, sweet cup, was votary blest
More thro' life than me;
And that life, with grateful breast,
Thou see'st I give to thee!
'Midst thy rose-wreath'd nymphs I pass
Mirth's sweet hours away;
Pleased while Time runs thro' the glass
To Fancy's brighter day!

Then, magic cup, again for me
Thy power creative try;
Again let hopeful Fancy see
A heaven in beauty's eye!
Oh, lift my lighted heart away
On Pleasure's downy wing,
And let me taste that bliss to-day,
To-morrow may not bring.

THE LUNGS OF LONDON.

St. JAMES'S PARK—Continued.

Let us, however, leave this disagreeable topic, and pursue our ramble through the park.

The canal, you will observe, although somewhat diversified in outline, still retains, in shape, the memory of what it was, and is little more at present than a canal ornamented in some degree. From the esplanade, facing the palace, looking down the whole length of the canal, is one of the best points of view in this park, embracing the Horse-Guards, the State Paper Office, Lady Dover's house. Behind these, the Banqueting House is partly visible; from hence, also, we have a favourable view of the grounds, which are not unpleasantly laid out, considering that the artist was the afore-mentioned royal architect, Mistaire Hash, or Nash, of gingerbread celebrity. The gardens are not badly designed, although the late capability Brown could have done them vastly better—this park being precisely the field for his wondrous creative faculty. Passing in front of the so-called triumphal arch, which seems intended to exhibit the dingy, dark, discoloured palace in the rear to the greatest disadvantage, we have a view down the long umbrageous vista of the Mall: and here let us repose ourselves upon one of these seats—the resting places of the destitute in London. Upon these seats the unemployed artisan, the dismissed clerk, and the footman out of place, may be seen sleeping away the idle hours in forgetfulness of their misfortunes. Here the "swell cove out of luck," whose seedy habiliments exclude him from the penetralia of the enclosure, lounges languidly cocking his worn-out gossamer on one side his head with a jaunty air, and affectedly tapping his vamped-up boot with a pinchbeck-headed cane; here supernumerary penny-a-liners take the air, until Providence sends, of his goodness, some more substantial beverage; here disappointed magazine-writers retire to read again their rejected article, and to curse the stupid editor who would not see its merit; here Steele contrived to extract the matter of many a future Tattler, from the contemplation of his fellows in misfortune; and here, too, poor amiable Goldsmith, when without a dinner, or the means of procuring one, used to take a turn, and "mend his appetite by a walk in the park."

That poor young fellow in the fustian shooting-jacket and leggins, asleep on the further extremity of our bench, is a countryman who came to London for work, and cannot get it. His money is done, and it is more than probable he has not tasted food to-day: to-morrow he will go over into Westminster and enlist for a soldier. You see a poor girl on the opposite bench—one of that class as truly as pathetically called unfortunate—she is, you observe, in tatters, and the paint has been washed off her cheeks with tears. She is an unfortunate among unfortunates. Where is her professional swagger now?—where her inviting leer and flippant toss of the head?—where the tawdry finery purchased with the wages of her shame? The roseate hue of health has long faded from her cheek, and the expression of that once happy face is now the expression of rooted and inextricable sorrow. Perhaps her thoughts have turned to her country friends and her rural home—to that home, her desertion of which, it may be, has brought the gray hairs of her parents with sorrow to the grave—she is hungry, too; for I am long enough acquainted with this place to distinguish the physiognomy of hunger. What does she say?—half a penny roll has been her food since this time yesterday!

Gracious eternal God! could the seducers of female innocence come hither, and behold their triumph in a spectacle like this! would they not hide their guilty and guilt-creating heads from the lightning, and hear, in every thunder-peal, the judgment of an avenging God?

Humane and gentle reader, when you come this way, let the poor unfortunate have a shilling. The air will do you good, the exercise will do you good, and the charity will do you good. You will not, believe me, dine less heartily for having contributed a mite to the poor victim of profligacy, who, without your timely assistance, had not dined at all.

We are now on the parade: but there is nothing here save a parcel of lounging life-guardsmen, and a dozen or so of recruiting sergeants. The hour of guard-mounting (ten o'clock in the morning) is long past, and "all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," has marched back peacefully to its barracks on the other side of the park. In the absence of anything better to occupy our attention, we will turn our backs upon the parade, the great gun, and the greater mortar, together with the lounging life-guardsmen and recruiting sergeants, and indulge ourselves with a look at the ducks.

Who would have supposed that DUCK ISLAND, over the way there, where you see that desolate-looking heron perched upon one leg, was once a royal government, like the island of Barataria, whereof his Excellency Don Sancho Panza was whilome governor and commander in chief? Nay, now, don't laugh, for the thing is a fact, and very well attested. We are informed by the accurate Mr. Pennant, in his Survey of London, that "Duck Island was erected, in the time of King Charles II. into a government, and had a salary annexed to the office in favour of M. St. EVERMOND, who was the first, and perhaps the last governor."

Only think of a memorial on behalf of the widgown addressed to his Excellency M. St. EVERMOND, Lord-lieutenant General and General Governor of DUCK ISLAND and its dependencies: or a paragraph in the London Mercury, to the effect "that his gracious Majesty, Charles II. attended by the Right Honourable, the Earl of Rochester, and Mr. Killigrew, the joker, was graciously pleased to visit DUCK ISLAND, where his majesty was received by his excellency, the governor, with the customary honours, the swans being drawn up in review order for the inspecmy blessed Jesus." He then mentioned what clothes he should wish to wear, desiring he might have a shirt more than ordinary, lest the coldness of the day might make him tremble, which, he added, would be interpreted by his enemies into fear. "I do not dread death," he said. "Death is not terrible to me. I bless my God, I am prepared."

He then spent a short time in naming the few legacies which were left him to bequeath. To Prince Charles he sent his Bible, on the margin of which were his private remarks and annotations. He desired that he would read it often and with great care; adding that in affliction he would find it to be his surest friend; to the Duke of York he sent a curious ring, which he had constantly been in the habit of wearing; to the Princess Elizabeth, Andrew's Sermons, Archbishop Laud against Fisher the Jesuit, and Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity; to the Duke of Gloucester, King James's Works, and Hammond's Practical Catechism; to Cassandra to the Earl of Lindsey; and his gold watch to the Duchess of Richmond, the daughter of his early favourite, the Duke of Buckingham.

By this time the bishop had arrived, and the king retired with him to prayer. After the prayers of the church had been gone through, the bishop read the twenty-seventh chapter of St. Matthew, which describes the passion of our Saviour. The king applied the passage to his present condition, and thanked the bishop for the selection. He was much surprised and gratified when he was informed that it was, in fact, the chapter set apart in the calendar for the lesson of the day.

While he was still at his devotions, Colonel Hacker knocked at the door. He appeared much agitated, and informed the king it was time to set off for Whitehall. Charles told him he would come presently, and shortly afterwards, taking the bishop by the hand, and bidding Herbert bring with him his silver clock, with a cheerful countenance he proposed to depart. As he passed through the garden of St. James's into the park, he inquired of Herbert the hour of the day, and afterwards bade him keep the clock for his sake.

It was ten o'clock when the king came forth. On each side of him was arranged a line of soldiers, and before and behind him were a guard of halberdiers, their drums beating and colours flying. The king passed to the scaffold, through St. James's Park, on foot. On his right hand was Bishop Juxon, and on his left Colonel Tomlinson, both bareheaded, with whom he frequently conversed during their walk through the park. There is a tradition that he pointed out a tree not far from the entrance to Spring Gardens, (close to the spot which is now a well-known station for cows,) which he said had been planted by his brother Henry. During his walk to the scaffold, a ruffianly fanatic officer inquired of him, with insulting barbarity, if it were true that he had been cognisant of his father's murder. Another stern republican, "a mean citizen," as he is styled by Fuller, was perceived to remain close by his side, and keep his eyes constantly fixed on the king, with an expression of particular malignity.—Charles merely turned away his face: eventually, however, the man was unceremoniously pushed aside by the more feeling among his persecutors.

The guards marching at a slow pace, the king desired them to proceed faster. "I go," he said, "to strive for a heavenly crown, with less solicitude than I have formerly encouraged my soldiers to fight for an earthly one." However, the noise of the drums rendered conversation extremely difficult.

Passing along the famous gallery, which at that time ran across the street at Whitehall to the opposite part of the palace, the king was conducted to his usual bed-chamber. The scaffolding had only been commenced the preceding afternoon,* and not having been then completed, the delay thus afforded allowed him a considerable time for prayer. It was a cold and dismal day. Two or three dishes had been provided for his dinner, but having partaken of the sacrament, he declined this misplaced kindness: however, on its being represented to him how long he had fasted, that the weather was extremely bitter; and that, should the cold produce the least shivering, it would be maliciously interpreted by his enemies, he consented to partake of a piece of bread and a glass of claret. While he was engaged at his devotions with Bishop Juxon, Nye, and others of the puritan clergymen, knocked at the door of his apartment, and offered to assist in preparing him for his fate. But he told them they had so often prayed against him, they should never pray with him in his agony, though he should be grateful, he added, if they would remember him in their prayers. As soon as he had completed his devotions, "Now," he said, "let the rogues come; I have forgiven them, and am prepared for all I am to undergo." When Colonel Hacker gave the last signal at the door of the apartment, the bishop and Herbert fell on their knees weeping: the king gave them his hand to kiss, and as Juxon was an old man, he kindly assisted him to rise. To Colonel Tomlinson, who had shown him every attention in his power, he presented his gold tooth-pick case, requesting him to attend him to the last. Then, desiring the door to be opened, and telling Hacker he was prepared to follow him, he passed with a cheerful countenance, through an avenue of guards, to the scaffold.

CHAPTER X.

Considerable doubt has existed as to the exact spot on which Charles was beheaded. The scaffold unquestionably ran in front of the banqueting house, from the centre of that building to the end nearest to Charing Cross. In height it was level with the top of the lower windows. Immediately in the centre of the building, between the upper and lower windows, a passage had been broken in the wall, through which the unfortunate king passed. At a recent renovation of the banqueting house, this passage was plainly perceptible, a fact which must be considered as entirely settling the question at rest. For a space of about seven feet in height and four in breadth, the bricks presented a broken and jagged appearance, and the brickwork introduced was evidently of more modern date.

To return to the last moments of Charles. The scaffold had been covered with black cloth, and a coffin, lined with black velvet, was in readiness to receive his remains. In the platform itself had been fixed iron rings and staples, to which ropes had also been attached, by which it was intended to force the king to the block should he make the least attempt at resistance. The persons who attended him to the scaffold, besides Bishop Juxon, were two of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, Harrington and Herbert. The former afterwards suffered so much from the shock, that an illness ensued which nearly cost him his life. The king himself appeared cheerful, resigned, and happy. He merely requested of Colonel Hacker, to be careful that he was not put to unnecessary pain. Having put on his satin cap, he inquired of one of the two executioners, both of whom were masked, if his hair was in the way. The man requested him to push it under his cap. As he was doing so, with the assistance of the bishop and the executioner, he turned to the former; "I have a good cause," he said, "and a gracious God on my side."

*Hume says, quoting from Walker's History of Independency, that "the king slept soundly as usual, though the noise of workmen, employed in framing the scaffold, and other preparations for his execution resounded in his ears." This is more poetical than true. Charles had passed the previous night at St. James's, at the distance of nearly half a mile. Even had he slept at Whitehall, as his apartments were close to the water's side, and in a different direction, he could scarcely have been disturbed by the noise.

The Bishop.—There is but one stage more; this stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one; but you may consider it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

The King.—I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the world.

The Bishop.—You are exchanged from a temporal to an eternal crown; a good exchange.

Observing one of the persons, who had been admitted to the scaffold, accidentally touching the edge of the axe with his cloak, the king requested him to be careful. Then again inquiring of the executioner, "is my hair well?" he took off his cloak and George, and delivering the latter to the bishop, exclaimed significantly "remember." To the executioner he said, "I shall say but short prayers, and when I thrust out my hands—" Looking at the block, he said, "you must set it fast." The executioner replied it was fast. The king remarked it might have been higher. Being told it could not have been higher, he said, "when I put out my hands this way, then—"

In the mean time, having divested himself of his cloak and doublet, and being in his waistcoat, he again put on his cloak. Then, lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, and repeating a few words to himself which were inaudible to the bystanders, he knelt down and laid his neck on the block. The executioner stooping to put his hair under his cap, the king thinking he was about to strike, bid him wait for the sign. After a short pause he stretched out his hands, and the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body. The head was immediately lifted up by the other headsman and exhibited to the people. "Behold," he exclaimed, "the head of a traitor."*

Thus, on the 30th of January, 1649, at the age of forty-nine, died King Charles. The dismal groan, which rose at the moment of his decapitation from the dense populace around, was never forgotten by those who heard it. Certainly, by the vast majority of the people of England, the execution of Charles was regarded as an atrocious and barbarous murder. Philip Henry, the famous divine, was a witness of the memorable scene. "He used to mention," writes his son, "that at the instant when the blow was given, there was such a dismal universal groan among the thousands of people that were within sight, as it were with one consent, as he never heard before and desired he might never hear the like again." This fact is corroborated by the testimony of an aged person, one Margaret Coe, who died in 1730, at the age of one hundred and three. She saw the executioner hold up the head, and well "remembered the dismal groan which was made by the vast multitude of spectators when the fatal blow was given."* Immediately after the axe fell, a party of horse rode rapidly from Charing Cross to King street, and another from King street to Charing Cross, with the object of dispersing the people, or more probably, of dissipating their gloomy thoughts.

*In the British Museum is preserved a curious single folio sheet, printed at Frankfurt shortly after King Charles's death, in which there is a print descriptive of his execution, surmounted by medallion heads of Charles, Cromwell, and Fairfax. The only persons represented to be on the scaffold, besides Charles and the two executioners, who are in masks, are Bishop Juxon, and Colonel Tomlinson and Hacker. There is a Latin motto from Horace, Cram. lib. i. ode 4.

The body of Charles having been placed in the coffin prepared for it, was conveyed by Bishop Juxon and Herbert to the back-stairs at Whitehall, to be embalmed. In their way back they encountered Cromwell, who informed them that orders would be speedily issued for the burial. The regicide came shortly afterwards to gaze upon the corpse of his victim. He remarked on the appearance of health and promise of longevity which it exhibited. It is even said that he attempted to fasten a suspicion that Charles was suffering under a disgraceful disease at the time of his death, but that the praiseworthy firmness of a physician who attended the opening of the body, destroyed the validity of the scandal. This physician was certainly not the same practitioner who was employed to embalm the body and to sew on the head. That person was one Thomas Tropham, surgeon to Fairfax, and a bachelor of physic in the University of Oxford. There were many spectators of the ceremony. At its completion this facetious ruffian remarked, that he had been sewing on the head of a goose.

No monarch ever departed this life more beloved and lamented by his own party than did the unfortunate Charles. They felt as if a near and dear friend had been snatched from their sight. Arch-

* Sir Edward Peyton, in addressing his work the Divine Catastrophe, to the Commons of England, has the following remarkable passage:—"I thrice humbly desire your patronage, especially finding by experience the composition and style of this present narrative will incur the displeasure and hatred of most of this state." This admission coming from a fifth monarchy man, as Anthony Wood styles Peyton, and addressed to the heads of his own party, is certainly of some weight. I deed, whatever might have been the general feeling against the political character and conduct of Charles, there can be no doubt that his public death upon the scaffold was regarded by nine tenths of the people as a bloody and atrocious act. Among the thousands who gazed upon that scene of violence and ferocity, there was, perhaps, scarcely a single bystander in whose breast all feelings of pity were so entirely stifled, as not to be excited by so awful a transition from the height of human greatness to the extreme of human misery. It is only in the worst of human bosoms that there exists the impulse to injure still further the being whom we have humbled and rendered powerless. Among the actors or spectators of the execution of Charles, there may have been some to whom, from motives of ambition, or a persuasion of its political expediency, that scene may not have been unpalatable; but these persons were neither many in number, nor were they, generally speaking, among the more respectable of their detested party.

bishop Usher, who witnessed the death of his master from the roof of Wallingford House, (the site of the present Admiralty,) was carried away fainting; and Dr. Fell, Dean of Christ Church, died, it is said, of grief, when the tidings were brought to him. The majority of the people of England expressed their sorrow as loudly as they felt it deeply. All who were able to approach the body dipped their handkerchiefs and staves in his blood; the block was cut into small pieces; and large sums of money were offered for a lock of his hair, or a few grains of the sand which had been discoloured by his blood. It seems that in addition to the common interest attached to such relics, it was supposed they would be efficacious in curing the evil. But even his enemies, on more than one occasion, paid unexpected homage to his memory. Perhaps the most singular is the tribute of the regicide Henry Martin. "If we are to have a king," he said in the House of Commons, "I would as soon have the last gentleman as any sovereign on record." But the fine verses of Andrew Marvel, another foe to monarchy, must not be omitted,—

While round the armed bands
Did clasp their bloody hands,
He nothing common did or mean,
After that memorable scene;
But with his keener eye
The axe's edge did try,
Nor called the gods, with vulgar spite,
To vindicate his helpless right,
But bowed his comely head
Down, as upon a bed.

The heroic Marquis of Montrose is said to have written his master's epitaph with the point of his sword. The lines attributed to him, and rendered thus remarkable, the author had previously imagined to be the production of John Cleveland, more especially as they are printed among his works, and as the death of the martyred king is a favourite subject of his muse. Bishop Guthrie, however, who was likely to have the best information on the subject, inserts them in his Memoirs as the production of the marquis, without in the least questioning their authenticity. The lines are as follow:—

Great, good, and just! could I but rate
My griefs, and thy too rigid fate;
I'd weep the world to such a strain,
As it should deluge once again;
But since thy loud-tongued blood demands supplies,
More from Briareus' hands than Argus' eyes;
I'll sing thy obsequies with trumpet sounds,
And write thy epitaph with blood and wounds.

There has existed much doubt and discussion respecting the identity of the king's executioner. Several persons have been named for the unenviable honour, and sufficient materials might be collected on the subject to form a curious and entertaining treatise. However, after every attention to the evidence, (and some interesting matter has recently been brought to light,) there seems to be no doubt that it was Richard Brandon, the common executioner, who had previously beheaded the Earl of Strafford. This man eventually died in great agony of mind, and was carried to the grave amid the execrations of the populace.

The royal corpse, having been embalmed and placed in a leaden coffin, was conveyed to St. James's Palace. The usurping authorities refused permission to bury it in Henry the Seventh's Chapel, though at the same time, they allowed five hundred pounds to defray the expenses of the interment. The spot eventually agreed upon by both parties was Windsor. Thither the melancholy cavalcade proceeded; the body being carried in a hearse covered with black velvet, and drawn by six horses. It was followed by four mourning coaches, containing several of the most faithful servants of the deceased monarch, who hastened to pay the last tribute to his memory. The first resting-place was the Dean's house at Windsor: the room was covered with black, and the coffin surrounded with lights. From thence the body was removed to the king's usual bed-chamber in the castle.

The persons to whom the performance of the royal obsequies was intrusted were, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, Lord Southampton, Lord Lindsay, the Bishop of London, Herbert, and Mildmay. They had all been devoted servants of their late master. Their first step was to proceed to St. George's Chapel, to select a proper resting-place for his remains. That beautiful and interesting building was at this period, internally, a mass of ruins. The ancient inscriptions, the architectural ornaments, the stalls and banners of the Knights of the Garter, had been torn and uprooted by the hands of republicanism, and lay strewed in melancholy devastation on the floor. It was found impossible to distinguish the tomb of a monarch from the grave of a verger. At last, one of the noblemen present, happening to strike the pavement with his staff, perceived by the hollow sound that there was a vault beneath. The stones and earth having been removed, they came to two coffins, which proved to be those of King Henry the Eighth and Queen Jane Seymour. Though considerably more than a century had elapsed since their interment, the velvet palls which covered their coffins were still fresh. In this vault over against the eleventh stall on the sovereign's side, it was decided to inter the body of King Charles.

Accordingly, on the 7th of February, the royal remains, having been carried from the king's bed-chamber into St. George's Hall, were thence borne to the chapel. In addition to those to whom the solemnisation of the funeral had been originally entrusted, Colonel Whichcot, the governor of the castle, and several of his officers, attended the ceremony. The snow fell thick upon the velvet pall, and when it entered the chapel the coffin was perfectly white, the "colour of innocence." Bishop Juxon stood ready at the head of the vault, with the book of Common Prayer in his hand. He was preparing to read the burial service, according to the rites of the Church of England, when he was stopped by the governor. "The book of Common Prayer," said the bigoted soldier, "had been put down by authority, and should not be used in any garrison where he commanded." The coffin was lowered amid the tears and prayers of the faithful followers of the unfortunate monarch. On its leaden surface was inscribed, in capital letters—

A mysterious doubt existed for many years respecting the real burial-place of King Charles. By many it was believed that he lay in the sand at Whitehall, and that the coffin, on which was inscribed his name, merely contained stones and rubbish.* Another report was raised by the old

* Aubrey says, "I well remember it was frequently and soberly affirmed by officers of arms and grantees, that the body of King Charles the First was Cromwellites, at the Restoration, that the bodies of Charles and Cromwell had been made to change coffins, and that in reality it was the corpse of the king, instead of his murderer, which had been exposed at Tyburn, and which was afterwards buried beneath the gallows. There was one circumstance which attached some weight to these idle surmises. At the Restoration, the Parliament voted the large sum of seventy thousand pounds towards a public funeral for the late king, and for the purpose of erecting a grateful and a lasting monument to his memory. To the astonishment of all men, it was reported that his remains could nowhere be discovered, although many persons were still alive who could have pointed out the spot.

But all doubts have been set at rest in our times, by the opening of King Charles's coffin in 1813, in the presence of George the Fourth, then Prince of Wales. The interesting account of Sir Henry Hallford is well known. "On removing the pall, a plain leaden coffin, with no appearance of ever having been enclosed in wood, and bearing an inscription, 'King Charles, 1648.' in large legible characters, on a scroll of lead encircling it, immediately presented itself to the view. A square opening was then made in the upper part of the lid, of such dimensions as to admit a clear insight into its contents. These were an internal wooden coffin, very much decayed, and the body carefully wrapt up in cere-cloth, into the folds of which a quantity of unctuous or greasy matter, mixed with resin, as it seems, had been melted, so as to exclude, as effectually as possible, the external air. The coffin was completely full, and from the tenacity of the cere-cloth, great difficulty was experienced in detaching it successfully from the parts which it enveloped. Wherever the unctuous matter had insinuated itself, the separation of the cere-cloth was easy, and when it came off, a correct impression of the features to which it had been applied was observed in the unctuous substance. At length the whole face was disengaged from its covering. The complexion of the skin of it was dark and discoloured. The forehead and temples had lost little or nothing of their muscular substance; the cartilage of the nose was gone; but the left eye, in the first moment of exposure, was open and full, though it vanished almost immediately; and the pointed beard so characteristic of the period of the reign of King Charles, was perfect. The shape of the face was a long oval; many of the teeth remained; and the left ear, in consequence of the interposition of the unctuous matter between it and the cere-cloth, was found entire. When the head had been entirely disengaged from the attachments which confined it, it was found to be loose, and without any difficulty, was taken up and held to view. It was quite wet, and gave a greenish red tinge to paper and linen which touched it. The back part of the scalp was entirely perfect, and had a remarkably fresh appearance, nearly black. A portion of it which has been since cleaned and dried, is of a beautiful dark brown colour.* That privately put into the sand at Whitehall; and the coffin that was carried to Windsor and laid in King Henry the Eighth's vault, was filled with rubbish and brick-bats. Sir Fabian Phillips, jurisconsultus, who adventured his life before the king's trial by printing, assures me that the king's coffin cost but six shillings: a plain deal coffin."

* This is singular; it being an unquestionable fact that the king's hair was almost gray, long previous to his trial.

of the beard was a redder brown. On the back of the head the hair was not more than an inch in length, and had been probably cut so short for the convenience of the executioner, or perhaps, by the piety of friends soon after death, in order to furnish memorials of the unhappy king. On holding up the head, to examine the place of separation from the body, the muscles of the neck had evidently retracted themselves considerably; and the fourth cervical vertebra was found to be cut through its substance transversely, leaving the surfaces of the divided portions perfectly smooth and even; an appearance which could have been produced only by a heavy blow inflicted with a very sharp instrument and which furnished the last proof wanting to identify King Charles the First."

By his queen, Henrietta Maria, the king had eight children. Besides those, whose memoirs will be hereafter introduced, he had a son named Charles, his first-born, who survived the rite of baptism but a few hours. The infant was born at Greenwich in 1629; its birth having been accelerated by a fright suffered by the queen. It is remarkable that the Roman Catholic priests of the queen's household were in anxious expectation of its birth, trusting, by an immediate and secret baptism, to smuggle it into their own church; Charles, however, was on the watch, and directed his chaplain, Dr. Webbe, who was in attendance, to baptise it according to the forms of the Church of England. The infant was buried at Westminster. Another of the King's children was Catherine, his fourth daughter, whose career was equally brief. This child, as were most of the offspring of Charles, was born at Whitehall. It has been remarked as curious, that their names, with only one exception, are omitted in the parish registry of St. Martin's. The king invariably sent a sum of money, by some member of his household, in order to ensure the usual entry. These persons, it is said, deceived his majesty, and appropriated the money to their own use.

HENRIETTA MARIA.

The character of Henrietta Maria is seldom a favourite one with our historians. Generally speaking, she is described as turbulent, wanton, and insincere; implacable in her resentments; rash in her resolves; precipitating her husband into the most dangerous excesses, and entertaining the most lofty conceptions of the royal prerogative. That the conduct of Henrietta was not felicitous; that she was bigoted in religion, and headstrong in her passions, and that her capacity was far from extensive, it would be difficult to deny; and yet much that has been said to her disadvantage may be traced to party bitterness and the prejudice of faction. To the republicans, the exalted station which she occupied, and the religion which she professed, naturally rendered her an object of suspicion and dislike; while the royalists, taking advantage of her supposed influence over the king, attributed to her indifferent counsels whatever in their master's conduct they would otherwise have found difficult to defend.

Moreover, the manners of the volatile Frenchwoman were little suited to the people among whom she came to reside. Her zealous and undisguised partiality for the religion and manners of her own country; her love of admiration; her fondness for music, dancing, and all the frivolities to which her sex are privileged, were converted, by the jaundiced eye of puritanism, into the most heinous sins. After all, Henrietta was neither deficient in private virtues nor agreeable qualities. Her disposition was generous when not provoked; her manners were playful and animated; she was fearless in danger; an affectionate mother, and an indulgent mistress. Her attachment to the ruined fortunes of her husband can never be spoken of without praise. The prominent position which she occupied, in the political troubles of the period, may be ascribed rather to the unfortunate circumstances in which she was placed, than to personal ambition, or a mere love of intrigue. Had she lived in peaceable times, or, indeed, had Buckingham survived to guide the counsels of his master, Henrietta, in all probability, would have been merely remembered for the gaiety of her manners, and the lustre of her charms.

Henrietta Maria, youngest daughter of Henry the Great, of France, and sister of Louis the Thirteenth, was born 28th November, 1609. Of her childhood little is known; indeed, at the period of her marriage with Charles, she had scarcely completed her sixteenth year. In 1624, Lord Kensington, afterwards Earl of Holland, had been despatched to Paris, in order to sound the feelings of the French court, with regard to the match. He found the young princess greatly prepossessed in favour of her future husband. The account of the prince's journey into Spain appears to have strongly influenced her imagination. When the tale of his adventures was first related to her, she observed, "He might have found a wife much nearer, and have saved himself much trouble." Indeed, with all the romance of a young girl, she appears to have fancied herself in love with Charles, long before they actually met.

Lord Kensington, unwilling to risk the disgrace of a refusal, proceeded cautiously in his delicate mission. As regarded Henrietta herself, she took no pains to disguise her partiality for the prince. The state of her feelings, however, will be best discovered by the following romantic incident, which is thus agreeably related by Lord Kensington in one of his letters to Charles: "I cannot," he says, "but make you continual repetitions of the value you have here, to be (as justly we know you), the most complete young prince and person in the world. This reputation has begotten in the sweet princess, Madame, so infinite an affection to your fame, as she could not contain herself from a passionate desiring to see your picture, the shadow of that person so honoured, and knowing not by what means to compass it, it being worn about my neck; for though others, as the queen and princesses, would open it and consider it, the which ever brought forth admiration from them, yet durst not this poor young lady look any otherwise on it than afar off, whose heart was nearer unto it than any of the others who did most gaze upon it. But at the last, rather than want that sight, the which she was so impatient of, she desired the gentlewoman of the house where I am lodged, that had been her servant, to borrow of me the picture, in all the secrecy that may be, and to bring it unto her, saying, she could not but want that curiosity, as well as others, towards a person of his infinite reputation. As soon as she saw the party that brought it, she retired into her cabinet, calling only her in; where she opened the picture in such haste as showed a true picture of her passion, blushing in the instant at her own guiltiness. She kept it an hour in her hands, and when she returned it, she gave it many praises of your person. Sir, this is a business so fit for your secrecy, as I know it shall never go farther than unto the king your father, my lord Duke of Buckingham, and my lord of Carlisle's knowledge." Shortly afterwards, when Henrietta received two letters, one from King James, and the other from her lover, she placed the former in her cabinet, and the latter in her bosom. James was much pleased when the anecdote was related to him;—"It was an omen," he said, "that she would preserve his name in her memory, and Charles in her heart."

One would have thought the young, the graceful, and gallant Earl of Holland, (for such he was now created,) would have been a dangerous mediator between two lovers who had never met. But Holland, though afterwards some suspicion became attached to his intercourse with Henrietta, at this period loved his master. It was about the same time that Count Soissons declared openly and boldly at the Louvre, that he had been contracted to the princess before several witnesses, and even went so far as to assert that she was his lawful bride. Holland instantly challenged him to single combat, but Soissons refused to meet him. "The court of France," he said, "was too powerful, to allow him to maintain the truth with his sword."

If it be presumed that the feelings of Charles were equally romantic with those of his future bride, the glowing descriptions which Lord Holland transmitted of her accomplishments were well calculated to increase his flame. In a letter dated 26th February, he thus writes to the prince: "You will find a lady of as much loveliness and sweetness to deserve your affection, as any creature under heaven can do. And sir, by all her fashions since my being here, and by what I hear from the ladies, it is most visible to me, her infinite value, and respect unto you. Sir, I say not this to betray your belief, but from a true observation and knowledge of this to be so; I tell you this, and must somewhat more, in way of admiration of the person of Madame; for the impressions I had of her were but ordinary, but the amazement extraordinary, to find her, as I protest to God I did, the sweetest creature in France. Her growth is very little short of her age, and her wisdom infinitely beyond it. I heard her discourse with her mother, and the ladies about her, with extraordinary discretion and quickness. She dances, the which I am a witness of, as well as ever I saw any creature. They say she sings most sweetly: I am sure she looks so." In another letter Lord Holland writes: "I found it true, that neither her master, Bayle, nor any man or woman in France, or in the world, sings so admirably as she. Sir, it is beyond imagination; that is all that I can say of it."

The articles of marriage between Charles and Henrietta were signed by James on the 11th of May, 1624, and by the French king on the 14th of August following. The treaty was finally ratified at Paris, by the Earls of Carlisle and Holland, on the 18th of March, 1625. At the beginning of May, the necessary dispensation was received from Rome, when Cardinal Richieu performed the espousals, the Duke de Chevereux appearing as proxy for Charles.

The ceremony was magnificent in the extreme. On the day appointed, the 11th of May, the royal bride was conducted by the king, the queen, and a long train of courtiers, to the house of the Archbishop of Paris, where she was formally attired by her ladies in the nuptial robes. From hence they proceeded to a magnificent theatre, erected in front of the Cathedral of Notre-Dame. The Duke de Chevereux was dressed in a black robe, lined with cloth of gold, and sparkling with diamonds. On each side he was supported by the Earls of Carlisle and Holland, clad in beaten silver. Standing under a gorgeous canopy, the King of France, assisted by his brother, consigned their sister to the Duke de Chevereux, as the representative of King Charles. The marriage having been solemnised according to the ceremonies of the Romish church, the procession advanced in the same order to the cathedral, the Duke de Chevereux taking precedence of the King of France. After the celebration of mass, from which the English earls had absented themselves on account of their religious scruples, the procession returned to the house of the archbishop, where a splendid banquet had been presented. The king sat under a canopy in the centre of the table, Henrietta being placed on his left hand, and the queen-mother on his right. Next to Henrietta sat the Duke de Chevereux, and the Earls of Carlisle and Holland by the side of the duke.

On the 24th of May, the Duke of Buckingham, attended by the Earl of Montgomery, and others of the English nobility, arrived at Paris, for the purpose of conducting Henrietta to England. During the seven days which they remained in the French capital, nothing could exceed the splendour of the entertainments which were provided for them, or the magnificence of the public rejoicings. Bonfires illuminated the streets; the cannon roared on the walls, and the prison doors were opened; while the nobility of Paris vied with each other in the costliness of their feasts; a rivalry in which the celebrated Richieu is said to have carried off the palm.

Henrietta bid farewell to Paris on the 2d of June, 1625. It is asserted in a letter of the period, that she was arrested at Amiens by a legate from the pope, who commanded her to perform a penance of either sixteen or twenty-six days, as an atonement for uniting herself to a heretic prince, or as another writer informs us, for having married Charles without a dispensation. Henrietta, it is said, instantly wrote to Charles, who was anxiously expecting her at Canterbury, acquainting him with the cause of her delay. His answer was decisive; he informed her that if she did not immediately resume her journey, he would return to London without her. The young queen, however unwillingly, continued her progress, and the pope was defrauded of his expected triumph. However, as his holiness had already given his consent to the marriage, the story is in all probability a fabrication.

At Boulogne she found the Duchess of Buckingham and an English fleet in readiness to receive her. She set sail on the 12th of June, and after an uncomfortable passage of twenty-four hours arrived at Dover. During this short voyage she had suffered so much from sea-sickness, that it was deemed necessary to convey her into the town in a litter, and thence to apartments prepared for her in the castle. The news of her arrival was carried to the king at Canterbury in an hour and six minutes. Charles was hastening to meet his young bride, when he received a communication from her, intimating how much she had suffered by her voyage, and requesting him to defer the interview till the following day.

The next morning, about ten o'clock, the king, attended by a suitable retinue, arrived at Dover. Henrietta was at her morning meal, and for various private reasons, was scarcely prepared for the interview; yet she instantly rose from table, and hurrying down stairs, fell on her knees before her husband, and taking his hand, kissed it affectionately. Charles instantly raised her, and "wrapping his arms around her, kissed her with many kisses." Her first words were those of reverence and affection:—"Sire, Je suis venue en ce pais de votre Majesté pour être unie et commandée a vous." Charles seemed surprised to find her taller than he had expected, and cast his eyes upon her feet, as if suspecting that she had made use of artificial means to improve her stature. Henrietta, with all her native quickness, perceived what was passing in the king's mind. She immediately raised one of her feet, and pointed to the shoe: "Sir," she said, "I stand upon mine own feet. I have no helps of art. Thus high I am, and am neither higher nor lower." Some tears fell from her eyes, but Charles kissed them away, telling her playfully "he should not fail doing so, so long as she continued weeping." He told her "she had not fallen into a land of strangers, and that she might be ever satisfied of his tenderness and esteem."

After a short period, the bystanders were required to withdraw, and the royal lovers remained an hour in private. The first request of Henrietta must have been highly gratifying to her husband. "She trusted," she said, "that should she ever do any thing to offend him, he would himself tell her of her fault, instead of employing a third person." Charles readily promised a compliance, and exacted the same stipulation from his bride.

Having prepared themselves for dinner, and come forth into the presence chamber, Henrietta presented her French servants, formally, and by name. Charles, having already dined, seated himself by the queen, and helped her to venison and pheasant with his own hand. Her confessor, who stood by her, solemnly reminded her that, being the eve of John the Baptist, it was a fast day of the church, and consequently that she must be cautious how she provoked scandal on the first day of her arrival. But at this period, at least, her husband had the ascendant of the pope and his penances, and Henrietta, to the great delight of her protestant subjects, ate heartily of the forbidden dishes.

After dinner the king and queen proceeded on horseback to Canterbury, where it was intended to consummate the marriage. On Barram Down they were received by a vast concourse of the nobility, of both sexes, who divided themselves into rows while their majesties passed on. The road had been strewed with roses and other flowers, by the loyal peasants of Kent, who rent the skies with their shouts and acclamations. "The ladies," writes Howell, "appeared like so many constellations, but methought that the country ladies outshined the courtiers."

The same night, having arrived at Canterbury and supper being over, the queen retired to rest. Charles followed shortly afterwards, being attended to the apartment by two of the lords of the bedchamber, whose duty it was to undress him. It appears that the king's first step was to secure the doors of the bedchamber (which were actually seven in number) with his own hand. He then undressed himself, and having excluded his two attendants, cautiously bolted the door. These particulars throw a curious light on the customs of the period; since it seems certain that not even the nuptial chamber of the sovereign was secured against the strange license and intrusive jocularity which were permitted by the less refined taste of our ancestors on the marriage night. It would seem, indeed, that it was only by stratagem that Charles was enabled to rid himself of his own attendants. "The next morning," we are told, "he was pleasant with the lords that he had beguiled them, and hath ever since been very jocular."

On the 16th of June, 1625, Charles arrived with his bride in the capital. They had entered the royal barge at Gravesend, from whence, attended by several of the barges of the nobility, they proceeded up the river in regal state. From London Bridge to Whitehall their procession resembled a triumph. Thousands of vessels crowded the Thames; every lighter and barge was filled with spectators, and the banks appeared a moving mass of population. The guns roared from the tower, as well as from the various ships in the neighbourhood; while the populace, notwithstanding that the plague raged around them, and the rain fell in torrents, vied with each other in the clamour of their gratulations. The king and queen were each dressed in green. The windows of the barge, notwithstanding the pelting rain, were kept open; Henrietta frequently acknowledging the shouts of the populace, by gracefully waving her hand. It was observed that her head already reached the king's shoulder, and that she was young enough to grow taller.*

The difference of religion between Henrietta and her new subjects but slightly affected her first welcome. Much was expected from her youth, her reputed good sense, and the zeal and influence of her husband. Henrietta too, in some degree sacrificing her respect for truth to the love of popularity, was not unwilling to assist the deception. Being asked, shortly after her arrival, if she could abide a heretic: "Why not," she said, "was not my father one?" But neither her popularity nor her dissimulation were of long existence. Shortly afterwards, when she proved with child, the puritans loudly expressed their dissatisfaction, speaking of her as an idolatress and likening her to Heth the Canaanite. Regarding her religion with extreme abhorrence, and perceiving the probability of her hereafter influencing her children in the Romish faith, they foretold those misfortunes which afterwards befel the descendants of Charles. The puritans looked rather to the issue of the Queen of Bohemia, whose education they were satisfied had been in accordance with the principles of the reformed religion. The birth, therefore, of an heir to the crown was a black day in the calendar of puritanism. Heylin mentions a village, in which he was himself resident at the time, where a day of rejoicing had been set apart, in commemoration of the prince's birth. All sorts of festivities, such as feasting, ringing of bells, and bonfires, had been announced to the inhabitants. But, he adds, no single individual of the presbyterian or puritan party came forth from their houses on that day; but, on the contrary, closed their doors, as on occasions of general mourning and distress.

The reputed loveliness of Henrietta, notwithstanding the exquisite portraits of Vandyke, and the enthusiasm of the contemporary poets, has been occasionally disputed. A small share of personal charms will easily exalt a queen into a goddess, and Waller thus addresses Henrietta:

Your beauty more the fondest lover moves
With admiration, than his private loves;
With admiration! for a pitch so high,
(Save sacred Charles's) never love durst fly.
Beauty had crowned you, and you must have been
The whole world's mistress, other than a queen.
All had been rivals, and you might have spared,
Or killed, and tyrannised, without a guard.

Sir William Davenant has celebrated the beauty of Henrietta with still more fulsome panegyric. Several of his smaller pieces are addressed to her, and on New Year's Day he writes,—

There is no need of purple or of lawn
To vest thee in; were but thy curtains drawn
Men might securely say that it is morn;
Thy garments serve to hide not to adorn.
Now she appears, whilst every look and smile
Dispenses warmth and beauty through our isle.

Descending, however, to mere prose, it may not be unamusing to transcribe the brief descriptions of those persons who beheld her in the zenith of youth and levelness, and who were qualified to form a sober opinion of her personal merits. "I can send you gallant news," writes Howell to his brother-in-law; "for we have now a most gallant new Queen of England, who in true beauty is far beyond the long-wooded infants; for she was of a fading flaxen hair, big-lipped, and somewhat heavy eyed; but this daughter of France, this youngest branch of Bourbon, is of a more lovely and lasting complexion, a dark brown; she hath eyes that sparkle like stars; and for her physiognomy, she may be said to be a mirror of perfection."

Mr. Meade, who was present at her first landing in England, describes her to Sir Martin Stuteville, as "a nimble and quiet, black-eyed, brown-haired, and, in a word, a brave lady, though, perhaps, a little touched with the green sickness." But we prefer the description of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who hastened to gratify his curiosity with a sight of the new queen: "On Thursday, the 30th, the last day of this instant June, I went to Whitehall purposely to see the queen, which I did fully all the time she sat at dinner, and perceived her to be a most absolute delicate lady; after I had exactly surveyed all the features of her face, much enlivened by her radiant and sparkling black eye. Besides, her deportment among her women was so sweet and humble, and her speech and looks to her other servants so mild and gracious, as I could not abstain from divers deep-fetched sighs, to consider that she wanted the knowledge of the true religion." Her eyes appear to have been really beautiful. Waller speaks of them in the inflated language of the day.

"Such eyes as yours, on Jove himself had thrown As bright and fierce a lightning as his own."

And again,—

"Such radiant eyes,
Such lovely motion, and such sharp replies."

Notwithstanding the conciliating manners of Henrietta on her first arrival in England, it was shortly evident that the spirit of Henry IV. was not entirely dormant in the bosom of his daughter. The following court decree is introduced on the authority of an eye-witness. "The queen, howsoever very little of stature, is yet of a pleasing countenance, if she be pleased, but full of spirit and vigour, and seems of a more than ordinary resolution. With one frown, diverse of us being at Whitehall to see her, being at dinner, and the room somewhat overheated with the fire and company, she drove us all out of the chamber. I suppose none but a queen could have cast such a scowl." Henrietta was not crowned with her husband. It was demanded that the ceremony should be performed according to the solemnities of her own church; but this being of course refused, her bigotry, or the threats of her confessor, forbade her to assist in any religious ceremonial of protestantism. She is described, in a letter of the period, as standing in a window as a mere looker-on, her ladies "frisking and dancing" around her. She beheld the procession from an apartment in the Gate House, Westminster, which looked into Palace Yard, and had been purposely fitted up for her accommodation.

It certainly speaks much in favour of Henrietta, that her own relatives, and those who were nearest to her person, regarded her with the warmest affection and esteem. The dying words of Charles bore testimony to his admiration and his love. With her brother, Louis the Thirteenth, she was also a great favourite. Robert, Earl of Leicester, ambassador at Paris in 1636, mentions the evident satisfaction of Louis, when he presented him with a letter from his sister the Queen of England: "It was observed," he says, "by those that were by, that when he spoke of the queen, a very great natural affection did appear, both by his words and gesture; and, it is said in this court, that he loves the queen best of all his sisters; and when he speaks of her, he always calls her, ma bonne sœur d'Angleterre." Her son, James the Second, reverts to her memory with affection;—"She excelled," he says, "in all the qualities of a good wife, a good mother, and a good Christian." Her nephew, also, Louis the Fourteenth, appears to have been attached to her in her lifetime, and after her death erected a splendid monument to her memory.

Sir William Waller, in his Recollections, records an anecdote of Henrietta during her stay at Exeter, which endeared her to the inhabitants of that loyal town. While passing northward of the town, her ears were saluted by the dismal cries of some person in distress. They were found, on inquiry, to proceed from a poor woman, whose daughter was in her confinement, and who was evidently in a dying state from the want of proper nourishment and assistance. The queen took a gold chain from her neck, and placing the Agnus which was attached to it in her bosom, delivered the chain to the woman; desiring her, at the same time, to take it into the city and to dispose of it to a goldsmith. The queen's confessor afterwards hazarded an invidious remark on the object of her charity having been a heretic. When this latter circumstance was mentioned to Charles, alluding to her barefoot journey to Tyburn, he asked jestingly if they had not compelled her to do penance.

On the 23d of February, 1642, Henrietta, dreading the threatened impeachment of the commons and the fury of the people, wisely decided on quitting England, and embarked at Dover for Holland. She carried with her the crown jewels, with which she eventually purchased arms and ammunition for the service of her husband. But her absence from England was of brief duration. After using every exertion to influence the Prince of Orange and the States in favour of the royal cause in England; after eluding the spies of the parliament and the ships which they sent out to arrest her, she again set sail from Scheveling the following year, and arrived safely at Burlington Bay in Yorkshire.

The night after her landing, her life was in considerable danger. Four of the parliamentary ships having entered the roads, and having ascertained in which house the queen was lodged, commenced playing their cannon against it. Henrietta was in bed at the time, but so imminent was the danger, that she was compelled to quit the house "bare-foot and bare-leg," and after a precipitate and very hazardous flight, found shelter in a ditch behind the town. But even here the danger was considerable, a sergeant being killed within a few paces from where she stood. In the midst of the firing, Henrietta remembered that she had left her favourite lap-dog asleep. Heedless of the danger, she instantly flew back to the house she had just quitted, and having discovered the little creature, returned with it triumphantly in her arms.

On hearing of her hazardous situation, the Earl of Newcastle immediately hastened to Burlington and conducted her in safety to the army at York. Had she attempted to rejoin her husband at Oxford, where his quarters then were, she would in all probability, have fallen into the hands of the republicans; it was decided, therefore, that she should remain in Yorkshire, where she continued to reside for about four months; equally enchanting all who approached her by her affable demeanour and graceful manners.

The courage displayed by Henrietta at Burlington is not the only instance of her recklessness in the hour of danger. On one occasion, when one of the parliament ships was in full chase of her, regardless of the cries and entreaties of her female attendants, she commanded the captain on no account to strike, but to wait till the last extremity, and then to blow up the vessel. At another time, when in imminent danger from a storm at sea, she sat tranquilly on the deck, and exclaimed laughingly—"Les reines ne se noyent pas,—queens are never drowned." And yet Mr. Hallam remarks that "Henrietta was by no means the high-spirited woman that some have fancied."

Even to Charles she occasionally displayed the spirit of her race. When the king showed some disinclination to seize the five refractory members, "Go, coward," she said, "and pull out these rogues by the ears, or never see my face again." This anecdote was related to Pym by the Countess of Carlisle; and yet at other times Henrietta could bear insult and injury with singular generosity of mind. When the tidings were brought to her that she had been impeached by the commons of high treason, and that her enemy Pym had actually carried up the impeachment to the bar of the lords, she wrote to the Duke of Hamilton, that she hoped God would forgive them for their rebellion, as she in her heart forgave them their conduct to her. On another occasion she refused to be made acquainted with the names of some English peers, who had expressed themselves her enemies. "Though they hate me now," she said, "perhaps they will not always hate me; and if they have any sentiments of honour, they will be ashamed of tormenting a poor woman, who takes so little precaution to defend herself."

The enemies of Henrietta have attempted to blast her fair fame, by accusing her of unfaithfulness to the marriage-bed. Undoubtedly there was much of French levity in her manners and conduct, but still the fact of infidelity is not only not proved, but is deficient in reasonable presumptive evidence. Walpole, in his tedious juvenile poem, "The Epistle from Florence," speaks confidently

"Of lustful Henrietta's Romish shade."

Peyton, also, an equally rancorous writer, accuses her of having intrigued with Jermyn, afterwards Earl of St. Albans, even in the lifetime of her husband. "A certain earl," he says, "enlightened the king on the subject, telling him that if he did not believe his word, if he would go into her chamber, he might be satisfied, and behold Jermyn sitting upon the bed with the queen; so the king and the lord went in, and found her and Jermyn in that posture. The king presently, more ashamed of the act than blaming her, departed, without speaking a word." There is one important argument to refute this disgraceful accusation, namely, the want of confidence in the veracity of the narrator.

It must be allowed, however, on the other hand, that the character of Henrietta has never been completely cleared. Lord Dartmouth, in a note to Bishop Burnet's History, supplies us with a curious anecdote. The queen, he informs us, had conceived a particular dislike to the Duke of Hamilton. His grace, for some reason, being anxious to obtain an interview with Henrietta, had persuaded Mrs. Seymour, a woman of the bed-chamber, to admit him secretly into the queen's private apartment at Somerset House; when, his wishes having been gratified, he stated that from his place of concealment he surprised Henrietta in great familiarities with Jermyn. Lord Dartmouth's authority was Sir Francis Compton, who had it from his mother the Countess of Northampton, an intimate acquaintance of Mrs. Seymour.

Another piece of scandal is related by the bishop himself, in one of the suppressed passages of his history. When the unfortunate Marquis of Montrose was in Paris and in distress, the queen, notwithstanding her own straitened circumstances, had supplied him liberally with jewels and money. Montrose, he says, afterwards repaid her kindness, by boasting of other favours which she had conferred upon him. Henrietta when she heard of the circumstances, instantly sent to him to leave Paris, and positively refused to see him again. This story was related to Burnet by a daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, who affirmed that she had the latter particulars from the queen herself.

The ill-fated Earl of Holland was another reputed lover of Henrietta. His beauty and gallantry may alone have given rise to the report, though it has been asserted with little reason, that their intimacy commenced at Paris, previous to the union of Henrietta with Charles. According to Peyton, when some misunderstanding had arisen between the king and Holland, (on account of which the latter was confined to his house at Kensington, the present Holland House,) Henrietta refused to cohabit with her husband unless the restraint were taken off. The circumstance, alluded to by Peyton, appears to have occurred in April, 1633, when Holland was undoubtedly closely confined to his own house by order of the king. In a letter, dated 18th April, 1633, from Sir Henry Wotton to Sir Edmund Bacon, there is a passage which might have been expected to throw some light on the subject. However, as it is somewhat lengthy, and the meaning intricate, it will be sufficient to insert it in a note.

The reader will be the best judge whether it, in any degree, implicates the character of Henrietta. It may be remarked that the writer strongly enjoins his correspondent to put the letter into the fire as soon as he has perused its contents.*

There appears every reason to believe that, after the death of Charles, Henrietta secretly united herself to her master of the horse, and reputed lover, Henry Jermyn, created, at the Restoration, Earl of St. Albans; it has been supposed, however, by some writers, that they omitted the marriage ceremony. "I had three cousins," said Sir John Reresby, "then in an English convent at Paris, one of them an antient lady, and since abbess of the house: hither the queen was wont often to retire for some days; and the lady would tell me that Lord Jermyn, since St. Albans, had the queen greatly in awe of him, and indeed, it was obvious that he had great interest with her concerns; but that he was married to her, or had children by her, as some have reported, I did not then believe, though the thing was certainly so."

The manner in which St. Albans subsequently dropped the lover, and apparently took upon himself the stern authority of the husband, is another proof that their union was not altogether imaginary. Indeed, his conduct towards Henrietta, at a later period, almost amounted to ill

* "The Earl of Holland was on Saturday last (the day after your post's departure) very solemnly restored at council table, (the king present) from a kind of eclipse, wherein he had stood since the Thursday fortnight before. All considered the obscuration was long, and bred both various and doubtful discourse, but it ended well. All the cause yet known was, a verbal challenge sent from him by Mr. Henry Germain in this form to the now Lord Weston, newly returned from his foreign employments. That since he had already given the king an account of his embassy, he did now expect from him an account of a letter of his, which he had opened in Paris, and he did expect it at such a time even in the Spring Garden, close under his father's window, with his sword by his side."

"It is said, (I go no farther in such tender points) that my Lord Weston sent him, by Mr. Henry Percy, (between whom and the said Lord Weston had, in the late journey, as it seems, been contracted such friendship as overcame the memory that he was cousin-germain to my lord of Holland,) a very fair and discreet answer:—That if he could challenge him for any injury done him before or after his embassy, he would meet him as a gentleman, with his sword by his side, where he should appoint; but for any thing that had been done in the time of his embassy, he had already given the king an account thereof, and thought himself not accountable to any other. This published on Thursday was fortnight the Earl of Holland was confined to his chamber in court, and the next day morning to his house at Kensington, where he remained without any further circumstance of restraint or displeasure Saturday and Sunday; on which days being much visited, it was thought fit on Monday to appoint Mr. Dickenson one of the clerks of the council, to his guardian thenceforward, that none without his presence should access him. This made the vulgar judgments run high, rather indeed low, that he was a lost and discarded man, judging as of patients in fevers, by the exacerbation of the fits. But the queen who was a little obliquely interested in this business—for in my lord of Holland's letter, which was opened, she had one that was not opened, nor so much (as they say) superscribed; and both the queen's and my lord of Holland's were inclosed in one from Mr. Walter Montague (whereof I shall tell you more hereafter) the queen, I say, stood nobly by him, and, as seems, pressed her own affront. It is too intricate involved for me so much as to guess at any particulars."—Reliquie Wottonianæ, p. 455.

usage. "The widow of Charles the First," says Madame de Baviere, in one of her letters, "made a clandestine marriage with her chevalier d'honneur, Lord St. Albans, who treated her extremely ill, so that, whilst she had not a fagot to warm herself with, he had in his apartment, a good fire, and a sumptuous table. He never gave the queen a kind word, and when she spoke to him, he used to say, 'Que me veut cette femme?—What does that woman want?'" This piece of private history is corroborated by Count Hamilton: speaking of the earl, he says, "It is well known what a tible the good man kept at Brussels, while the king, his master, was starving, and the queen dowager, his mistress, lived not over well in France."

It would be difficult to exaggerate the distressed condition of Henrietta after the death of her husband. Her principal residence was in the Louvre at Paris; yet even here, amidst her own relations and her own people, the once-envied Henrietta was frequently in want even of the necessaries of life. She was at length compelled to make application to Cardinal Mazarine, to intercede with Cromwell for the restitution of her dowry: the request was made and refused. But the most remarkable picture of her distress is described by Cardinal de Retz in his Memoirs: "Five or six days before the king removed from Paris, I went to visit the Queen of England, whom I found in the chamber of her daughter Henrietta, who hath been since Duchess of Orleans. At my coming in, she said; 'You see I am come to keep Henrietta company; the poor child could not rise to-day for want of a fire.' The truth is, that the cardinal (Mazarine) for six months together had not ordered her any money towards her pension, that no tradespeople would trust her any thing; and there was not at her lodgings a single billet. You will do me the justice to think that the Princess of England did not keep her bed the next day for want of a fagot; but, however, you will think likewise, that it was not this which the Princess of Conde meant in her letter; what she spoke about was, that some days after my visiting the Queen of England, I remembered the condition I had found her in, and had strongly represented the shame of abandoning her in that manner, which caused the parliament to send forty thousand pounds to her majesty. Posterity will hardly believe that a princess of England, granddaughter to Henry the Great, hath wanted a fagot in the month of January in the Louvre, and in the eyes of the French court." When Salmasius published his Defensio Regia, in support of Charles the Second, he was found fault with for neglecting to send a copy to the exiled queen. It was said that "though poor, she would have paid the bearer."

With regard to the manner in which Henrietta received the news of her husband's death, Mr. D'Israeli, in his "Commentaries on the Reign of Charles," has inserted an interesting passage from the MS. account of an eye-witness. The writer is the Pere Gamache, one of the capuchins who attended on the Queen of England at that period. "The city of Paris," writes Gamache, "was then blockaded by the insurgents, and in the king's minority, it was with difficulty we obtained either entrance or egress. The Queen of England, residing at the Louvre, had despatched a gentleman to St. Germain-en-laye to the French court, to procure news from England. During her dinner, where I assisted at the grace, I had notice to remain there after the benediction, and not to quit her majesty, who might need consolation at the sad account she was to receive of the terrible account of the king her husband. At this grievous intelligence, I felt my whole frame shudder, and withdrew aside from the circle, where, during an hour, the various conversations on indifferent subjects seemed not to remove the uneasiness of the queen, who knew that the gentleman she had despatched to St. Germain ought to have returned. She was complaining of his delay in bringing his answer. On which the Count of St. Albans (Jermyn) took this opportunity to suggest that the gentleman was so faithful and so expeditious in obeying her majesty's commands on these occasions, that he would not have failed to have come, had he any favourable intelligence. 'What then is the news? I see it is known to you,' said the queen. The count replied, that in fact he did know something of it, and when pressed, after many evasions, to explain himself, and many ambiguous words to prepare her, little by little, to receive the fatal intelligence, at length he declared it to the queen, who seemed not to have expected any thing of the kind. She was so deeply struck, that instantly, entirely speechless, she remained voiceless and motionless, to all appearance a statue. A great philosopher has said, that ordinary griefs allow the heart to sigh and the lips to murmur, but that extraordinary afflictions, terrible and fatal, cast the soul into stupor, make the tongue mute, and take away the senses. 'Curæ leves loquuntur, graves stupent.' To this pitiable state was the queen reduced, and to all our exhortations and arguments she was deaf and insensible. We were obliged to cease talking, and we remained by her in unbroken silence, some weeping, some sighing, and all with sympathising countenances, mourning over her extreme distress. This sad scene lasted till nightfall, when the Duchess of Vendome, whom she greatly loved, came to see her. Weeping, she took the hand of the queen, tenderly kissing it,—and afterwards spoke so successfully that she seemed to have recovered this desolated princess from that loss of all her senses, or rather, that great and sudden stupor, produced by the surprising and lamentable intelligence of the strange death of the king." This scene is affectingly described, but the tidings could hardly have been so completely unexpected as the narrator would lead us to suppose.

The fact is evident, indeed, that for some time previously Henrietta had anticipated the worst. The effect that her husband's misfortunes might have on her mind, appears, in point of fact, to have been an object of public speculation, and, accordingly, about three weeks before the execution of Charles, we find the following curious notice in one of the journals of the period. "The Queen of England is returned to her devotions in the House of the Carmelites, where she hath been for diverse days past: she seems not dejected at the present state of her husband in England, yet, say her ladies, her nights are more sad than usual."

Henrietta, notwithstanding the treatment she had experienced from her husband's subjects, was far from regarding England with the aversion which might have been expected. She took a pleasure during her exile in France, in exalting the character of the English; and in the brilliant circles of Paris, their kindness, generosity, and courage, were the constant themes of her discourse. The late troubles, the death of her husband, and her own expulsion, she attributed rather to some desperate enthusiasts, than to the real temper of the people. Her magnanimity is celebrated by Waller:—

Constant to England in your love,
As birds are to their wonted grove,
Accusing some malignant star,
Not Britain, for that fatal war.

An interesting feminine anecdote is recorded by Sir John Reresby, illustrative of her regard for England. "To give a little instance," he says, "of her inclination for the English, I happened to carry an English gentleman with me one day to court, and he, to be very fine, had got him a garniture of rich riband to his suit, in which was a mixture of red and yellow; which the queen observing, called to me, and bade me advise my friend to mend his fancy a little, as to his ribands, the two colours he had joined being ridiculous in France, and might give the French occasion to laugh at him."

On the 2d of November, 1660, the year of her son's restoration, after an absence of nineteen years, Henrietta again returned to Whitehall. Her intention was to pass the remainder of her days in England. Somerset House, where she had spent so many happy years, was again allotted for her residence. She observed on re-entering it, that "had she known the temper of the English people some years past, as well as she did then, she had never been compelled to quit it." Under her auspices the old building was beautified with a taste and magnificence which called forth the poetical admiration both of Cowley and Waller.

The history of Henrietta from this period contains little of interest or importance. She apparently would have had no objection to interest the decline of life, by entering afresh into the political arena; but her want of judgment was too much suspected, and her name too intimately connected with past troubles. Indeed, it is an almost unnoticed fact, that at the Restoration there was actually a discussion in parliament, whether her return, under any circumstances, should be permitted. Still the conduct of the commons was, subsequently, not ungenerous, for they settled on her an income of sixty thousand a year. Her court at Somerset House was numerously attended, and though she took no share in the amorous broils of the period, yet she is described as much diverted with the details whenever they transpired.

With the exception of a short visit to France in 1662, Henrietta remained in England till the breaking out of the great plague in 1665, when, dreading the approaches of that gigantic disease, she took leave of her children, whom she then beheld for the last time. She was accompanied as far as the Nore by the king, Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Monmouth, who respectfully attended her embarkation. Henrietta died in the castle of Colombe, about four leagues from Paris, on the 10th of August, 1669, in the sixtieth year of her age. "Her distemper," says Ludlow, "seemed at first not to be dangerous, but on taking something prescribed by the physicians to procure sleep, the potion operated in such a manner that she woke no more." She was buried at St. Denis, the burial-place of the French kings, with the honours usually paid to a Queen Mother of France. Having been embalmed, her body lay in state for some days in the castle of Colombe. Her heart was placed in a silver urn, inscribed with her name and title, and carried by her almoner, Lord Montague, and a suitable train, to the Monastery of Chaliot. Her body was interred with unusual magnificence, Father Senault delivering the funeral oration. In his discourse he attributed the misfortunes of Charles to his infidelity. Sir Leoline Jenkins, then ambassador at Paris, afterwards indignantly expostulated with him on the offensive charge. Senault said that he had made use of the term as less choquant than heresy.

HENRY,

DUKE OF GLOUCESTER.

The amiable qualities and promising parts of this young prince scarcely appear to have been exaggerated. They acquired for him the admiration of his contemporaries, and the warm affection of his own family. Added to the courage and ingratiating manners which distinguished his race, he possessed the quickness and good nature of his brother Charles, and the application to business which was remarkable in the Duke of York. He had, perhaps, more judgment than either. Considering the early age at which he died, and the disadvantages of his education, his accomplishments were certainly of no ordinary kind. Besides the Latin language, he was master of the French, Spanish, Italian, and Low Dutch. He was able to appreciate the constitution of his country, and the merits of the Protestant faith. The parting scene and dying injunctions of his unhappy father sank deeply into his heart; and neither time nor the contamination of the world were ever able to obliterate their effect.

Henry of Oatlands, as he is styled from the place of his birth, was born at Oatlands in Surrey, 8th July, 1639. In his infancy he was committed to the care of the Countess of Dorset, and at the death of that lady, in 1647, the Earl of Northumberland was selected by the parliament to be his governor. From the earl he was afterwards transferred to the Countess of Leicester, and with his sister, the Princess Elizabeth, became an inmate of Penshurst. Their removal to this classical spot was by special direction of parliament, who dreaded lest the tragical fate of their father, and their presence in the capital, should create for the royal orphans an inconvenient degree of commiseration. It was ordered, moreover, that their indulgences should be diminished, and their attendants lessened. The use of titles was forbidden, and it was directed that they should partake of the same food, and sit at the same table, as the children of the family. Some of the more zealous patriots went considerably further. A proposition was actually made in parliament that the duke should be bound to a trade, in order, as it was expressed, "that he might earn his bread honestly."*

* In the Mercurius Elencticus, from February 21st to 28th, 1649, we discover the following passage:—"Sure Cromwell intends to set up his trade of brewing again, for the other day, being in the presence of the Duke of Gloucester, he stroked him on the head, and, like a merciful protector and faithful guardian, saith, Sirrah, what trade do you like best? Would not a shoemaker be a good trade for you? Shoemakers are gentlemen, I can assure you, and so are brewers too; and if you like those trades, I will provide you a good master, either Colonel Hewson or Colonel Hardwicke, and move the parliament to give you something (if you prove a good boy, and please your master) to set up your trade. And for that little gentlewoman, your sister, (meaning the Lady Elizabeth) if she will be ruled, I will provide her a husband; one of Colonel Pryde's sons, or one

His tutor was a Mr. Lovel, a man of piety and learning. When the duke was afterwards sent to Carisbrooke Castle, Lovel, much to the satisfaction of the royal orphan, was allowed to be his companion. At Carisbrooke he experienced even less respect than had been permitted at Penshurst. Mildmay, the governor, was directed to treat him merely as the son of a gentleman, and he was invariably addressed as Mr. Harry. When in his thirteenth year, Cromwell, without alleging any reason, permitted him to rejoin his family in France, and the sum of 500*l.* was allowed for the expenses of his removal.

Henrietta was overjoyed to embrace a child whom she had scarcely seen since his birth, and whom she trusted to make a convert to her own faith. She discovered the task to be more arduous than she had anticipated. The young duke combated all her arguments; alleging, moreover, the displeasure of his brother Charles, and the solemn injunctions of his deceased father, that he should adhere to the reformed religion, and especially that he should obey his sovereign in preference to his mother.

When Charles had somewhat unwillingly consented to allow the Duke of Gloucester to remain in Paris with his mother, he had exacted from her a promise that she would refrain from tampering with his religious principles. Charles was absent in the Low Countries when the information reached him of his brother's danger. Though himself inclined to the Romish persuasion, he had foresight enough to discover how dangerous, and probably fatal, to his hopes of regaining the English crown, would be an open profession of that faith in any of the members of his family.* Accordingly, he despatched the following remarkable letter to his brother at Paris. It would be alone curious as the composition of a young man of pleasure, who had only completed his twenty-fourth year.

"Cologne, Nov. 10, 1654.

"Dear Brother,

"I have received yours without a date, in which you tell me that Mr. Montague has endeavoured to pervert you from your religion. I do not doubt but you remember very well the commands I left with you, at my going away, concerning that point. I am confident you will observe them; yet your letters, that come from Paris, say that it is the queen's purpose to do all she can to change your religion, in which, if you of my own, if either of them like her or can love her." The duke told him, "that being a king's son, he hoped the parliament would allow him some means out of his father's revenue to maintain him like a gentleman, and not put him apprentice like a slave." Nose Almighty makes answer, "Boy, you must be an apprentice, for all your father's revenue will not make half satisfaction for the wrong he hath done the kingdom," and so Nose went blowing out." There is too much of party spirit discoverable in this passage, to render it admissible in any other light than as a pasquinade.

* Lord Mordaunt, in a letter to the duke of Ormond, in 1659, alluding to a report that Charles himself had embraced the Romish persuasion, thus expresses himself:—"Your master is utterly ruined, as to his interest here, in whatever party, if this be true; though he never had a fairer game than at present."—Ormond Papers, vol. ii. p. 264.

† Abbott Montague, almoner to Henrietta Maria. He enticed the duke to the delightful Abbey of Pontoise, where, according to Lord Clarendon, he "sequestered him from all resort of such persons as might confirm him in his averseness from being converted."—Hist. of the Rev. vol. vii. p. 122.

do hearken to her, or any body else in that matter, you must never think to see England again; and whatsoever mischief shall fall on me or my affairs, from this time, I must lay all upon you as being the only cause of it. Therefore, consider well what it is to be not only the cause of ruining a brother that loves you so well, but also of your king and country. Do not let them persuade you either by force or fair promises: for the first they neither dare nor will use; and for the second, as soon as they have perverted you, they will have their end, and then they will care no more for you. I am also informed that there is a purpose to put you into the Jesuits' College, which I command you, upon the same grounds, never to consent to. And whosoever any one shall go to dispute with you in religion, do not answer them at all; for though you have the reason on your side, yet they, being prepared, will have the advantage of any body that is not upon the same security that they are. If you do not consider what I say unto you, remember the last words of your dead father, which were to be constant to your religion, and never to be shaken in it. Which, if you do not observe, this shall be the last time you will hear from,

"Dear brother, your most affectionate brother,

"CHARLES R."

In addition to this forcible appeal, Charles instantly despatched the Marquis of Ormond to Paris; transmitting by him a strong letter of expostulation to the queen, and some written directions from himself to the duke, enjoining him to put himself into the hands of the marquis, and immediately repair to him at Cologne. Henrietta expressed the most vehement indignation at the interference of Charles. She insisted that the natural authority of a mother had been wrested from her; adding that the duke might act as he pleased, for she would never see his face again. Ormond instantly hurried the young duke from the dangerous neighbourhood of Pontoise. At Paris they were detained some days for want of a few pounds to defray their expenses to Cologne, at which place, however, they eventually arrived in safety, to the great satisfaction of Charles.

In 1658 the Duke of Gloucester, then only nineteen, attended his brother, the Duke of York to the Spanish campaign. At the battle of Dunkirk they fought side by side, making several charges on horseback, and behaving with a valour worthy of their race. James himself bears testimony to the conduct of his young brother. At the close of the day, the Duke of Gloucester, either in giving or warding off a blow, unfortunately lost possession of his sword. Villeneuve, Master of the Horse to the Prince de Ligne, immediately alighted from his horse and recovered the weapon; the duke covering him with his pistol till he had remounted. Villeneuve was afterwards shot through the body, but fortunately the wound was not of a dangerous nature.

At the Restoration, the Duke of Gloucester attended his brother Charles to England; the parliament sending him five thousand pounds as a mark of their esteem. He survived the return of his family but a few months, having died of the smallpox on the 3d of September, 1660, in his twenty-second year. Pepys, who speaks of him as a "pretty boy," ascribes his death to the negligence of the physicians. His loss was bewailed by his own family and regretted by all who knew him. Of Charles, it was said, that he was more affected by his brother's death than by any other misfortune which had ever befallen him. James, too, in his Memoirs, more than once recurs to his memory with affection, and speaks with admiration of his parts. "He had all the natural qualities," he says, "to make a great prince, which made his loss the more sensibly felt by all the royal family." Evelyn, whose praise is of no small value, speaks of him as a prince of "extraordinary hopes," and Sir John Denham, in his Directions to a Painter, thus apostrophises his untimely end:

O more than human Gloucester, Fate did show
Thee but to earth, and back again withdrew.

According to Reresby, he was far from insensible to female charms. He was probably gifted also with some share of the natural wit of Charles. When his brother, the Duke of York, married the daughter of Lord Chancellor Clarendon, he said, "He could never sit in the same room with her,—she smelt so of her father's green bag."

He was buried in Westminster Abbey, in the same vault with Mary Queen of Scots, and Lady Arabella Stuart; the Duke of York being chief mourner, and the Dukes of Richmond, Buckingham, and Albemarle attending him to the grave.

MARY,

PRINCESS OF ORANGE.

This amiable and warm-hearted princess, the eldest daughter of Charles the First, and the mother of William the Third, was born 4th of November, 1631. The event is reported in the following letter addressed by George Gresley to Sir Thomas Pickering.

"Sir,—Upon Thursday last the Duke of Vendôme, illegitimate brother to our queen, arrived here from out the Low Countries, and is lodged at Sir Abraham Williams's house.

"Upon Friday morning, about four of the clock, the queen was, (God be praised) safely delivered of a princess, who was christened the same morning, by reason it was weak, as some say, it being born three weeks before the time; but I have heard it was done to save charges, and to prevent other christening. The name, Marie; the Countesses of Carlisle and Denbigh god-mothers, and the Lord Keeper godfather; the Lady Roxburgh governess, and the nurse one Mrs. Bennet (some say wife to a baker) and daughter to Mrs. Browne that keepeth Somerset house.

"Your very assured friend and servant,

"GEORGE GRESLEY.

"Essex House, the 8th of Nov. 1631."

When in her tenth year, on the 2d May, 1641, the young princess was married, or, more properly speaking, contracted to William, afterwards second Prince of Orange. The ceremony is described by Principal Baillie, in one of his curious letters to the Presbytery of Irvine. On the 4th of May, 1641, he writes,—"On Sunday, in the king's chapel, both the queens being present at service, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York led in the Princess Mary to the chapel, conveyed with a number of ladies of her own age, of nine or ten years, all in cloth of silver. The Prince of Orange went in before with the ambassadors, and his cousins of Tremmull and Nassau. The king gave him his bride. Good Bishop Wren made the marriage. At night, before all the court, they went to bed in the queen's chamber. A little after, the king and queen bade the bridegroom good night, as their son: he, as it was appointed, arose, and went to his bed in the king's chamber." The young princess followed her husband to Holland on the 23d of February, 1652. By her early marriage she was spared from being an actual witness of the misfortunes of her family, though afterwards, when they were in poverty and exile, her conduct towards them afforded a beautiful example of sisterly love.

The princess is described by her contemporaries as possessing every quality that can add grace or dignity to the female character. Much of this praise is undoubtedly deserved, but still her judgment was indifferent, and it is doubtful whether her love of admiration was confined within proper bounds. It appears by a letter of the period that the witty Duke of Buckingham was one of her admirers, and that scandal was not silent when it connected their names. The duke unadvisedly following her into Holland, she sent to let him know that malice had been busy with her name, that his sudden return might revive unfounded reports, and requested that he would not take it ill, if she implored him to discontinue his visits. On this occasion there is nothing to implicate her fair fame, except that when sovereign princesses are thus wooed, it is generally their own fault: besides, they were both young, and Buckingham was extremely handsome.

But Henry Jermyn, the "lady-killer of De Grammont," is supposed to have been more successful: indeed, there is some doubt whether, after her husband's death, they were not actually united in marriage. King William appears to have thought so, for at the revolution, Jermyn was one of the few Roman Catholics, who had been attached to the fortunes of James, whom he received into favour.

The princess was left a widow at the age of nineteen, her husband having died on the 27th of October, 1650. Her mother Henrietta Maria subsequently conceived an idea of uniting her to the French king, Louis the Fourteenth, and accordingly sent for her to Paris. The princess fell into the scheme, and parted with her jewels, as well as with some of her son's property, to support a splendid appearance at the French capital. The enterprise, however, was not successful, and the princess either remained a widow, or contented herself with Jermyn.

At the Restoration, after an absence of nineteen years, she returned to England. The joy of meeting her family was sadly damped by the recent loss of her brother Henry, who had died but a few days previous to her landing. Shortly afterwards she was herself attacked by the small-pox, which ended her days at Whitehall, on the 24th of December, 1660, having completed her twenty-ninth year. Her brother James pays an affectionate tribute to her memory. "Her personal merits," he says, "and particular love of all her relations, which she manifested in the time of their distress, caused a sorrow for her death as great as was their esteem." And Walker says, in his History of Independency, "Her tender love and zeal to the king, in his afflictions, deserves to be written in brass, and graven with the point of a diamond." Waller has also celebrated her in a dull panegyric. She was buried in Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster, in the same vault with her favourite brother Henry.

ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

The most gifted of the children of Charles; her affectionate disposition and precocious parts are invariably spoken of with admiration. She was the darling child of her unhappy father, who was gratified with her sympathy, delighted with her ingenuous and pious mind, and proud of the quickness of her apprehension, and her remarkable insight into human character. She was born at St. James's on the 28th of December, 1635.*

The princess had been admitted to her father's presence the day previous to his execution, and, like her brother Henry, had carried away an impression which was never effaced. That solemn and affecting scene has been elsewhere described, but it is not generally known that the young princess herself committed an account of it to paper. When Charles had communicated to her his last directions, "Sweetheart," he said, "you will forget this."—"No," she said, "I shall never forget it while I live;" and with many tears, promised to write down the particulars. The relation, in her own words, is as follows:

"What the king said to me 29th of January last, being the last time I had the happiness to see him.

"He told me he was glad I was come, and although he had not time to say much, yet somewhat he had to say to me, which he had not to another, or leave in writing, because he was feared their cruelty was such, as that they would not have permitted him to write to me. He wished me not to grieve and torment myself for him; for that would be a glorious death that he should die, it being for the laws and liberties of the land. He bid me read Bishop Andrews' Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, and Bishop Laud's book against Fisher, which would ground me against popery. He told me he had forgiven all his enemies, and hoped God would forgive them also; and commanded us to forgive them. He bid me tell my mother that his thoughts had never strayed from her, and that his love would be the same to his last. Withal he commanded me and

* Mrs. Makins, the linguist, sister to John Pell, the linguist and mathematician, was for some time her instructress. Mrs. Makins, it seems, afterwards kept a school. At the end of "An Essay on the Education of Gentlemen," published in 1673, is the following curious postscript. "If any inquire where this education may be performed; such may be informed, that a school is lately erected for gentlewomen at Tottenham High-Cross, within four miles of London, in the road to Ware; where Mrs. Makins is governess, who was sometime tutoress to the Princess Elizabeth, daughter to King Charles the First; where, by the blessing of God, gentlewomen may be instructed in the principles of religion, and all manner of sober and virtuous education; more particularly in all things ordinarily taught in other schools. Works of all sorts, dancing, music, singing, writing, keeping accounts, half the time to be spent in these things: the other half to be employed in gaining the Latin and French tongues; and those that please, may learn the Greek and Hebrew, the Italian and Spanish, in all which this gentlewoman hath a complete knowledge, &c. &c."

"Those that think these things improbable or impracticable, may have further account every Tuesday, at Mr. Mason's Coffee-House in Cornhill, near the Royal Exchange; and Thursday, at the Bolt and Tun, in Fleet Street, between the hours of three and six in the afternoon, by some person whom Mrs. Makins shall appoint."—Granger, vol. iii. p. 233.

my brother to be obedient to her; and bid me send my blessing to the rest of my brothers and sisters, with commendations to all his friends. So after he had given me his blessing, I took my leave.

"Further, he commanded us all to forgive those people, but never to trust them; for they had been most false to him, and to those that gave them power, and he feared also to their own souls. And desired me not to grieve for him, for he should die a martyr; and that he doubted not but that the Lord would settle his throne upon his son, and that we should all be happier than we could have expected to have been if he had lived; with many other things, which at present I cannot remember."

The princess was at Hampton Court at the period of Charles's escape from that place. It was in consequence of her complaining that the sentinels disturbed her rest, that they were removed to a greater distance, and thus, it is said, afforded particular facility to Charles in effecting his flight.

Having been successively under the charge of the Earl of Northumberland and the Countess of Leicester, in August, 1650, she was committed by the parliament to the care of Anthony Mildmay, formerly carver to King Charles, by whom she was conducted to Carisbrooke Castle. The commons appear to have taken but little care of her maintenance. In the "Desiderata Curiosa" is published a memorial from Mildmay to the speaker, in favour of the four domestics allowed her by the parliament, who petition for their promised remuneration.

The rumour which has existed, that the princess was actually bound apprentice to a glover or button-maker, at Newport, is generally supposed to have been unfounded; nevertheless, the author is credibly informed that the indenture is still preserved among the archives of that town. Probably she was saved from the actual indignity of servitude by the state of her health, as she survived her arrival at Carisbrooke but a few weeks.

Early in September, returning from bowls with her brother, the Duke of Gloucester, she complained of a pain in her head, which was followed by a sickness that ended her short life of captivity and sorrow. "She fell sick," says Fuller, "about the beginning of September, and continued so for three or four days, having only the advice of Dr. Bignall, a worthy and able physician of Newport. After very many rare ejaculatory expressions, abundantly demonstrating her unparalleled piety, she took leave of the world, on Sunday the 8th of the same September," 1650. Sir Theodore Mayerne, a celebrated physician of the period, sent her some medicines from London. Heath says, "that with this exception, but little care was taken of her in her sickness." This account indeed is corroborated by Mayerne himself, who had been physician to the court in its palmy days, and who in this capacity had prescribed for the princess in 1649: he inserts the following touching memorandum among his papers:—"Ex febre maligna tunc grassante, obit in custodia in Vecti Insula, procul a medicis et remediis, die 8 Septemb. circa tertiam pomeridianum." "She died of a fever at that period raging, when in prison in the Isle of Wight; far removed from physicians and medical aid, on the eighth day of September, about three o'clock in the afternoon." The royalists attributed her death to poison, administered by order of Cromwell. Undoubtedly the acerbity of party feeling alone originated the report.

The princess is generally reported to have died of grief. Probably the scenes which she had witnessed, the loss of liberty, and the deep feelings of which her nature was susceptible, tended to hasten her end. But her constitution seems originally to have been delicate, as we are told that the quickness of her mind made amends for the weakness of her body. Fuller says that she was "affected with the afflictions of her family beyond her age." At the time of her death she had not completed her fourteenth year.

Her remains were carried to the church of Newport, in a "borrowed coach." This circumstance omitted, there appears to have been no want of respect for her memory. Her body was embalmed, and placed in a leaden coffin, the mayor and aldermen of Newport respectfully attending the interment.

ANNE,

DAUGHTER OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

Mr. Garrard writes to the Earl of Strafford, on the 23d of March, 1636, "Friday morning, the 17th of this month, St. Patrick's day, was the queen brought to bed of a daughter, which will please the Irish well. It is not yet christened, neither hear I anything of the gossips." There is a simple but affecting anecdote related of this little princess, who died before she had completed her fourth year. In her last moments she was desired by one of her attendants to pray. She said she was not able to say her long prayer, meaning the Lord's Prayer, but would say her short one: "Lighten mine eyes, O Lord, that I sleep not the sleep of death." She had scarcely repeated the words when life departed. She was born at St. James's, 17th March, 1637, and died 8th December, 1640.

HENRIETTA MARIA,

DUCHESS OF ORLEANS.

Youngest daughter of Charles the First. Lovely in her person, gay and attractive in her manners, fond of admiration, and not averse to intrigue, she was the idol alike of the French king and of his complaisant courtiers. She was the favourite child, and constant companion of her mother, whose religion she embraced, and whose country she preferred. With all the vivacity of her fascinating parent, she possessed much of the wit and humour of her brother Charles. Burnet, who is no friend to her character, speaks of her as the wittiest woman in France. She was never even beheld by her unfortunate father.

Henrietta was born in Bedford House, Exeter, in the midst of the civil troubles, on the 16th of June, 1644. Only ten days after her birth her mother was compelled to resign her to the care of others, being forced to seek refuge in France. She was entrusted by Charles to the beautiful Countess of Morton,* who, true to her trust, contrived to elude the vigilance of the parliament, and escaped with her young charge to Paris.

* Anne, daughter of Sir Edward Villiers, (brother to George Villiers, first Duke of Buckingham), and wife of Robert Douglas, Earl of Morton.

The princess was scarcely more than two years old when they set out on their hazardous journey. They had disguised her in a coarse gray frock, and as the child naturally missed the bright colours it had been accustomed to, she frequently lisped out her displeasure, assuring every one she spoke to, that it was not the dress she had always worn. Lady Morton is complimented by Waller on the success of her enterprise:

From armed foes to bring a royal prize,
Shows your brave heart victorious as your eyes.
If Judith, marching with the general's head,
Can give us passion when her story's read;
What may the living do, which brought away
Though a less bloody, yet a nobler prey?
Who from our flaming Troy, with a bold hand
Snatched her fair charge, the princess, like a brand:
A brand! preserved to warm some prince's heart;
And make whole kingdoms take a brother's part.

The queen was overjoyed to embrace her child, and from this period they were inseparable. The childhood of the young princess was passed either in Paris or its vicinity. Sir John Reresby, who seems to have been a favourite of the exiled queen, was a frequent visitor at the Palais Royal. "Her Majesty," he says, "had none of her children with her but the Princess Henrietta Maria; and few of the English making their court there, I was the better received. As I spoke the language of the country, and danced pretty well, the young princess, then about fifteen years of age, behaved towards me with all the civil freedom that might be. She made me dance with her, played on the harpsichord to me in her highness's chamber, suffered me to wait on her as she walked in the garden, and sometimes to toss her in a swing between two trees, and in fine, to be present at all her innocent diversions."

The appearance of the youthful princess was hailed with rapture in the brilliant circles of Paris. At the French Court there were none who could compete with her either in wit or loveliness; and the young king, Louis the Fourteenth, was the first to confess the power of her charms. "The court of France," says Reresby, "was very splendid this winter, 1660; a grand masque was danced at the Louvre, where the king and Princess Henrietta of England danced to admiration. But there was now a greater resort to the palace than the French court; the good humour and wit of our queen mother, and the beauty of the princess her daughter, being more inviting than any thing that appeared in the French queen." According to Burnet, the only object of Louis, in addressing the princess as a lover, was to cover his intercourse with the celebrated Madame La Valiere. Henrietta, he adds, who had encouraged the king's addresses, was highly incensed when she discovered the deception.

It is to be feared that, like many of her family, the heart of Henrietta was too susceptible of tender sentiments; to what extent, however, there was criminality in her attachments, it is now impossible to ascertain. Truth is never easy to arrive at, but in cases of scandal the difficulty is commonly doubled. Among the foremost of Henrietta's lovers stands the Count de Guiche. The feeling on both sides is described as ardent and sincere. Madame Lafeyette dismisses all idea of impropriety, yet she speaks of their attachment as une confidence libertine. Such an expression is strangely at variance with spotless virtue.

Another of Henrietta's reputed lovers was the Count de Treville. When on her death-bed, it is said she repeated in her delirium, Adieu, Treville! The count was so much affected by this slight incident, or more probably by the death of his mistress, that he shut himself up for many years in a monastery. When he returned to the world he was an altered and devout man.

At the Restoration, Henrietta accompanied her mother to England, where she remained about six months. Pepys says in his Diary, "The Princess Henrietta is very pretty, but much below my expectation; and her dressing of herself with her hair frizzed short up her ears, did make her seem so much the less to me. But my wife standing near her with two or three black patches on, and well dressed, did seem to me much handsomer than she." On the 31st of March, 1661, while yet scarcely seventeen, she was married to Philip, Duke of Orleans, only brother to Louis the Fourteenth, a wicked and narrow-minded voluptuary, with nothing to recommend him but his handsome person.*

In May, 1670, Henrietta again visited England, on which occasion she is reported to have confirmed her brother James in his predilection for the Romish faith. Her principal object, however, as is well known, was to persuade Charles to join the French king in a league against the Dutch. Charles, attended by the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Monmouth, hastened to Dover to receive her on landing. The court shortly followed, and for a fortnight, which was the extent of her visit, Dover was the constant scene of splendid rejoicings. It was on this occasion that she is said to have fixed her affections on the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth.

Henrietta was the favourite sister of Charles, and there can be no doubt of the sincerity of his affection. Colbert, the French ambassador in England, in his despatches lays great stress on this circumstance. In one of his letters he writes, "Her influence over the king was remarked by all; he wept when he parted with her, and whatever favour she asked of him was granted." Unfortunately this amiable weakness on the part of Charles gave rise to some scandalous reports, which can scarcely be more than alluded to. They would not now be referred to, but that Ludlow, Marvell, and Burnet have lent them the credit of their names. Some weight appears to have attached to them at the time, for we are assured that Henrietta sent for Montagu, the English ambassador, on her death-bed, and with the most solemn asseverations, declared her innocence of any improper attachment for her own blood. In a little work, published shortly after the death of Charles, his memory is confidently loaded with this offensive charge.

Whatever may have been the conduct of Henrietta, during her short visit to England, it is certain that the jealous temper of her husband was painfully aroused by the reports which reached him. We are naturally unwilling to place much faith in the rumours of royal poisonings; still, there is a mystery hanging over the fate of Henrietta which it is far from easy to remove; nor shall we readily acquit her husband of being the author of her death. The following particulars of her dissolution are not without interest.

* The Abbe de Longueville thus describes the duke: "He was continually talking without ever saying any thing. He never had but one book, which was his mass-book, and his clerk of the closet used always to carry it in his pocket for him."—Seward, vol. ii. p. 209.

Some days after her return to France, she desired one of her attendants to bring her usual beverage, a glass of succory water. She complained at the time that it was very bitter, and being presently attacked with the most excruciating pains, exclaimed several times that she was poisoned; desiring that she might be put to bed, and her confessor instantly sent for. The King of France shortly afterwards arrived, bringing with him his own physician. The latter endeavoured to console her with false hopes, but she persisted in her conviction that she should never recover. Her piety and resolution are described as most exemplary. She told her husband that she had the less fear of death, as she had nothing to reproach herself with in her conduct towards him. Of the French king she took leave with all the grace of former days, telling him that what made her most regret to leave the world, was the loss of his friendship and esteem.

She had more than once expressed a strong desire that Montagu, the English ambassador, should be summoned to her sick chamber; and accordingly he attended, and remained with her to the last. She told him she could not possibly live long, and desired him to convey her most affectionate regards to the king, her brother, and to thank him for all the kindness he had ever shown her. She frequently recurred to the grief which he would feel at her loss: "I have always loved him," she said, "above all things in the world, and should not regret to leave it, but that I leave him." She told Montagu where he would discover her money after her death, desiring him to distribute it among her servants, whom she mentioned by name; she recommended them also in the strongest manner to the protection of Charles. She said that she had long been on bad terms with her husband, and that he had recently been exasperated by finding her in close conversation with the king of France; but they were discoursing, she said, on affairs which could not be communicated to a third person. Montagu more than once inquired of her in English if she believed herself poisoned, but her confessor caught the expression, and told her she must accuse no one. When Montagu afterwards pressed the question, she shrugged up her shoulders, but said nothing. She had no sooner expired, than her money and papers were seized by her husband. The latter were principally in cipher, and probably baffled his curiosity.

As regards the question of Henrietta having been poisoned, there was much difference of opinion even in her own family. Her brother, the Duke of York, certainly discredited the fact. "It was suspected," he says, "that counter poisons were given her; but when she was opened, in the presence of the English ambassador, the Earl of Ailesbury, and an English physician and surgeon, there appeared no ground of suspicion of any foul play." This account is in exact opposition to what is asserted by Burnet, that her stomach was completely ulcerated. Charles, however appears to have been far from satisfied that his sister died a natural death. When Sir Thomas Armstrong detailed to him the particulars of her illness, for which purpose he had ridden post from Paris, the king burst into tears:—"The duke," he said, "is a ———! But, prithee, Tom, don't speak of it." However, he sent Sir William Temple into France, to make inquiries into the truth of the report. Temple told Lord Dartmouth that he "found more in it than was fit to be known," but that he advised the king to drop the inquiry, unless he was in a condition to resent it as became a great king, especially as it might prejudice the infant daughters of his deceased sister. The French king appears to have been in some difficulty how to act. In the first instance he intimated his belief in his brother's guilt in the most unequivocal manner, by refusing to receive a letter which he sent him.

However, he afterwards altered his opinion; asserting that after every inquiry into the circumstances, he was completely convinced of the innocence of the duke. Without pretending to arrive at any definite conclusion, it may be remarked that Montagu appears fully satisfied that there had been foul play.* Sir Thomas Armstrong seems to join with him in the conclusion.

He says, that when he entered the apartment, about four hours after the death of the princess, the body was in such a state of decomposition, that he could scarcely bear to remain in the room.

Henrietta died at St. Cloud on the 30th of June, 1670, having just completed her twenty-sixth year. By Philip, Duke of Orleans, she was the mother of three children:—Philip, who died young; Maria, married to Charles II. King of Spain; and Anna Maria, who became the wife of Victor Amadeus II. Duke of Savoy, and afterwards King of Sicily and Sardinia. This latter princess was great-grandmother of Louis XVI. who was beheaded in 1793; that unfortunate monarch being the sixth in generation from Charles the First.

GEORGE VILLIERS,

DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

CHAP. I.

Although we may deny to Buckingham the merit of genius, and even of any extraordinary political capacity, we shall still wonder at that consummate knowledge of human character, and those thousand accomplishments, which raised him to the pinnacle of human greatness,—which made the wisest and haughtiest of his contemporaries subservient to his will,—and gave him an ascendant alike over the imbecile James and the virtuous Charles. His odious position as a favourite, and his unfitness to conduct the interests of a great empire, have drawn down upon him the harshest invectives of the historian. Nevertheless, it is easier to impugn the wisdom of his counsels than the integrity of his intentions. Charles would never have fixed his affections on a really bad man; and, however we may regret the weak judgment and unfortunate influence of Buckingham, there is no reason to doubt either his zeal for his country, or his attachment to his unfortunate master.

Moreover, Buckingham was not deficient in the better qualities of the heart. If his spirit was imperious, his equals, not his inferiors, were insulted by his haughtiness or crushed by his power. His disposition was generous; he was a considerate master; he despised the common arts of dissimulation; and if a violent, he was at least an open enemy. His exterior qualifications, the eminent grace and elegance of his person, the refinement of his manners, his chivalrous courage, and the magnificence of his taste, have never been called in question. His character appears to have been a strange mixture of generous qualities and unruly passions. After perusing the history of his dazzling career, we shall perhaps doubt whether there is most room for envy or commiseration, for applause or censure.

George Villiers was born at Brooksby, in Leicestershire, 28th of August, 1592. He was the third son of Sir George Villiers, Knight, by Mary Beaumont, his wife, a lady to whom a separate memoir has been accorded. The Villierses, an ancient though not a distinguished family, had been resident in Leicestershire for nearly four centuries; a circumstance which of itself would at least confer respectability. The future favourite was the darling of his mother, who seems to have conceived an intuitive pre-sage of his greatness, and to have planned his education accordingly. At the death of his father, when he was about thirteen, she sent for him from his school at Billisden, and caused him to be instructed in all those graceful accomplishments, which are more likely to make an elegant courtier than a sober Christian. With a view of giving a last finish to his education, at the age of eighteen he set out for France, in which country he remained about three years.

Buckingham made his first appearance at court about the year 1614. His means at this time were so extremely slender, as scarcely to enable him to support the character of a gentleman. Arthur Wilson says, "that he had not above fifty pounds a-year," and Sir Symonds D'Ewes goes still further. According to the latter authority, Buckingham, shortly before he became the favourite, was seen at Cambridge races, "in an old black suit, broken out in various places." Weldon gives a curious reason for his first appearance at court. Buckingham, it appears, had fallen in love with a daughter of Sir Roger Aston, Master of the Robes to King James. The lady was extremely attached to him, and their union was only delayed by the deficiency of their pecuniary resources. In the mean time Buckingham was introduced to the king, when the prospect of future aggrandisement bursting upon him, he most ungallantly abandoned the smiles of the lady for those of fortune. This early attachment is alluded to both by Wotton and Lloyd. They alike agree in attributing the defection of Buckingham to the advice of Sir John Graham, who persuaded him to laugh at romance, and rather endeavour to push his fortune at court.

Buckingham first caught the eye of James while performing in the play of Ignoramus, on an occasion of its being acted before his majesty by the students of Cambridge. The king was so struck with the grace and symmetry of his person, and expressed his admiration so warmly, as to give the first idea to the enemies of Somerset, of superseding him by a new candidate for royal favour. The probability of success was seriously canvassed at a supper party, at which were present the heads of the noble families of Herbert, Seymour, and Russell. The company, we are told, on breaking up, elated probably by the wine which they had drunk, happened to pass through Fleet street, when one of the party, perceiving Somerset's picture exposed for sale in a painter's stall, desired his servant to throw some dirt on the face! an order which was effectually obeyed. The anecdote is trivial, but casts some light on the manners of the time.

The king's partiality had no sooner become publicly known, than Buckingham had no want of friends. William, Earl of Pembroke, and Lucy, Countess of Bedford, supplied him liberally with money, and Sir Thomas Lake, we are assured, bought for him the place of cup-bearer, to which he was shortly afterwards nominated. According to Lloyd, the courtiers wished him well because he was an Englishman; the nobility, because he was a gentleman; the king, because he had beauty and parts; and the ladies, because "he was the exactest courtier in Christendom."

On one of Buckingham's first visits to court, the king turned to Lord Arundel, and inquired, "what he thought of him." Arundel, looking at his blushing face, observed "that his bashfulness was ill-suited to a court." The queen, however, Anne of Denmark, was of a different opinion, and the result proved that she had the more foresight of the two. When she was pressed to introduce Buckingham to the king, by those who wished ill to Somerset, she gave as her objection, that "if he were to become a favourite, he would become more intolerable than any that had gone before him." This anecdote is related by Coke, and authenticated by Archbishop Abbot, who was present when the queen made use of the words: "Noble queen," (he writes, in mentioning the circumstance,) "how like a prophetess did you speak!" His grace informs us, that the king would never adopt a new favourite, unless he were recommended by his wife. His motive was, that he might turn the tables on her, should she hereafter complain of the selection.

Buckingham had to encounter many insults from the friends and retainers of Somerset. On one occasion, a creature of the declining favourite, in carrying a dish to the royal table, designedly spilt some of its contents over Buckingham's splendid dress. Want of spirit was not a failing of Buckingham, and he instantly repaid the insult with a box on the ear. Such a proceeding, according to the laws of the court, exposed the offending party to the penalty of losing his hand; and Somerset in his capacity of lord chamberlain, was the proper person to see the mutilation enforced. James, however, interfered, and by his behaviour on the occasion, gave additional proof of the interest he took in his new favourite. Buckingham, we are told, obtained a "clear conquest" over his rival.

One Ker, or Carr, illegitimately connected with the falling favourite, carried his feelings of friendship to such an extreme, that he had actually made up his mind to assassinate Buckingham. Fortunately, a friend, to whom he had communicated his project, discovered it to the court. Ker denied the charge so stubbornly, that, though condemned to a long imprisonment, he escaped with his life.

James commenced his favours to Buckingham, as he had formerly done to Somerset, by attending to his education, and moral improvement. He taught him we are told, three things; a love for retirement, the art of conversation, and the

* The statute, 33 Henry VIII. c. 12, after enacting the barbarous penalty, proceeds as follows: "And for the further declaration of the solemn and due circumstances of the execution, appertaining, and of long time used and accustomed, to and for such malicious strikings, by reason whereof blood is, hath been, or hereafter shall be shed, against the king's peace; it is therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the serjeant, or chief surgeon, for the time being, or his deputy, of the king's household, his heirs and successors, shall be ready at the place and time of execution as shall be appointed, as is aforesaid, to sear the stump when the hand is stricken off."

qualifications of a man of business. Buckingham did credit to the king's judgment, by showing himself, in the first instance, courteous and affable to all men; procuring the royal patronage gratis for those who sought him, while Somerset had been in the habit of exacting large sums for the favours which he conferred.

It is greatly to Buckingham's credit that, in the commencement of his career, he lived on terms of friendship with, and was regarded with an affectionate interest by, the amiable Archbishop Abbot. That excellent prelate thus addresses the young courtier, on the first dawn of his rising splendour:—"And now, my George, because of your kind affection towards me, you style me your father, I will from this day forward repute and esteem you for my son, and so hereafter know yourself to be. And in token thereof, I do now give you my blessing again, and charge you, as my son, daily to serve God; to be diligent and pleasing to your master, and to be wary that, at no man's instance, you press him with many suits; because they are not your friends that urge those things upon you, but have private ends of their own, which are not fit for you. So praying God to bless you, I rest your very loving father,

"G. CANT.

Lambeth, 10th Dec., 1615.

"To my very loving son, Sir George Villiers, Knight, and gentleman of his Majesty's Bed-chamber."

The dazzling rapidity of Buckingham's rise is perhaps unexampled in the annals of favouritism. Within a few short years, he was knighted, made a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, created Baron of Whaddon and Viscount Villiers, Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Buckingham; received the Order of the Garter, and the appointments of Master of the Horse, Chief Justice in Eyre, Warden of the Cinque Ports, Master of the King's Bench Office, Steward of the Manor of Hampton Court, Lord High Admiral of England, Steward of Westminster, Constable of Windsor, and Chancellor of the University of Cambridge.*

* Buckingham was appointed cup-bearer, and received into the king's household in 1613. On St. George's day, 1615, he was knighted, made a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and had an annuity of a thousand pounds settled on him out of the Court of Wards. At New Year's tide following, he received the appointment of Master of the Horse, and in July, 1616, was installed Knight of the Garter. On the 22d of August, in the same year, he was created Baron of Whaddon, in the county of Bucks, and Viscount Villiers. On the 5th of January, 1617, he was made Earl of Buckingham, and a privy councillor; and in March, accompanying the king to Scotland, he was sworn of the privy council of that kingdom. He was created Earl of Coventry and Duke of Buckingham, 18th May, 1623. We find his titles thus fulsomely emblazoned:

"The right high, and right mighty Prince, George Villiers, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Buckingham; Earl of Coventry, Viscount Villiers, Baron of Whaddon; Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the Principality of Wales; Governor of all the Castles and Sea-forts, and of the Royal Navy; Master of the Horse to his Majesty; Lord Warden, Chancellor, and Admiral of the Cinque Ports, and the members thereof; Constable of the Castle of Dover; Justice in Eyre of all his Majesty's forests, parks, and chaces on this side of the river Trent; Constable of the royal castle of Windsor; Gentleman of the King's Bed-Chamber; Counsellor of Estate of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter; Lord Presition of his majesty, and the ducks, teal, and widgeon firing a royal salute!"

We delight in ducks. There is one little fellow in particular—black and all black, with an orange eye, and a crest like that of the peewit growing out of its occiput—who is perfectly irresistible. And that poor, ragged, attenuated old lady, with her large small family of thirteen downy ducklings—why, that poor family would eat a quarter loaf to their own cheek, and never be a whit the fuller. Pray, Mrs. Duck, do you happen to be aware that there is now exhibiting in Pall Mall, a steam young-duck manufactory, where all you have to do, when you want poultry, is to drop an egg into the engine, and after a few turns of the fly-wheel, out comes a delicious duckling, ready for the spit, and, to save trouble, stuffed beforehand with sage and onions!

We delight in ducks—young ducks especially, if associated, as young ducks should ever be, with the tenderest marrow peas, and stuffed scientifically;—but even while alive, your duck is a comical-looking rascal. There is an expression in his half-closed, wicked little eye, particularly when he winks, that stamps him a rum fellow; if he be not a humorist, then is there no tittle of truth in physiognomy.

Fond as we are of ducks, however, we are sorry to see them here, where their presence operates to the exclusion of human beings from the park. We are in no very good humour when we observe the verdant-coated verderers of the office of Woods and Forests, cutting away with ratans at poor little nursery girls and their helpless charges, who crowd round the gate of the inclosure; and all, forsooth, lest harm should arrive to the rum Duck Society's outlandish poultry! We tell the rum Duck Society, in plain terms, that the exclusion of one individual from a breath of the fresh air, or from an hour's repose on the green turf, is a greater public loss than if the necks were twisted off their whole exotic rookery! What business have a parcel of noblemen and gentlemen to convert a public place of recreation like this into an aquatic zoological garden, if, by so doing, the laws respecting admission become more stringent, and the public, or part and parcel thereof, are excluded? Why do not they, with their ducks and ducklings, geese and goslings, betake themselves to the society of their brother naturals in the Regent's Park?

We are sorry to observe, too, that there is much insolence displayed by the green men who keep the gates, towards decent poor people, who may be desirous of taking a mouthful of fresh air within the inclosure.

Do these fellows recollect that themselves and their masters, the grounds they are appointed to protect, and the green coats they wear, are bought, fed, maintained, and paid for by the taxation, direct and indirect, contributed from the sweat of the brow of that very poor fellow, among others, this moment repulsed from the gate—for no reason on earth that I can discover, save that, like myself, circumstances incline him to a preference of a four-and-ninepenny hat, or because, like myself, he may be disinclined to wear goat-skin on his fingers?

We venture to hint to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, what it is altogether unlikely persons of their class would ever discover by their own natural capacity, that although a man may walk under a four-and-ninepenny hat, he is not, therefore, necessarily a highwayman; or that, although he may not have goat-skin on his fingers, does it follow that he intends to insinuate his digits into the pockets of every body he may happen to meet? We should be sorry to see St. James's Park appropriated to the exclusive use of the gentility-mongers.

The gentility-mongers are already in possession of Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park; surely these are sufficient for the pedestrian and equitative wants of

"The twice two thousand for whom earth was made."

And surely St. James's Park may be opened to every body, however humble, whose dress and deportment do not outrage public decency. We hope the Commissioners of Woods and Forests will have pity upon decent poor people, and that there may be no official prejudice against them because they are industrious, and the producers of our national wealth and tax-created splendour. It does our heart good, on the first Sunday in spring, to see the decent artisan, his respectable industrious wife, and too or three homely toddling little children, issue from the dusky alley in which they have toiled the tedious winter through, to inhale a mouthful of the Almighty's untaxed air, and to refresh their brick-confounded eyes with a bit of nature's unadulterated green. A chancellor of the exchequer, to be sure, would rather see the whole family in a gin-shop, for the sake of the revenue, and because the budget would be all the better for it; but, the Lord be praised, we are not a chancellor of the exchequer!

Another turn up the Mall, and at the angle formed by the southern and western sides of the enclosure of the Duke of Sutherland—a piece of ground large enough to spread her apron on, as Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, said of it—we find an entrance into the enclosure of

THE GREEN PARK,

Which we propose to circumbulate, strolling leisurely up the eastern acclivity, to the reservoir—thence descending the shady, and, but for the racket of the neighbouring Piccadilly, retired walk down to where Rosamond's Pond was formerly situated, and where a number of umbrageous elms still encircle the spot; thence, ascending once again by the ranger's house, with its tastefully laid out enclosure, we emerge on the far famed Constitution Hill, and pause awhile to look about us. This little park has its own peculiar beauties—lies well open to the south, and possesses, in a very limited space, an agreeable undulation of surface; from hence we see the "Toad-in-the-Hole" to least disadvantage, and have a fine view of the low-lying St. James's Park; behind which rise, in lofty majesty, the twin-towers of Westminster Abbey, giving dignity and elevation to the view. Over the Queen's Garden, of which we are permitted barely a glimpse, the Surrey hills are dimly visible above the conglomerated accumulation of habitations that make up the bulk of Pimlico.

"On the northwest side of the queen's palace," says Lambert, "is the Green Park, which extends from St. James's Palace to Piccadilly; from the latter of which it is separated, in some places, by a wall, and by an iron railing in others. The ranger's lodge, at the top of the hill, fronting towards Piccadilly, with its grounds and private gardens, forms a very picturesque object, and is seen to advantage from the ride on the south side of the park towards Constitution Hill. This park contributes greatly towards the pleasantness of the surrounding houses that are situated so as to command a view of it."

On a sunny summer's afternoon the view from this spot is one of great animation—the royal standard floats lazily over the marble arch of Buckingham Palace, in front of which hundreds upon hundreds of well-dressed persons of both sexes are congregated, in patient expectation of her majesty's return from her usual ride. Myriads are everywhere reclining on the green sward, while the privileged classes, having the entrée of St. James's Park, are careering in their carriages and on horseback towards the grand point of social attraction—the magic circle of fashion in Hyde Park.

The magnificent approach to London by Hyde Park Corner, is seen from this place to the greatest advantage—the triumphal arch on this side—the noble entrance to Hyde Park on that, with the colossal statue of Achilles seen through one of the arches—the long line of noble mansions in Piccadilly, terminated towards the park by Apsley House. Crossing the road as soon as the almost uninterrupted succession of carriages entering the park will permit us, we make our appearance on a Sunday afternoon in July—the height of the fashionable season—in

HYDE PARK.

"Hyde Park," says Lambert, "is a royal demesne, at the west extremity of the metropolis, extending between the great western road on the south side, and the road to Oxford on the north to Kensington. It is part of the ancient manor of Hida, which belonged to the monastery of St. Peter at Westminster, till, in the reign of King Henry VIII., it became the property of the crown. It was originally much larger than it is at present, having been reduced since the survey in 1662, when it contained 620 acres, by enclosing Kensington Gardens, and by grants of land between Hyde Park Corner and Park Lane, for building on. According to a survey taken in 1790, the present extent is three hundred and ninety-four acres, two roods, and thirty-eight perches.

"The scenery of this park is very pleasing, and its natural beauties will be greatly heightened when the plantations made in it lately have reached maturity. The Serpentine River at the west end is a fine sheet of water, formed by Queen Caroline in the year 1730, by enclosing the head of the stream, which, taking its rise to the northwest of Bayswater, on the Uxbridge road, passes through Kensington Gardens and this park, and falls into the Thames near Ranelagh.

"On the north side of the Serpentine River is a cluster of houses for the keepers and deputy-rangers of the park, which, by being built on the edge of a grove of tall oaks, forms a pleasing and picturesque object in the landscape. The one nearest the river is built of timber and plaster, and is of considerable antiquity. It was known by the name of the Cake House in the beginning of the last century, and probably much earlier. In the garden belonging to this house is the building erected by the home secretary as a receiving-house for such as are unfortunately drowned in the neighbouring river.

"At the northwest corner of this park is a very beautiful enclosed eminence, called Buckden Hill, which, being only separated from Kensington Gardens by a ha-ha—seems to be only a part of it. On the declivity of this hill is a grove, in which are two chalybeate springs. There is a footpath across the road to Kensington Gardens.

"On the south side of the park are very handsome barracks for the Royal Horse Guards. And on this side are two carriage roads to Kensington, one of which is better known by the name of Rotten Row.

"These have become the resort of the fashionable world instead of the ring, and are much resorted to on Sundays.

"The open part of the park was much resorted to, till lately, for the field-days and reviews of the horse and foot guards, as also for those of the volunteers, by which the sward of it was so much injured, that it had become a dry sandy plain, with scarcely a vestige of verdure. At present, however, these exercises are forbidden, and the surface of the park is sown with grass seeds, and covered with the mud taken from the bed of the Serpentine river, which will restore it to its pristine beauty."

This is truly a noble place—more extensive than the Green Park and the Park of St. James's put together. It unites the gentle and varied diversity of surface of the one with the umbrageous shade of the other. The trees, too, have dignity in their decay, and the tout ensemble is that of a park of some noble house in the olden time—a thing not to be manufactured in a hurry. What a mob of people in carriages and on horseback; and what an admiring congregation of envious pedestrians, who console themselves for the want of an equipage in finding fault with the equipages of others, and flattering themselves when they do have a turn-out, they will do the trick in a superior style! Dreadful thing that gentlemen and ladies with so much taste should be in so much want of money, and find their chief consolation in observing how very badly monied people lay their money out!

That fine-looking man on the black horse—him, I mean, in the coat of indescribable green—I say indescribable green, for it is neither bottle-green, pea-green, apple-green, olive-green, grass-green, nor invisible-green—who sits his horse sympathetically, as if he were part and parcel of the animal—is Count D'Orsay. Close at his heels you may observe a youth in a Chesterfield hat, with a gold chain wound twice round his neck, dipping into his waistcoat pocket, and coming out again. He joggles on his animal, and has an anxious expression of countenance, as if he were about to undergo some dreadful surgical operation, but which, doubtless, is derived from an apprehension that the waistband of his Sunday breeches is going to crack—that is Fitz-Wiggins, son to old Wiggins, the retired cow-keeper, of Canonbury Row, Islington. I know the fellow well. He is a gentility-monger; spends all his time and all his money in smelling after fashionable people; but, with all his exertions, the highest approach he ever made to genteel society was getting into the Garrick Club. He has a good horse, you see, and seems as much at home upon it as if he were mounted on one of his paternal cows. Alas, poor Wiggins!

There goes Count D'Orsay again. The more I look at him, the more I am surprised at the despotic authority that accomplished gentleman has long exercised in matters of dress. He is faultless, to be sure; I cannot say he is over-dressed, and it is equally clear that he is not under-dressed. Still there is something about him that does not fulfil my preconceived idea of the rig-out of a perfect gentleman. His coat-collar is too much detached, which gives to the upper part of his figure an air of singularity—of a pretension to unapproachable perfection—which, of all things, your English gentleman studies to avoid. The pantaloons, too, embracing the hoby round the sole, and hardly exhibiting the toe, however well calculated to throw out the symmetrical leg in bold relief, gives to the foot something of a slippered air. But it is in the accompaniments of his habit that the Count D'Orsay mainly excels. No man living has such exquisite taste in the details. What expression in that hat! What tone, harmony, and keeping in that vest! What grace and elegance in the drapery of that stock! The count is acknowledged to be, I had almost said, superhuman in stocks! Pray, observe, if you please, sir, the style of the count's spur. That spur, let me tell you, was designed by the count himself. It was the admiration of everybody, and the maker calculated on gaining a fortune by it. But would you believe it, as soon as one pair had been cast for the heels of the count himself, he ordered the moulds, patterns, and drawings to be brought home to him; had them broken up before his face, and with his own hands committed the fragments to the flames!

NEW BOOKS.

History of the United States, from their settlement as Colonies to the close of the Administration of Mr. Madison, 1817. By Salma Hale. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1840, 2 volumes.

The History of England, from the earliest period to 1839. By Thomas Keightley, with notes by the American Editor. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1840, 5 vols.

Universal History, from the Creation of the World to the decease of George III, 1820. By Hon. Alexander Frazer Tytler and Edward Nares, D. D. New York, Harper and Brothers, 1840, 6 vols.

The thirteen volumes, of which the titles are given above, form a most interesting and valuable addition to the Family Library and the School Library of the Messrs. Harpers. Hale's United States, which has long been esteemed one of the best school histories; and has been once printed without acknowledgment, and once outrageously printed in London, has now been carefully rewritten by the author, and expanded into the proper size for the Library. It is a good, sound history and will be so considered, notwithstanding that the publishers of Mr. Bancroft's work gravely inform the public in one of their announcements, that that gentleman's is the only history of the United States, which has ever been written. They will probably in process of time, arrive at the conclusion, that Mr. Bancroft is the only man living in the present age.

The History of England, by Mr. Keightley, is one of the most readable and agreeable books we have taken up for a long time. It steers clear of the ultra loyalty of Hume, and the sectarian bigotry of Lingard; and is a much better guide in the real history of England than any of the numerous works which have been written under the influence of strong political partialities. It is of precisely the proper size to be read through by the participants in the benefits conferred by the school library system: and it will doubtless enliven and inform many and many a cheerful fireside circle in the country.

The Universal History of Tytler, was necessary to afford a general view of history to the readers of the school library. This has long been considered a standard work. It is a good sign to see works like these obtaining a wide spread circulation. The taste for history which they will inspire, will be one of the most efficient means of extirpating the passion for trashy reading which is too prevalent in our country.

Now, Echo, on what's religion grounded?
Roundhead!
Who's its professor most considerable?
Rabble!
How do these prove themselves to be the godly?
Oddly!
But they in life are known to be the holy.
O lie!
Do they not learning from their doctrine sever?

How stand they affected to the government civil?
Evil!

Lie all!
Then God keep king and state from these same men.

CHARACTER OF THE DUCHESS OF MAZARIN.

I am unjustly accused for having too great a complaisance for Madam Mazarin: for in truth, there is no person that she has greater reason to complain of, than myself. For six months together I have been maliciously spying out something in her, which might displease me, but in spite of all my endeavours, I could discover nothing there that was not too lovely, and too charming. An ill-natured curiosity makes me examine every feature in her face, with a design either to meet there some shocking irregularity, or some disgusting disagreeableness. But how unluckily do I succeed in my design! every feature about her has a particular beauty, that does not in the least yield to that of her eyes, which by the consent of all the world are the finest in the universe. One thing there is that entirely confounds me: her teeth, her lips, her mouth, and all the graces that attend it, are lost amongst the great variety of beauties in her face: but if we compare them to these fine mouths, that make the greatest charm of those persons whom we most admire, they drown, and eclipse every thing else, and what's but indifferent in her, will not suffer us to consider what's most remarkable in others. The malice of my curiosity does not stop here. I proceed to spy out some defect in her shape; and I find I know not what graces of nature so happily, and so liberally scattered in her person, that the genteelness of others only seems to be constraint and affectation.

When Madam Mazarin pleases me too much in her negligence, I advise her to have recourse to art, hoping that her ornaments and her dress will not fail to ruin her native charms: but scarce has she dressed herself, but I am forced to confess, that I never saw in any person so great and so noble an air as hers. Nor is my ill-nature satisfied with this. I have a mind to see her in her chamber, amongst her dogs, her monkeys, and her birds, hoping that the disorder of her dress, will make her lose the majesty of that beauty, that astonished us at court. But here it is, that she is a hundred times more amiable; here it is, that a more natural charm gives us a disgust to all that art and industry can do; here it is that the freedom of her wit and of her humour leaves none to the person that beholds her.

What could the greatest of her enemies do more? I wish some sickness might invade her to undermine her graces: but, alas! we are more to be pitted than she in her pains. Her very pains have a charm that does us a greater mischief, than the sufferer by them.

After having relented and grieved at her indisposition, I endeavour to give her an occasion to abuse me, that I may be exasperated against her: with this design I purposely contradict all she says; I provoke her anger by contention; I put her in the way to wrong me at play; I suggest to myself all the means of my oppression that I may be furnished with a pretence for a real resentment. But, alas! to what purpose is all this troublesome industry? Her ill treatment pleases instead of provoking; and her injuries, more charming than the caresses of others, are so many charms, that enslave me to her will. I pass from her serious moments, to those of her gaiety; for as I am sometimes willing to see her serious, out of hopes to find her less agreeable; so am I desirous to see her more free, thinking to find her indiscreet. But when she's serious, she makes us admire her good sense; when free and jovial, her sprightliness.

She knows as much as a man can know; and she conceals her knowledge with all the discretion that becomes a prudent woman. She has some acquired learning, which never betrays the study she employed to gain it. She has some happy thoughts, that are as far from an affected art that displeases us, as from a natural luxuriance that offends us.

I have seen some ladies that have made conquests by the advantage of their beauty, and lost them again through a defect of wit. I have seen others that engaged us to them, by being beautiful and witty together; but discouraged us from a farther pursuit by their indiscretion, fickleness and avarice. But in Madam Mazarin, if you pass from her face to her wit, from the qualities of her mind to those of her soul, you will find that every thing attracts you, that every thing fastens and binds you, and that nothing can disengage you. We defend ourselves from the charms of other ladies by our reason: but 'tis reason that subjects us to her power. With other ladies our love generally begins where our reason ends: here our love cannot end, unless we lose our reason.

What I observe to be most extraordinary in Madam Mazarin, is, that she daily inspires new desires; and that after a long familiarity, she makes us feel all the tender sweetness of a growing passion. She is the only person of her sex, for whom we may be eternally constant; and with whom one may enjoy every hour the diversion of inconstancy. We never change for her person: we change every moment for her features; and relish, in some manner, all that new, that lively joy, which unfaithfulness in love makes us feel.

Sometimes her mouth is abandoned for her eyes; sometimes we leave her eyes to admire her mouth, her cheeks, her nose, her eyebrows, her forehead, her hair, nay, her ears, (so much pains has nature taken to make every thing perfect in this beautiful body!) her ears attract our inclinations in their turn, and make us taste the pleasure of change. To consider her features separately, one would be apt to say, that there is a secret jealousy between them; and that they are still upon the watch to steal lovers from one another: to consider them in conjunction, and as they are united and joined together, we see them form a beauty, that neither suffers inconstancy for itself, nor fidelity for others.—M. St. Evremond.

This celebrated beauty was Hortensia Mancini, niece to the Cardinal Mazarin and heiress of his estate. A match was in project for some time between her and Charles II., but her uncle not trusting to the permanency of Charles's Restoration, refused the offer and married her with one of the richest noblemen of the court, the Duke de la Meilleraye, with the condition of his taking the name and arms of Mazarin. This duke was a man of a grovelling and mean spirit, sullen, ill-tempered and superstitious. Several examples are given of his fantastical bigotry; among others, he caused one of Madam de Richlieu's children to be brought up with express prohibition to the nurse from suckling it on Fridays. From this husband, and the monks and devotees by whom he was besieged, and upon whom he squandered his estate, she suffered unheard of persecutions for five years, and then eloped. St. Evremond says, "Heaven had already made the separation by the contrariety of their humours, by the opposition of their tempers, by the greatness of the one's soul and the meanness of the other's; and nature had separated them by a beauty in one that charms, and an aspect in the other that disgusts." For three years she fixed her abode at Chamberry, and there bestowed much of her time in reading and cultivating her excellent natural wit and understanding; and had the advantage of a celebrated master, the Abbot of St. Real, (the French Sallust) who conversed with her every day, and selected and read for her the best books, French and Italian; besides falling in love with her, as every one else, and writing her memoirs. Her beauty did not allow her to remain here long in obscurity. Persons of the greatest merit and quality at the court of Savoy, neglecting the service of the prince, attached themselves to that of Madam Mazarin, and considerable persons of remote countries pretended a voyage to Italy to furnish themselves an opportunity of seeing her. Among others the Baron Bannier, a Swedish gentleman, fell passionately in love with her, and as the affection grew to be mutual, Prince Philip, also a lover, becoming jealous, challenged the baron and killed him in a duel. Madam was disconsolate on this occasion, hung her apartments in black and excluded her nearest friends. In short, she experienced so much sorrow, that she resolved to go to Spain, and retire into the same convent with her sister, also separated from her husband, the Constable Colonna—but she did not. Monsieur de St. Evremond wrote her such an eloquent homily about the mortifications of convents and nunneries, that she abandoned her design and Chamberry, and came over to England, where she so pleased king Charles, that he settled a pension on her of 4000*l.* sterling; and it depended only on her to have won the highest place in this monarch's heart—but the Prince of Monaco came about this time to England, young, handsome, and accomplished in all the little arts that please ladies, and became her passionate admirer; to whose courtship she was not insensible, and his majesty in a fit of jealousy, took away her pension, and then gave it back, and she renounced her attachment to the Prince of Monaco.

She used to spend the fine English summers at Chelsea, a village on the Thames, about three miles from London, which became the rendezvous of many distinguished persons, who paid their court to her. The English women, who were in possession of the empire of beauty, saw it lost to this stranger not without envy and regret; but she so won in a short time, even her bitterest enemies, by the charms of her conversation and amenity of manners, that, from envying, they imitated and loved her. Her house, which "caused all other houses to be deserted" is thus described by St. Evremond.

"The greatest freedom in the world is to be seen there and an equal discretion; every one is more commodiously entertained than at home, and more respectfully than at court. 'Tis diversion only that induces play, and no concern is seen in the faces of the losers. Play is followed by the best repasts in the world.

"One may there see every thing that comes from France for the delicate; and all that comes from the Indies for the curious; even the common meats become rare by the exquisite relish which is bestowed upon them. 'Tis not such a plenty as may make us fear a dissipation; 'tis not a frugality that shows either avarice or penury. The management of her house is not so niggard and sullen, as to content itself merely with satisfying the necessities of life, and afford nothing to the pleasures of it. She loves a good order that furnishes every thing that can be desired, and that wisely manages the use of it; so that nothing may be wanting. There is certainly nothing so well regulated as this family: but Madam Mazarin diffuses throughout the whole, I do not know what sort of an easy air; something free and natural that conceals the regulation of it. One would conclude that things moved of themselves, so secret is the ordering of them, and so difficult to be perceived.

"Let Madam Mazarin change her lodgings, and the difference of places is insensible: wherever she goes, we see nothing but her; and if we see her we see everything. They never come soon enough, and never depart late enough: they go to bed with regret to have left her, and they rise with desire to behold her afresh."

Madam Mazarin died on the 22d of June, 1699, aged fifty-three years. Time having yet made no impression upon her incomparable beauty.

POINTS OF GENTOO LAW.

[Extracted from a translation of the Gentoo Code by Mr. Nathaniel Brassey Halhed, made during the government of Warren Hastings.]

The venerable principle of legitimate government and paternal sway, we find, at the outset, enforced in a very emphatic manner. "Providence," says the ancient legislator, "created the magistrate for the guardianship of all. The magistrate must not be considered as a mere man; even in the case of the magistrate being a child, he must still be looked upon in the light of the Dewtah, or Deity; in truth, the magistrate is the Dewtah in a human form, born in this world. Providence created punishment for the preservation of the magistrate." It is only proper that so sublime a personage as the magistrate should be properly accounted, and he is accordingly enjoined to cause to be made for himself a round umbrella, of the feathers of the bird lut, or the peacock. When provided with this appendage, he is in a proper situation to consult with his councillors, "whereupon," says the law, "he shall choose a retired place, on the top of the house, or on the top of a mountain, or in the desert, or some such secret recess, and shall hold his council there: and in places where there are parrots or other talkative birds, he shall not hold his council while they are present." To this provident caution against the loquaciousness of the feathered race, the law adds two injunctions, which are highly necessary to be observed in all legitimate governments. Hypocrisy and treachery are the virtues of this good old form of government; and therefore "the magistrate shall keep such a guard upon himself, that his foibles may never be discovered, and by sending his spies, he shall inform himself of the faults of others."

The methods prescribed for attaining that very desirable but often very difficult object, viz. the recovery of debts, are curious.—"If a creditor on the day appointed for payment, demands his money of the debtor, who refuses to discharge the debt," first he shall treat the matter with some delicacy, and trying what indirect influence will do, "he shall speak to the friends and relations of the debtor, and procure them to demand payment." If this proves unsuccessful, his next step is to pounce "with one fell swoop," on the wife and "all the little ones" of the defendant: "if he cannot by evasive means, distrain the debtor's goods, he shall then seize and confine the debtor's wife, children, cattle, buffaloes, horses, and such kind of useful animals; also his pots, clothes, mats, and furniture; and seating himself at the debtor's door, shall there receive his money." If even these fierce extremes are unable to overcome the obstinacy or the poverty of the debtor, nothing remains to be tried but the ultima ratio of all plaintiffs, the last and plenary remedy of the capias ad satisfaciendum; "he shall seize and bind the debtor's person, and procure, by forcible means, a discharge of the debt."

The mode of examining witnesses is as follows:—"He who means to question a witness, having bathed himself, shall put his questions in the tenth ghurrie of the day; the witness also, having bathed himself, and turned himself towards the eastern or northern quarter, shall deliver his evidence: the examiner shall ask the witness, (if a Bramin) with civility and respect, saying, 'explain to me what knowledge you have of this affair;' and to a Chehteree, he shall say, 'what do you know of this affair? speak the truth!' and to a Bice, he shall say, 'what do you know of this affair? if you give false evidence, whatever crime there is in stealing kine, or gold, or paddee, or wheat, or gram, or barley, or mustard, and such kind of grain, shall be accounted to you;' and to a Sooder, he shall say, 'what do you know of this affair? speak; if your evidence is false, whatever crime is the greatest in the world, that crime shall be accounted to you.'" Here we may observe, that the law only requires the Bramin, or fine gentleman, to be interrogated with civility and respect; the poor Sooder may be examined and cross-examined in the usual manner.

Against the utterance of "scandalous and bitter words," the provisions of the law are very minute. "If a man be deficient in a hand, or a foot, or an ear, or an eye, or a nose, or any other member, and a person of an equal cast, and of equal abilities with him, should say to him, in a reproachful manner, 'you are deficient in a hand, or a foot, or an ear, or an eye, or a nose, or any other member,' or should say to him, 'such limb of yours is very beautiful,' the magistrate shall fine him twelve puns of cowries." To prognosticate the death of great men has always been a dangerous undertaking, and we find this offence expressly prohibited: "if any man should say, that, 'the magistrate will die at such a particular time,' the magistrate shall fine that person eight hundred puns." This would not be an aggravated penalty in our city of Philadelphia. Quere. May not the word punished be derived from the Gentoo? A proper degree of humility and of respectful deference, on the part of the plebeian, towards the man of rank and fashion, is sharply insisted on: "If a man of inferior cast, proudly affecting an equality with a person of superior cast, should speak at the same time with him, the magistrate, in that case, shall fine him to the extent of his abilities."

The magistrate, we have seen, is a very sacred personage, and it seems, can do no wrong. To punish him for the commission of a crime, is in itself a crime, which the worthy magistrate takes care to visit with a signal retaliation. "If a magistrate has committed a crime, and any person, upon the discovery of that crime, should beat and ill-use the magistrate, in that case, whatever be the crime of murdering one hundred Bramins, such crime shall be accounted to that person; and the magistrate shall thrust an iron spit through him, and roast him at the fire!" A similar spirit of cruelty pervades all the criminal law. "Whoever, by breaking through walls, hath frequently stolen much wealth, the magistrate shall cause the booty to be returned to the owner, and shall cut off both the hands of such person, and crucify him. If a man steals any small animal, exclusive of the cat and the weasel, the magistrate shall cut off half his foot." Mutilation and agonising punishments are dealt unsparingly to the human species, but the inferior classes of life are carefully protected from injury. "If a man kills a fish, the magistrate shall fine him ten puns of cowries. If a man kills an insect, the magistrate shall fine him one pun of cowries." The same law that uses very little ceremony in impaling a man, anxiously guards against the demolition of a fly!

The chapter "Of what concerns women," contains a string of very bitter libels upon the fair sex, in excuse for which, it is urged by the translator, that the Bramins, who compiled the code, were men far advanced in years, and that the old gentlemen had lost, with their youth, their

These favours were all heaped upon him by James. Charles, on his accession to the throne, had little but his affection to add to such a pageant.

Buckingham's magnificence was at least equal to his illustrious fortunes. Imagination can conceive nothing more splendid than the entertainments, the public display, and indeed the personal appearance of this favourite of fortune. His jewels were alone valued at three hundred thousand pounds. "It was common with him," we are told, "at an ordinary dancing, to have his clothes trimmed with great diamond buttons, and to have diamond hat-bands, cockades, and ear-rings; to be yoked with great and manifold ropes and knots of pearl: in short, to be manacled, fettered, and imprisoned in jewels; inasmuch, that at his going over to Paris, in 1625, he had twenty-seven suits of clothes made, the richest that embroidery, lace, silk, velvet, gold, and gems, could contribute; one of which was a white uncut velvet, set all over, both suit and cloak, with diamonds valued at fourscore thousand pounds, besides a great feather, stuck all over with diamonds; as were also his sword, girdle, hat-band, and spurs." Buckingham was the first person who was carried about in a sedan chair. The circumstance caused a great sensation at the time; the vulgar attributing it to his pride, and railing at him as he passed through the streets. "It was a shame," they said, "that men should be brought to as servile condition as horses."²

Another incident which added greatly to his unpopularity, was the circumstance of his having his coach drawn by six horses; a memorable instance of his splendour, when we remember that only forty years had elapsed since coaches were first introduced into England.[†] When the fact was related to the old Earl of Northumberland, (the "stout earl," as he is called,) he said that if Buckingham was drawn by six horses, he had at least a right to eight; with which number he actually drove through the streets, to the great contentment of the citizens.

These indeed are but trivial illustrations of Buckingham's magnificence; but it would be difficult to do justice to the refined taste, the unparalleled splendour, which characterised the entertainments of York House;—"those entertainments," says D'Israeli, which "combined all the picture of ballet-dances with the voice of music, the charms of the verse of Jonson, the scenic machinery of Inigo Jones, and the variety of fanciful devices of Gerbier." Bassompierre, whose judgment in matters of taste was unrivaled, describes one of Buckingham's entertainments as the most splendid he had ever seen. "The king," he says, "supped at one table with the queen and me, which was served by a complete ballet at each course with sundry representations—changes of scenery, tables, and music: the duke waited on the king at table, the Earl of Carlisle on the queen, and the Earl of Holland on me. After supper, the king and we were led into another room, where the assembly was, and one entered it by a kind of turnstile, as in convents, without any confusion, where there was a magnificent ballet, in which the duke danced, and afterwards we set to and danced country dances till four in the morning; thence we were shown into vaulted apartments, where there were five different collations." This would appear to be the identical entertainment, the description of which Mr. D'Israeli has extracted from the Sloane MSS., and published in his Curiosities of Literature. "Last Sunday at night, the duke's grace entertained their majesties and the French ambassador at York House with great feasting and show, where all things came down in clouds; amongst which, one rare device was a representation of the French king and the two queens, with their chiefest attendants, and so to the life that the queen's majesty could name them. It was four o'clock in the morning before they parted, and then the king and queen, together with the French ambassador, lodged there. Some estimate this entertainment at five or six thousand pounds."

The duke's cabinet of pictures and works of art were valuable and choice in the extreme. Gerbier writes to his master, 8th February, 1625. "Sometimes, when I am contemplating the treasure of rarities which your excellency has in so short a time amassed, I cannot but feel astonishment in the midst of my joy. For out of all the amateurs, and princes, and kings, there is not one who has collected in forty years as many pictures as your excellency has collected in five. Let enemies and people ignorant of paintings say what they will, they cannot deny that pictures are noble ornaments, a delightful amusement, and histories that one may read without fatigue. Our pictures, if they were to be sold a century after our death, would sell for good cash, and for three times more than they have cost. I wish I could only live a century, if they were sold, to be able to laugh at those facetious folk, who say it is money cast away for baubles and shadows: I know they will be pictures still, when those ignorants will be less than shadows." For a collection which had been made by Rubens, the duke gave ten thousand pounds; and he had also employed Sir Henry Wotton, when ambassador at Venice, to purchase for him the most valuable productions of the great masters. For one of the pictures of Titian, the Ecce Homo, Lord Arundal offered him 7000*l.* either in money or land. In this picture were introduced likenesses of the Pope, Charles the Fifth, and Solymán the magnificent. When the duke's cabinet came to be disposed of during the civil broils, this fine work of art was purchased by the Archduke Leopold, and placed in the castle of Prague. Buckingham's encouragement of the fine arts was not confined to pictures. When he was sent to the States, to negotiate for the restitution of the Palatinate, he purchased for a large sum the curious collection of Arabic MSS. by Erpinus the linguist, which he afterwards bequeathed to the University of Cambridge.

There can be no doubt indeed but that Buckingham both appreciated and patronised talent. Without any apparent motive but the fame which his abilities had acquired for him, the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury obtained his appointment as ambassador to Paris at Buckingham's hands. When Lord Herbert shortly afterwards became involved in one of those scrapes which his chivalrous sense of honour was continually entailing on him, Buckingham took his part, and protected him from the serious consequences of the king's displeasure. It was owing also to his fine taste, in conjunction with that of his royal master, that Rubens, Vandyke, and Gerbier, were attracted to England, and that Inigo Jones supported the national character by his genius. When will such a period again arrive? Not till we have a new Charles and another Buckingham.

In forming our estimate of the accomplishments of Buckingham, and the brilliant figure which he presented at two succeeding courts, we must bear in mind his exquisite elegance and beauty, which rendered him the idol of the fair sex, and the envy of his own. James, as is well known, conferred on him the familiar name of Steenie. He alluded to the passage (Acts vi. 15.) where it is said of St. Stephen, that, "All that sat in the council looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel;" from whence the king chose to confer on his favourite the not very appropriate name of Stephen, and thence by corruption Steenie. Bishop Goodman, who was well acquainted with him, draws the following sketch of his person and character:—"Buckingham," he says, "of all others was most active; he had a very lovely complexion; he was the handsomest bodied man of England; his limbs so well compacted, and his conversation so pleasing, and of so sweet a disposition. And truly his intellectuals were very great; he had a sound judgment, and was of a quick apprehension; inasmuch that I have heard it from two men, and very great men, (neither of them had gotten so little as 36,000*l.* per annum by the court,) whom of all men in the world Buckingham had most wronged,—yet I had heard both those men say and give him this testimony, that he was inwardly beautiful, as he was outwardly, and that the world had not a more ingenious gentleman, or words to that effect."

Sir Symonds D'Ewes mentions the occasion of a tilting-match at Whitehall, when he had the opportunity of watching Buckingham closely for about half an hour; the duke being, at the time, in earnest conversation with some French noblemen. "I saw every thing in him," he says, "full of delicacy and handsome features; yea, his hands and feet seemed to be especially effeminate and curious." It is possible he seemed the more accomplished, because the French Monseurs that had invested him were very swarthy hard-featured men. Clarendon, and indeed every writer of the period, bears the same testimony to Buckingham's uncommon beauty. It would seem, however, by his later portraits, that it lasted but with the period of early youth.

Buckingham was only once married. His wife was Catherine, daughter of Francis Earl of Rutland. According to Arthur Wilson, the duke had in the first instance seduced her from her father's house, and after keeping her for some time in his lodgings, returned her to her family. The blood of the earl was naturally roused, and he sent a message to Buckingham that if he did not instantly marry his daughter, his greatness should be no protection to him. Buckingham eventually consented to repair the lady's honour, and they were accordingly married. As Lady Catherine, however, was the richest heiress in England, it is singular that Buckingham should not dent of the Council of War; Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; and Lord General of his Majesty's forces in the Isle of Rhee."—Granger, vol. ii. p. 278.

* Wilson, p. 131. Evelyn tells us, in his Diary, that sedan chairs were first brought to England by Sir Saunders Duncombe. This person, who was gentleman pensioner to Kings James and Charles I., is said to have taken out a patent in 1634; Buckingham, however, may yet have been the first who had the boldness to make use of them.

† The introduction of coaches into England is commonly attributed to Fitzalan, Earl of Arundal, in 1580. It seems, however, that they were first brought from the Netherlands by William Booren, a Dutchman, who presented one to Queen Elizabeth, about the eighth year of her reign. See Hart. Misc. vol. iv. p. 218.—They were first drawn by only two horses.

originally have courted her as a wife instead of a mistress.

The affair is altogether involved in mystery and doubt. That the Earl of Rutland was unwilling to marry his daughter to Buckingham,—that her partiality for the favourite caused her parent to treat her harshly, and that she eventually eloped from her father's house, is evident from the letters which passed between the duke and his future father-in-law, from the period of her flight to that of her marriage. The duke, however, denies in the strongest manner that her honour had suffered at his hands. He writes to the earl:—"I can delay no longer declaring unto you, how unkindly I take your harsh usage of me and your own daughter, which hath wrought this effect in me; that since you esteem so little of my friendship, and her honour, I must now, contrary of my former resolution, leave off the pursuit of that alliance any more, putting it in your free choice to bestow her elsewhere to your best comfort; for, whose fortune it shall ever be to have her, I will constantly profess that she never received any blemish in her honour, but that which came by your own tongue. It is true, I never thought before to have seen the time that I should need to come within the compass of the law, by stealing of a wife against the consent of the parents; considering of the favours that it pleaseth his majesty, though undeservedly, to bestow upon me. So, leaving this to you and your wife's censure, I rest your lordship's servant,

"G. BUCKINGHAM."

The king, it seems, had originally refused his consent to their union, as long as the lady should continue to profess herself a Roman Catholic. The Lord Keeper, Dr. Williams, was selected to effect her conversion, and as the lady's interests were concerned, and her character at stake, he appears to have encountered but little difficulty in performing his task.

Wilson expatiates with much acrimony when he speaks of Buckingham's amours. He says that if the duke's eye "culled out a wanton beauty, he had his setters that could spread his nets, and point a meeting at some lady's house, where he should come as by accident and find access, while all his train attended at the door, as if it were an honourable visit." Peyton, of course, joins in the popular cry. "The duke," he says, "vitiated many virgins, gentle and noble in birth, though vicious for yielding to his lust." But, perhaps, the most singular piece of scandal is that of Sir Symonds D'Ewes. After attacking the duke for his want of devotion, he tells us that, at the sacrament of baptism, at which Buckingham happened to be a spectator, with some young and beautiful women, the minister no sooner came to the passage, where it is required of the sponsors to forsake the carnal lusts of the flesh, than Buckingham began to "wink and smile" at his fair companions, by which the solemnity of the ceremony was entirely destroyed. Such highly coloured accusations are not altogether to be relied upon. Beauty had doubtless its charms for Buckingham, and in all probability his conduct was not immaculate; nevertheless, considering the temptations to which his rank and accomplishments exposed him, his character appears tolerably free from reproach, nor can he reasonably be charged with any violent offence against the laws of society or virtue. Whatever may have been Buckingham's conduct in this particular, at least his own wife was the last to imagine him guilty of the charge. She writes to him during his absence in Spain, 16th July, 1623:

"I am very glad that you have the pearls, and that you like them so well; and am sure they do not help you to win the ladies' hearts. Yourself is a jewel that will win the hearts of all the women in the world; but I am confident it is not in their power to win your heart from a heart that is, was, and ever shall be yours till death. Every body tells me how happy I am in a husband, and how chaste you are; that you will not look at a woman, and yet how they woo you. And Sir Francis Cottington was yesterday telling me, how you made a vow not to touch any woman till you saw me; and though I was confident of it before they told me, yet it is so many cordials to my heart when they tell me of it. God make me thankful to him for giving of me you! Dear love, I did verily hope I should have had a lock of your hair by Killegrew, and I am sorry I had it not; but seeing you have a conceit it may prove unlucky, it is well you sent it not, though I think it but an old wife's tale."

There is reason to believe, from the letters which passed between them, that Buckingham was a most affectionate husband. Sir Henry Wotton tells us that he loved his wife dearly, and the manner in which he disposed of his estates, adds weight to the fact.*

CHAPTER II.

The indomitable pride and headstrong passions of Buckingham, were never more openly displayed, than when he accompanied Charles on his visit to Madrid. The Spaniards were, at least, as much astounded by his insolence, as they were dazzled by his splendour. Spanish etiquette could, with difficulty, comprehend the existence of such a character. They beheld, for the first time, a subject on the most intimate terms of friendship with the prince, his master; the same man placing himself on an equality with their own sovereign, and insulting that sovereign's haughty minister, Olivarez, whenever they came in contact. "He was sometimes covered," says Bishop Hacket, "when the prince was bare; sometimes sitting when the prince stood; capering aloft in sudden fits; and chirping the ends of sonnets."—"He was offensive to the court of Spain in taunting comparisons, and an open derider of their magniloquent phrases and garb of stateliness."

Whatever may have been the original cause of misunderstanding between Buckingham and Olivarez, it is certain that their enmity was implacable; and that, on one occasion, Buckingham deliberately gave the proud Spaniard the lie. They had been discussing the probability of the prince's conversion to the Romish faith, when Olivarez, in the heat of argument, affirmed that Buckingham had given hopes of such a consummation. The duke, in the most direct manner insisted that it was false; adding, that he felt himself bound, in the character of a gentleman, to support the contrary, in whatsoever manner he might be called upon to maintain its truth. Olivarez naturally flew into a passion; but it appears, that out of respect for the person of Charles, he refrained from demanding the satisfaction which, under other circumstances, would have been exacted.

* Wotton says, "he loved her dearly, and well expressed his love in an act and time of no simulation, towards his end bequeathing her all his mansion-houses during her natural life, and a power to dispose of his whole personal estate, together with a fourth part of his lands in jointure."—Reliq. Wotton, p. 236.

There exists a story, which was openly discussed at the time, and which, for some years afterwards, was current in Spain, that attributed the ill-feeling between the two ministers to circumstances of a private nature. Buckingham, it was said, thought proper to make the Countess Olivarez the object of his addresses; but the lady was so far from being flattered by the preference, that she divulged the circumstance to her husband.

It is certain, that Buckingham quitted Madrid without having taken leave of the countess. When he parted from Olivarez, he told him that he should always entertain the kindest feeling towards the royal family of Spain; "but as for you, sir, personally," he added, "I shall make no professions of friendship with you, and you must always expect opposition at my hands." Olivarez turned on his heel, telling him, he accepted what was spoken.

Among the Harleian MSS. are several of the letters which passed between James on the one hand, and Charles and Buckingham on the other, during the period that the latter were absent on their romantic expedition. Those from Madrid are generally subscribed both by Charles and Buckingham, while the king usually addresses them together. The following is a brief specimen of James's mode of writing to the travellers:

"Sweet boys, the news of your going is already so blown abroad, as I am forced, for your safety, to post this bearer, [the Earl of Carlisle] after you, who will give you his best advice and attendance in your journey. God bless you both, my sweet babes, and send you a safe and happy return.

"JAMES R."

The travellers thus describe to James one of the clandestine visits which they paid to the interior of the French court, during their short sojourn at Paris.

"Sir,

"Since the closing of our last, we have been at court again, (and, that we might not hold you in pain, we assure you that we have not been known,) where we saw the young queen, little monsieur, and madame, at the practising of a mask that is intended, by the queen, to be presented to the king, and in it there danced the queen and madame, with as many as made up nineteen fair dancing ladies, amongst which, the queen is the handsomest, which hath wrought in me a greater desire to see her sister. So, in haste, going to bed, we humbly take our leaves and rest,

"Your Majesty's most humble,

"And obedient son and servant,

"CHARLES.

"And your humble slave and dog,

"STEENIE.

"Paris, the 22d of February, 1623."

The old king, no doubt, felt extremely desolate in the absence of his heir and his favourite, and longed fervently for their safe and speedy return. In one of his letters, he writes to his "sweet boys:"—"I wonder why you should ask me the question if ye should send me any more joint letters or not: alack, sweet hearts, it is all my comfort in your absence that ye write jointly unto me, besides the great ease it is, both to me and you; and ye need not doubt but I will be wary enough, in not acquainting my council with any secret in your letters. But I have been troubled with Hamilton, who, being present, by chance, at my receiving both of your first and second packet out of Madrid, would needs peer over my shoulder when I was reading them, offering ever to help me to read any hard words; and, in good faith, he is in this business, as in all things else, as variable and uncertain as the moon."

In this letter James gives his son abundance of good advice. He warns him against being too profuse in his expenditure; enjoins him to be careful of his person at the tilting matches, and to practise dancing in private;* "But," he adds, "the news of your glorious reception makes me afraid that ye will both misken your old dad hereafter." He concludes his letter with the same homely expression. "Thus God keep you, my sweet boys, with my fatherly blessing, and send you a happy successful journey, and a joyful and happy return in the arms of your dear dad."

We have already alluded to the profusion of jewels and other sumptuous presents which were lavished by Charles and Buckingham on the Spanish ladies; however, they were not wrested from the old king without much difficulty and repeated entreaties. The duke, we are told, on state occasions, purposely had his diamonds so loosely set, that, on passing a knot of Spanish beauties, he could easily shake a few off at his will. When these were picked up and offered to be returned to their owner, they were of course gracefully presented to the obliging fair ones. No wonder that the visit of Charles and his handsome favourite is still the theme of admiration in Spain. Sir Henry Ellis has published two original letters from Charles and the favourite, beseeching the old king to send them further supplies of jewels: Buckingham, in a postscript to one of the prince's letters, amusingly adds; "I your dog, say you have many jewels, neither fit for your own, your son's, nor your daughter's wearing, but very fit to bestow on those here who must necessarily have presents; and this way will be least chargeable to your majesty in my poor opinion." Buckingham, in another letter, in which he addresses the king as "Dear dad, gossip and steward," actually presses James to part with some jewels which formed a portion of the king's own wearing apparel: he mentions particularly the king's best hat-band, the Portugal diamond, and the rest of the pendent diamonds, as requisite to make a necklace for the prince to present to his mistress. Buckingham is far from forgetful of his own interests, and takes care to ask for a rich chain or two for himself; or else, he says, your dog will want a collar.

Buckingham's conduct appears to have been as personally displeasing to the Spanish king as it was to his minister Olivarez. According to Howell, who was on the spot, there was indeed some doubt whether the king would not actually refuse to treat with him on the subject of the match. The Earl of Bristol, the English ambassador, writes to the Bishop of Lincoln:—"I know not how things may be reconciled here before my lord duke's departure, but at present they are in all extremely ill, betwixt the king, his ministers, and the duke; and they stick not to profess, that they will rather put the infanta headlong into a well than into his hands." In another letter to the bishop, the earl adds: "I protest unto your lordship as a Christian, that I never heard in all the time of his being here, nor since, any one exception taken against him [Charles], unless it were for being supposed to be too much guided by my lord Duke of Buckingham, who is indeed very little beholden to the Spaniards for their good opinion of him; and departed from hence with so little satisfaction, that the Spaniards are in doubt that he will endeavour all that shall be possible, to cross the marriage." The unsuccessful termination of the Spanish match, or rather, Buckingham's share in procuring its miscarriage, rendered the duke for a short period the favourite of the English Parliament. They spoke openly of that man as the "saviour of his country," whom but a few months afterwards, they execrated and denounced as a traitor.

As the style of correspondence which was carried on between James and Buckingham can scarcely have failed in affording amusement, another specimen or two may not be unwelcome. Among other instances of the familiarity with which the favourite approached his master, it may be remarked that, in his letters, the duke frequently addresses the old king as his "purveyor." This term undoubtedly had its origin in the quantity of fruit, game, and sweetmeats, which the king was in the habit of sending as presents to the duke and "Kate," as he familiarly styled the duchess. More than once, in his letters, Buckingham returns thanks to his "dear dad and gossip," for some such dainty cargo. The following brief extracts may be taken as specimens:—"A million of thanks for your good melons and pears."—"The best show of true repentance of a fault, is to make a true confession: I did forget to give thanks for my melons, grapes, peaches, and all the things else you sent: I must pass my account under that general term, or else I shall make the same fault again, by leaving out something, your favours are so many."—"I have received two boxes of dried plums and grapes, and the box of violet cakes and chickens, for all which I humbly thank your majesty: And again, "The sense and thankfulness of my heart for your excellent melons, pears, sugared beans, and assurance of better fruit planted in your bosom than ever grew in paradise, will best appear in my humble obedience of your commands." The conclusion of the letter from which the last extract is taken, is amusing and characteristic enough:—"My stags," adds the duke, "are all lusty, my calf bold, and others are so too; my Spanish colts are fat, and so is my jovial filly. Mall, great Mall, Kate, Sue, and Steenie, shall all wait on you on Saturday, and kiss both James's and Charles's feet. To conclude, let this paper assure you, that the last words I spoke to you are so true, that I will not only give my word, sware you on the Holy Evangelists, but take the blessed sacrament upon them. So craving your blessing, I rest

"Your majesty's most humble slave and dog,

"STEENIE.

"P. S. Baby Charles, I kiss thy warty hands."

It appears that the term of "Tom Badger," which occurs in the following letter from James, was one of the cant names by which the frivolous monarch thought proper to distinguish his favourite: perhaps his subscribing himself to the duke as "your old purveyor" is scarcely more undignified.

"Sweet hearty blessing, blessing, blessing, on my sweet Tom Badger, and all his, for breeding me so fine a kennel of young hounds, some of them so fair and well-shaped, and some of them so fine pretty little ones, as they are worthy to lie on Steenie and Kate's bed: and all of them run together in a lump, and God thank the master of the horse, for providing me such a number of fair useful horses, fit for my hand: in a word, I protest I was never master of such horses and hounds; the bearer will tell you what fine running we had yesterday. Remember now to take the air discreetly, and for God's sake and mine, keep thyself very warm, especially thy head and shoulders; put thy park of Bewlie to an end, and love me still and still, and so God bless thee and my sweet daughter, and god-daughter to the comfort of thy dear dad.

JAMES R.

"Thy old purveyor sent thee yesternight six partridges and two leverets. I am now going to hawk the pheasant."

There are extant some affectionate letters, addressed by the Duchess of Buckingham to her husband during his absence in Spain, which exhibit the domestic character of the duke in a very pleasing light. "I think," she writes, "there never was such a man born as you are; and how much am I bound to God, that I must be that happy woman to enjoy you from all other women, and the unworthiest of all to have so great a blessing. Only this I can say for myself, you could never have had one that could love you better, than your poor true-loving Kate doth,—poor now, in your absence, but else the happiest and richest woman in the world."

But the following specimen is even more pleasing.

"York House, 16th July, 1623.

"My lord, indeed I must crave your pardon that I did not write you no more particulars of our pretty Moll. I did tell dry-nurse what you wrote to me, and she says, you had one letter from her; and she has sent you word, by every one that has gone, that she was well, and what she could do. But if you will pardon me this fault, I will commit the like no more. She is very well, I thank God, and when she is set to her feet, and held by her sleeves, she will not go softly, but stamp, and set one foot before another very fast, and I think she will run before she can go. She loves dancing extremely, and when the saraband is played, she will get her thumb and finger together, offering to snap; and then, when 'Tom Duff' is sung, then she will shake her apron; and when she hears the tune of the clapping dance my Lady Frances Hubert taught the prince, she will clap both her hands together, and on her breast, and she can tell the tunes as well as any of us can; and as they change the tunes, she will change her dancing. I would you were here but to see her, for you would take much delight in her now, she is so full of pretty play and tricks; and she has gotten a trick, that when they dance her, she will cry Hah, hah! and Nicholas will dance with his legs, and she will imitate him as well as she can. She will be excellent at a hat; for if one lay her down, she will kick her legs over her head; but when she is older I hope she will be more modest. Every body says she grows every day more like you: you shall have her picture very shortly."

* D'Israeli, in his Commentaries on the Reign of Charles I., remarks in a note:—"I find a curious anecdote of that zealous paternal attention of our pedant king, which I have not met elsewhere. James took such minute care of their education, that the children of James were well instructed in music and dancing; his majesty desired them to keep up their dancing privately, though they whistle and sing to one another for music."—Harl. MSS. 6987. (24).

King James appears to have taken a great interest in his friend's wife, and styles her playfully, in one of his letters, "the poor fool Kate:" We find Buckingham also speaking of her affectionately as "his poor little wife."

Notwithstanding the playful and affectionate letters which were addressed by James to Buckingham during the absence of the latter in Spain, there is reason to believe that, had the king's life been prolonged, the fall of the favourite would have been as rapid as his rise. This supposition indeed is far from improbable, when we remember that James not only grew fretful and suspicious as he approached his end, but that latterly he had actually entertained apprehensions of personal danger at Buckingham's hands.

Certain it is, that a plot was laid by Iniosa, the Spanish ambassador, (who acted probably under the directions of Olivarez,) of which the object was to remove Buckingham for ever from the counsels and affections of his master. The king, however, was so closely watched, that Iniosa found some difficulty in carrying his plans into execution. In order to obtain a private interview, the Spaniard at length hit upon the following expedient. On a certain day, desiring one of his suite by all means to keep the prince and Buckingham in close conversation, he drew from his pocket a document, in which the duke's supposed conspiracy was confidently detailed, and in which a private audience was earnestly demanded for himself. At the same time he made a sign to the king, that he should instantly conceal the paper from view. The fears of James being thus awakened, he seized an opportunity, when Charles and the duke were absent in the House of Lords, to receive the Spaniard in private. Iniosa lost no time in impressing the pusillanimous monarch with the prospect of his danger, recommending that Buckingham should be restricted to some house in the country for the remainder of his life.

The duke up to this time, had possessed the strongest influence over the king. He used to remove him, we are told, from place to place, as suited his purpose, although, occasionally, the changes were far from pleasing to his imbecile master. But when James next saw his favourite, he turned to him imploringly, "Ah, Steenie, Steenie," he said, "wilt thou kill me!" The duke passionately protested his innocence, and insisted on knowing the name of his accuser; but James refused all answer to his inquiries.

Doubtful, apparently, in what manner to act, the king summoned Prince Charles, and prepared to depart for Windsor. Buckingham, as usual, was proceeding to follow him, and had actually set his foot on the step of the coach, when the king invented some excuse for leaving him behind. Unused to such treatment, the favourite burst into tears. According to Bishop Hacket, he addressed a strong appeal to the king, to which his majesty returned an unsatisfactory answer. James admitted, however, that he had not read the duke's letter without weeping; and piteously complained of being the unhappiest person in the world, in being forsaken and betrayed by those who were dearest to him.

In the midst of his distress, Buckingham was visited at Wallingford House, by Lord Keeper Williams. He found the duke lying on his couch, and so overwhelmed with grief, that he could scarcely obtain an answer to his questions. Williams advised him instantly to hasten to the king: adding that, in the event of delay, a very short time would enable his majesty to concert with the parliament, and that the duke's commitment to the Tower would be the inevitable consequence. This rational advice Buckingham lost no time in following. He immediately set off for Windsor; where, by his respectful demeanour, his extraordinary personal influence, and by never leaving James to be worked upon by the machinations of others, he eventually contrived to make his peace. Perhaps the king was unwilling to doubt the faith of one on whom he had conferred so many and such extraordinary benefits.*

It is to be regretted that Lord Clarendon, in alluding to the misunderstanding between Buckingham and his sovereign, enters but slightly into the merits of the case. "Many," he says, "were of opinion, that King James, before his death, grew weary of this favourite; and that, if he had lived, he would have deprived him at least of his large and unlimited power. And this imagination so prevailed with some men, as the Lord Keeper Lincoln, the Earl of Middlesex, Lord High Treasurer of England, and other gentlemen of name, though not in so high stations, that they had the courage to withdraw from their absolute dependence upon the duke, and to make some other essays, which proved to the ruin of every one of them; there appearing no mark, or evidence, that the king did really lessen his affection to him, to the hour of his death." Bishop Kennet expresses his belief in Buckingham's fidelity, and in order to give weight to his views, has published two letters, addressed at this period by the duke to his sovereign. They must certainly be regarded as bearing the stamp of honesty, but are scarcely of sufficient importance to be transferred from the folios of the indulgent bishop.

It may be remarked, that when Buckingham afterwards discovered in the intrigues of Iniosa the secret of his temporary disgrace, he instantly assailed the ambassador with his usual headstrong impetuosity. Iniosa told the duke that he was a gentleman, and better born than himself: adding that he accused him of being a traitor to his face, and that he would make good his words with his sword. Charles was afterwards induced to forward a complaint of Iniosa to the court of Madrid, but the charges appear to have been treated in the lightest possible manner by the Spanish court.

CHAPTER III.

The accession of Charles to the throne was a death-blow to the enemies of Buckingham. It was but too evident that, henceforth, he would be more fully confirmed in his exalted fortunes. The friendships of Charles were known to be, at least, as stable as those of his father had been uncertain; and although, in his affection for Buckingham, the young king had somewhat

* James, however, if we may judge by one of his own apophthegms, could scarcely have entertained any very great faith in the existence of gratitude. He tells us that a king who is in dread of conspiracies, should rather be jealous of those whom he has benefited than of those whom he has discontented; the latter he says, wanting the power to be dangerous, but the former having the means ever ready at their will. This says but little for human nature.

overrated his favourite's capacity, still, it was not in his nature to be either argued or frightened out of an opinion which he had once maturely formed. On the other hand, there is no reason to doubt but that Buckingham repaid with warm gratitude and a personal attachment, the extraordinary affection of his master.

It is remarkable, that, between Charles and Buckingham, a strong jealousy had existed in early life. Clarendon tells us, that the duke's manner was frequently highly insolent, and that, on one occasion, he was actually on the point of striking the prince. This anecdote, whether correctly or not, is related more circumstantially by Weldon. That writer informs us, that, at Greenwich, before four hundred persons, Buckingham raised his hand over his head, with a ballon-bracer, in such a manner as to draw from Charles the expression, "What, my lord, I think you intend to strike me." Whatever, however, may have been the cause of their juvenile hostility, it is certain that it ceased with their earliest youth. The affection, when once conceived by Charles, remained unshaken to the last. When the tide of public opinion set strongest against the favourite; when the parliament was threatening him with impeachment, and the sailors thundering for their wages at his doors; when the suspicions of his having poisoned the late king, were universally believed by the vulgar, and sedulously propagated by the great, Charles, at the risk of his own popularity, and, indeed, almost of his throne, still clung to, and supported the friend of his choice. It is well known, that when the parliament were preferring articles against Buckingham, the king showed his contempt of their proceedings, and his love for his favourite, by recommending the University of Cambridge to elect the duke as their chancellor. This recommendation the university listened to,—it has been said, to their own disgrace, but, certainly, to the great discomfiture of the parliament. Charles, however, ever denied, in the strongest manner, the duke's supposed influence over his actions. He said, that, though it was commonly believed he was ruled by Buckingham, the fact was far otherwise; that the duke had ever been his most faithful and obedient servant, and that he would hereafter prove it to the satisfaction of the world.

In 1625, Buckingham was despatched, with the Earl of Montgomery, to Paris, for the purpose of conducting Henrietta to the arms of her husband. The beauty of his person, and the singular magnificence of the mission, were equally the admiration of the French king and of his court. "He appeared," says Lord Clarendon, "with all the lustre the wealth of England could adorn him with, and outshined all the bravery that court could dress itself in, and overacted the whole nation in their own most peculiar vanities." Louis XIII. remarked that Buckingham was one of the few English gentlemen he had ever seen, a sentiment which seems, at least, to have been fully reciprocated by his queen.

Whether Buckingham was really actuated by feelings of love, or whether it arose from mere motives of ambition or a desire of amusement, certain it is, that he had the temerity to address the Queen of France as a lover, and that his attentions were far from being ill received by that engaging princess. He had previously beheld her person on his journey to Madrid, and had described her to King James as the handsomest woman he had seen at the French court.

During his short stay at Paris, he brought all his fascinations into play, for the purpose of captivating her heart; and when he quitted that capital, in attendance on Henrietta, his daring aspirations had not only become known to the French minister, but the king's jealousy had been painfully excited. Several of the queen's servants were turned away, and her physician, Outange, her gentleman-usher, and others of her household, were banished from France. Madame de Motteville, who was in all the secrets of Anne of Austria, has left us a very interesting account of this singular affair. "The Duke of Buckingham," she writes, "was the man who appeared to have attacked the queen's heart with the best success. He was handsome, well-shaped, high-spirited, generous, liberal, and favourite to a great king. He had all the royal treasures to spend, and all the jewels of the crown of England to adorn his person. No wonder, then, if with so many lovely qualities, he had such high thoughts, such noble, yet such blameable and dangerous desires; and no wonder if he had the good fortune to persuade those who were witnesses of his addresses that they were not troublesome."

The first instance in which Buckingham appears to have expressed his sentiments, was in the garden of a house near Amiens, where the queen happened to pass the night, while accompanying her sister-in-law, Henrietta, on her way towards England. Buckingham, whilst attending her in her walk, expressing a strong desire to speak with her in private, Putange, her gentleman-usher, out of delicacy, withdrew. How far Buckingham was carried by his feelings cannot now be known. It is probable, however, by what follows, that he made use of more than words to express his tenderness. "Chance," says Madame de Motteville, "having led them into a by-walk, which was hid by a palisade from public view, the queen, at that instant, surprised to find herself alone, and it is likely importuned by some too passionate expression of the duke's sentiments, cried out; and calling to her gentleman-usher, she blamed him for leaving her." We must form our own conjectures on such a passage. Certainly, it is a tolerably candid confession for a confidant.

Buckingham really appears to have been sincere in the professions which he made. When Henrietta and her suite departed from Amiens, the queen, attended by the Princess de Conde, accompanied them a short way in her coach. The hour of parting having at length arrived, Buckingham came to bid farewell to his mistress. "He kissed her gown," we are told, and, "she being in the fore-seat of the coach, he hid himself in the curtain as if he had something to say to her, but, in reality, to wipe away the tears which came into his eyes."

Buckingham, on his departure for England, sent directions to Sir Balthazar Gerbier to remain at the French court, for the purpose of keeping up a correspondence with his royal mistress. Gerbier was narrowly watched by the agents of Richelieu; however, the queen found means to send by him her own garter, as well as a valuable jewel, to her absent lover. Sometime afterwards, the queen happened, in one of her walks in the garden at Ruel, to encounter the poet Voiture. On her inquiring of him the subject of his thoughts, he instantly repeated the following verses:

Je pensois (car nous autres poëtes Nous pensons extravagament),

Ce que, dans l'humeur où vous êtes,
Vous feriez, si dans ce moment
Vous avisiez en cette place
Venir le Duc de Buckingham;
Et lequel seroit en disgrâce,
De lui, ou du Père Vincent.

Had not Voiture been well aware of the state of the queen's feelings, he would scarcely have ventured on such delicate ground. The queen, too, not only expressed no displeasure, but admired the verses and retained a copy of them.

There was undoubtedly an intention to assassinate Buckingham, had he persisted in his intentions to return to his mistress. This fact is not only rendered probable by what is hinted at in Holland's letter, but is confidently asserted by Lord Clarendon.

When the bickerings among Henrietta's French servants appeared likely to produce a rupture with France, Buckingham had requested Charles to send him to Paris as a mediator. This, it appears, by the interference of Richelieu, was prevented. Bassompierre informs us, in his Embassy to England, that the duke having sent to apprise him of his having been nominated to the mission to France, the ambassador intimated to him in plain terms that he would not be received. Buckingham's rage at the disappointment exceeded all bounds. He declared openly, says Clarendon, that he "would see and speak with that lady in spite of the strength and power of France." Indeed the war which shortly followed, has been generally attributed to the vexation of Buckingham. Probably it may have hastened hostilities; but the war at this period arose from other and uncontrollable circumstances, and must have ensued had the duke never entertained his daring attachment. He had declared that if he could not enter France peaceably, he would force a passage with an army. This, on a first consideration, would appear rather an extraordinary manner of obtaining access to a mistress. However, the difficulty seems to be cleared up by an expression of Madame de Motteville. Buckingham, she says, raised a division between the two crowns, in order that he might hereafter have a reason for returning to France, by the necessity which would be contingent on a treaty of peace. Henrietta, who stood in considerable awe of Buckingham, appears, nevertheless, to have been enlisted by him in his cause. When she was desirous of paying a visit to her relations in France, she wrote to her mother, requesting that the duke might be allowed to accompany her: without whom, she said, she could not think of undertaking the voyage. It is needless to add that the proposal was instantly negatived by the French court.

Buckingham was equally on bad terms with Richelieu at Paris, as he had been with Olivarez at Madrid. It would be curious could we trace their hostility to a rivalry in the court of beauty. Nani, in his History of Venice, speaking of Buckingham's attachment to the queen, affirms that the cardinal was "either inflamed, or feigned to be, with the same passion." Whether it was this fact that exasperated the duke to so violent a degree, cannot now be clearly ascertained. Richelieu, however, triumphed over his rival, though Buckingham did not live to see it. After the death of her husband, Louis the Thirteenth, the queen united herself to the cardinal, his sacerdotal habit, as he had never taken priest's orders, proving no obstacle to their union. Richelieu soon grew tired of her, and treated her unkindly.

The enmity which existed between the two ministers has been illustrated by an anecdote, which, however trivial in other respects, is too characteristic to be omitted. Richelieu had addressed one of his letters to Monseigneur, instead of Monsieur, le Duc de Buckingham, leaving, moreover, no vacant space after the title of Monseigneur. Buckingham repaid the slight by writing to Monsieur le Cardinal de Richelieu. This trifling squabble was on the point of leading to serious consequences. However, the cardinal was worsted, and yielded the point with a wretched joke. "The cannons," he said, "of the British navy were more powerful than the canons of the church."

But events were passing at home which were calculated to occupy the mind of Buckingham with other notions besides those of romance.—The impeachment of the Commons, and the charges brought against him by the Earl of Bristol, had certainly fallen harmless at the time; but still his enemies, though baffled, were not crushed, and his name, whether deservedly or not, was daily becoming more odious with the people.—With a view to wiping off the obloquy, he determined to conduct, in person, the unfortunate expedition for the relief of Rochelle. He would make himself, he said, more loved and honoured than was ever the Earl of Essex, his unfortunate predecessor in the smiles of royalty and popular favour. The expedition was a formidable one, but its principal characteristic was its exceeding splendour. "Buckingham," says de Brienne, "appeared in this expedition with the equipage of an amorous knight, rather than the equipage of a general." He carried with him his coach, and, it was even rumoured, his jewels. The vessels were hung with crimson velvet, and bands of music enlivened the tedium of the voyage. Buckingham's valour was undoubted, or such fantastic trappings might have raised suspicions of his effeminacy.

The history of the enterprise is familiar to every one. Although the personal bravery of the duke achieved for him another laurel, it was one dearly purchased. His countrymen, when they beheld only one-third of his army returning with him to England,—when they beheld the wife weeping for her husband, and the orphan for his father,—readily forgot, that in that sanguinary retreat Buckingham had stood alone on the beach, till his humblest follower had embarked; and that he was the last man who had quitted the shore.

It was in Buckingham's nature to feel deeply the outcry raised against him. In undertaking his second expedition to Rochelle, he seems to have determined either to die in the attempt, or to retrieve the popular favour which he had lost. He told Gerbier, his architect and confidential servant, to add in one of his last despatches to the Rochellers, that "God willing, he would be with them in three weeks, and would either overcome or die there." On quitting the Isle of Rhe, he had promised the gallant Rochellers that he would again come to their relief. So eager indeed was he to redeem his pledge, that he furnished the royal treasury with large sums of money out of his own purse, without even keeping any account of his disbursements.

When the famous Lady Davies sent to him a written prophecy, that he would not outlive the month; "Gerbier," he said, "if God please I will go, and will be the first man that shall set his foot upon the dyke before Rochelle, to die, or do the work; whereby the world shall see the reality of our intentions for the relief of that place.*"

Expressions of popular hostility were vented at this period in more than one remarkable manner. On the 19th of June, 1628, two months before the duke's death, a pasquinade was removed from a post in Colman Street, part of which is as follows:—"Who rules the kingdom?—The king. Who rules the king?—The duke. Who rules the duke?—The devil."

About this period Charles, happening to be in Spring Gardens, watching his favourite game of bowls, Buckingham, who accompanied him, unlike the rest of the company, remained covered. A Scotsman who was present, having first of all kissed the duke's hand, suddenly snatched off his hat, exclaiming, "Off with your hat before the king." Buckingham instantly kicked the Scotsman, and probably would have proceeded farther had not the king interposed.—"Let him alone, George," he said; "he is either mad or a fool." "No, sir," said the offender, "I am a sober man, and if your majesty would give me leave, I will tell you that of this man which many know, and none dare speak." Buckingham showed in more than one instance how deeply he was affected by such and similar instances of his unpopularity. In his farewell banquet to the court, he appeared in a masque, attended by a personification of Envy, and surrounded by a number of barking dogs, supposed to denote the empty revilings of the vulgar.

Uninfluenced by all he saw and heard, the affection of Charles continued unabated for the companion of his youth. Mr. Meade writes to Sir Martin Stuteville. "This week, about Wednesday, his majesty went with the duke, (taking him into his own coach, and so riding through the city as it were to grace him,) to Deptford to see the ships: where, having seen ten fair ships nearly rigged for Rochelle, they say he uttered these words to the duke: 'George, there are some that wish both these and thou mightest perish. But care not for them. We will both perish together if thou doest.'"

A superstitious presentiment of his approaching fate appears not only to have taken possession of the multitude, but even to have influenced, if it could not terrify, the undaunted mind of Buckingham. Lord Clarendon alludes to the many "predictions and prophecies," which forewarned him of his untimely and violent end. The aged sinner, Dr. Lambe, had foretold his own death, as well as Buckingham's. This wretched mountebank, who pretended to prophecy by means of a supernatural agency, was said to be an unworthy creature of the duke, though Carte affirms that Buckingham was not even acquainted with Lambe's person. The vulgar styled him "the duke's devil." On the day that Lambe was torn to pieces by the mob, Buckingham's picture fell

* See the extracts from Gerbier's MS. in the Curiosities of Literature, vol. v. p. 298. In the second volume of D'Israeli's Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I. will be found an able defence of Buckingham's conduct as a military commander, against the incapacity and inexperience attributed to him by Hume. Charles was certainly very far from dissatisfied with the duke's conduct during the operations. The king writes to him, 6th November, 1627: "Unfeignedly, in my mind, ye have gained as much reputation with wise and honest men in this action, as if ye had performed all your desires. I have no more to say this time, but to conjure thee, for my sake, to have a care for your health, for every day I find new reason to confirm me in being your loving faithful friend," "CHARLES R."

down in the High Commission Chamber at Lambeth; an omen which, when all men were superstitious, and the majority discontented, was eagerly hailed as a certain prognostic of his fall.

But the most extraordinary prediction was that of Lady Eleanor Davies, who had foretold the time of the duke's death, with wonderful precision. She had been the authoress of several prophecies, many of which proving singularly correct, she acquired so much importance with the vulgar, that it was thought necessary by the government to bring her to trial. One or two anagrams, into which she had twisted her name, considerably raised her in her own estimation. Her maiden name of

Eleanor Audeley,

by transposing the letters she easily converted into—

Reveal, O Daniel.

When the silly lady appeared in court, a clever lawyer turned the laugh against her by producing another anagram, which, as Lady Eleanor's is not a perfect one, has the most credit of the two:

Dame Eleanor Davies,
Never so mad a ladie.

The lawyer was probably not far from the truth.

CHAPTER IV.

Buckingham, as has been already observed, was himself impressed with an idea that his end was fast approaching. His parting with Charles was remarkable for a solemnity that was foreign to his nature. Being indisposed, the king, attended by the Earl of Holland, came in person to pay him a visit. He found the duke in bed, and remained with him for some time in serious and private conversation. When he at last arose to bid his favourite farewell, "the duke," says Wotton, "embraced him in a very unusual and passionate manner, and in like sort his friend the Earl of Holland, as if his soul had divined he should see them no more."*

So also, when Buckingham took leave of Archbishop Laud, his countenance and manner were strangely foreboding of evil. "I know," he said, "your lordship has good access to the king; pray put his majesty in mind to be good to my poor wife and children." Laud, struck with the peculiarity of his manner, inquired if he had any presentiment that misfortune was likely to befall him. "I think," said the duke, "I am as likely to fall as another man." The likelihood of his dying by the hand of an assassin does not appear to have struck him. When his friends advised him to wear secret armour, "No," he said, "there is no need of it: there are no Roman spirits left." On another occasion, when the necessity of secret defence was impressed upon him, "Against popular fury," he said, "a shirt of mail will avail nothing: against a single man I am able to defend myself."

But what bears in the most remarkable man-

* According to Sir Henry Wotton, the duke's sister, Lady Denbigh, was impressed with the universal presentiment: he writes, "On the very day of his death, the Countess of Denbigh received a letter from him; whereunto all the while she was writing her answer, she bedewed the paper with her tears. And after a most bitter passion, (whereof she could yield no reason, but that her dearest brother was to be gone,) she fell down in a swoon. Her said letter ended thus: 'I will pray for your happy return, which I look at with a great cloud over my head, too heavy for my poor heart to bear without torment; but I hope the great God of heaven will bless you.'" ner on this portion of our history, is the ghost story of Sir George Villiers. This strange tale is not only related by more than one contemporary writer, but even Lord Clarendon has departed from the dignity of history, and lent it the credit of his name. The account of Lilly, the astrologer, is as follows:

"An aged gentleman, one Parker, as I remember, having formerly belonged unto the duke, or of great acquaintance with the duke's father, and now retired, had a dæmon appeared several times unto him, in the shape or image of Sir George Villiers, the duke's father. This dæmon walked many times in Parker's bed-chamber, without any action of terror, noise, hurt, or speech, but at last broke out into these words: 'Mr. Parker, I know you loved me formerly, and my son George very well at this time; I would have you go from me; you know me very well to be his father, old Sir George Villiers of Leicestershire; and from me acquaint him that he above all refrain the counsel and company of such and such,' whom he then nominated, 'or else he will come to destruction, and that suddenly.' Parker did partly, though a very discreet man, imagine he himself was in a dream all this time, and being unwilling to proceed upon no better grounds, forbore addressing himself to the duke; for he conceived if he should acquaint the duke with the words of his father, and the manner of his appearance to him, (such apparitions being not usual,) that he should be laughed at and thought to dote, being that he was aged.

"Some few nights passed without further trouble to the old man. But not very many nights after, old Sir George Villiers appeared again, walked quick and furiously in the room, seemed angry with Mr. Parker, and at last said, 'Mr. Parker, I thought you had been my friend so much, and loved my son George so well, that you would have acquainted him with what I desired, but yet I know that you have not done it. By all the friendship that ever was betwixt you and me, and the great respect you bear my son, I desire you to deliver what I formerly commanded you unto my son.' The old man seeing himself thus solicited, promised the dæmon he would, but first argued it thus: that the duke was not easy to be spoke withal, and that he would account him a vain man to come with such a message from the dead; nor did he conceive the duke would give any credit unto him. Whereunto the dæmon thus answered: 'If he will not believe you have this discourse from me, tell him of such a secret,' and named it, 'which he knows none in the world ever knew but himself and me.'

"Mr. Parker, being now well satisfied that he was not asleep, or that the apparition was a vain delusion, took a fit opportunity therefore, and seriously acquainted the duke with his father's words, and the manner of his apparition. The duke heartily laughed at the relation, which put old Parker to the stand; but at last he assumed courage, and told the duke that he acquainted his father's ghost with what he now found to be true, viz. scorn and derision. 'But, my lord,' saith he, 'your father bade me acquaint you by this token, and he said it was such as none in the world but your two selves did yet know.' Hereat the duke was amazed and much astonished; but took no warning or notice thereof, keeping the same company still; advising with such counsellors, and performing such actions, as his father, by Parker, countermanded. Shortly after, old Sir George Villiers, in a very quiet but sorrowful posture, appears again unto Mr. Parker, and said,

‘Mr. Parker, I know you delivered my words unto George my son; I thank you for so doing: but he slighted them; and now I only request this more at your hands, that once again you repair unto my son, and tell him, if he will not amend and follow the counsel I have given him, this knife or dagger,’ and with that he pulled a knife or dagger from under his gown, ‘shall end him; and do you, Mr. Parker, set your house in order, for you shall die at such a time.’

“Mr. Parker once more engaged, though very unwillingly, to acquaint the duke with this last message; and did so; but the duke desired him to trouble him no farther with such messages and dreams; told him he perceived he was now an old man, and doted. And within a week after, meeting Mr. Parker on Lambeth Bridge, ‘Now, Mr. Parker, what say of your dream?’ Who only returned, ‘Sir, I wish it may never have success,’ &c. But within six weeks after he was stabbed with a knife, according to his father’s admonition beforehand; and Mr. Parker died soon after he had seen the dream or vision performed.”

Lord Clarendon gives a somewhat different relation of the duke’s manner when Parker acquainted him with the object of his mission. Sir Ralph Freeman, he says, a connection of Buckingham’s, was present, and watching the countenance of the duke closely, observed that his colour changed, and that he showed great commotion during the interview. Parker afterwards told Sir Ralph, that when he alluded to the secret which the apparition had disclosed to him, the duke swore he could only have come to the knowledge of it through the devil. Buckingham was then proceeding on a hunting excursion. During the whole day he paid no attention to the sport, but appeared to be in deep thought, and on his return alighted unexpectedly at his mother’s lodgings at Whitehall. Their conversation, which was private, was carried on with so much animation, that their voices were heard in the adjoining apartments. When the duke quitted her, his countenance exhibited much anger; a circumstance the more remarkable, since his intercourse with his mother had ever been distinguished by the most profound respect.

It would appear that the real name of the person whom the spirit selected as his confidant, was not Parker, but Nicholas Towse. Plot, the natural historian, has published a letter addressed to him by a Mr. Edmund Windham, purporting to give an account of the whole affair, as the latter received it from Towse himself. The relation differs but little from those of Clarendon and Lilly. It may be interesting to those who have never seen an apparition, to be informed that the ghost, on his last appearance to Towse, had become so familiar to him, that “he was as little troubled with it, as if it had been a friend or acquaintance that came to visit him.” Mrs. Towse had also a miraculous story to relate as well as her husband. She told Windham, that on the day that Buckingham was stabbed, she was sitting alone with her better half in an apartment in Windsor Castle (where, it may be remarked, Clarendon has also fixed the scene of the drama,) when her husband suddenly started from his chair, exclaiming, “Wife, the Duke of Buckingham is killed.” Towse, she says, subsequently prophesied to her the very day on which he should himself die, and, she adds, that the prediction proved true.

The apparition of Sir George Villiers is at least as well authenticated as most of the ghost stories of modern times; and, as in the generality of such cases, we may trace the phenomenon to natural causes. What, indeed, can be more likely, than that the Countess of Buckingham, aware of her son’s increasing unpopularity, and trembling for the consequences, should have furnished an old retainer of her family with an important secret, and despatched him on the extravagant errand. The supposition is certainly not at variance with what we know of her character. Buckingham, in all probability, had already suspected the cheat, and when he parted from his mother in anger, it was probably owing to his having elicited from her the truth.

During the duke’s fatal journey to Portsmouth there occurred two incidents which may be worthy of mention. He had proceeded some miles, when a messenger rode up to him in great haste. This person had been despatched by Sir George Goring, afterwards Earl of Norwich, with a letter to the duke, in which he advertised him of a design against his life, and advised him by all means to adopt a different route to that which he had originally fixed upon. Buckingham put the letter in his pocket, without either changing countenance, or, apparently, paying the least attention to its contents. He had proceeded some way further, when he was stopped by an old woman, who requested earnestly that she might be brought to his grace. “She had overheard,” she said, “a conversation in the town, through which the travellers were about to pass, in the course of which a party of desperate men had agreed to assassinate his grace.” The duke’s attendants, who were not above seven or eight in number, strongly recommended their master to take a different road. Buckingham, however, was obstinate, and the party proceeded. “Here-upon,” says Sir Henry Wotton, “his young nephew, Lord Fielding, out of a noble spirit, besought him that he would at least honour him with his coat and blue riband through the town; pleading that his uncle’s life, whereupon lay the property of his whole family, was of all things, under Heaven, the most precious to him. At which sweet proposition, the duke caught him in his arms and kissed him, yet would not accept of such an offer from a nephew, whose life he tendered as much as himself; and so liberally rewarded the poor creature for her good will.” Just as he entered the suspected town, a drunken or mischievous sailor suddenly caught hold of his bridle; one of the attendants, however, rode violently against the ruffian and disengaged his hold.

The particulars of Buckingham’s assassination may be minutely gathered from the letters of the time. The duke, according to Howell, on the morning of the fatal day, having “cut a caper or two,” and been under the hands of the barber, descended to breakfast. There were present some French gentlemen, and several influential officers, who were about to accompany him to Rochelle. Soubize, brother to the Duke de Rohan whispered in his ear that the town was relieved. Buckingham affected to slight the news, on which the conversation became warm and animated, especially on the part of the French, who, by their vehement gesticulations gave it somewhat the appearance of a quarrel. The meal being over, the duke drew towards the door. In passing under some hangings which led to a neighbouring passage, he encountered Colonel Fryar, who came to speak to him on business. At this instant, one Felton, a wretched enthusiast, raising his hand suddenly over Fryar’s shoulder, thrust his knife into the duke’s heart, who, merely uttering the words, “the villain has killed me,” made a step towards the assassin; laying at the same time his hand on his sword, which he half drew from the scabbard. In another moment he staggered towards a table which was near him, and plucking with his own hand the knife from his body, fell lifeless into the arms of the bystanders. At first it was thought he was in a fit, but the blood which almost instantly gushed from his mouth and wound, discovered the dreadful nature of the disaster.*

The duchess, who was with child at the time, was in the upper room when the accident occurred. Hearing the noise, she came forth from her bed chamber, and from a balcony beheld her husband weltering his blood. Lord Carleton describes the scene in his letter to Henrietta Maria: “The Duchess of Buckingham,” he says, “and the Countess of Anglesea came forth into a gallery which looked into the hall, where they might behold the blood of their dearest lord gushing from him. Ah, poor ladies! such was their screechings, tears, and distractions, that I never in my life heard the like before, and hope never to hear the like again.” Such is the fate of greatness, or the ingratitude of mankind, that those, as Philip Warwick tells us, “who a little before had crowded to be his remotest followers, so soon forsook his dead corpse, that he was laid upon the hall table nigh to which he fell, and scarce any of his domestics left to attend him.”—“Thus,” he adds, “upon the withdrawing of the sun does the shadow depart from the painted dial.” Wotton says that there was no living creature in either of the chambers, no more than if he had lain on the sands of Æthiopia.”

So admirably had Felton selected both time and place, that had it not been for his own recklessness or imprudence, he would probably have escaped with impunity. Suspicion (awakened by the angry tones in which they had so lately conversed) at first rested on the foreigners; and had not some in authority interposed their cooler judgments, the innocent Frenchmen would in all probability have instantly fallen by the swords of the by-standers. In the mean time the assassin had passed through the throng, and in the midst of the uproar was standing quietly and unnoted in the kitchen. He had tied his horse to a hedge in the neighbourhood of the town, but whether from being bewildered, or having missed his way in the passages of the house, he neglected to avail himself of the means of flight. Felton, in the hurry of the moment, had lost his hat, which was discovered almost immediately afterwards by those who went in quest of the murderer. In it were found the following remarkable documents,—intended, no doubt, as an apology for his conduct, in the event of his being slain by the duke’s friends on the spot:

“If I be slain, let no man condemn me, but rather condemn myself; it is for our sins that our hearts are hardened, and become senseless, or else he had not gone so long unpunished.

“He is unworthy of the name of a gentleman or soldier, in my opinion, that is afraid to sacrifice

* Sir Symonds D’Ewes says, that he was placed upon a table, where he continued struggling for life for about a quarter of an hour. This is opposed to the accounts of other writers, and does not appear to have been the fact.

his life for the honour of God, his king, and country.
"JOHN FELTON."

It was evident that the owner of the hat could be no other than the murderer of the duke. In the mean time, Felton had quitted the kitchen, and was walking composedly in front of the house. A bystander, suddenly observing the stranger without a hat, exclaimed, "Here is the fellow that killed the duke." Others crying, "Where is the villain? where is the butcher?" he quietly drew his sword, and advancing amongst them, "I am the man," he said, "here I am." Several persons rushed upon him with their drawn swords, to which Felton coolly exposed his breast, preferring to die thus than by the hands of the executioner. Lord Carleton, who has himself described the scene, assisted by Sir Thomas Morton and others, preserved him, though with considerable difficulty, from the fury of the duke's retainers.

Felton, having been conveyed to a private apartment, exhibited neither remorse for the crime which he had committed, nor fear for its consequences. When, in order to aid the purposes of justice, it was pretended to him that the duke was only dangerously wounded, he smiled incredulously; observing, "that the blow," he was certain, "had determined their hopes." When asked, "at whose instigation he had committed so execrable a crime?" he answered, "that no man living possessed sufficient influence to have persuaded him to it; that though he himself had been twice passed in his regiment, yet that he had been far from actuated by private wrongs; that his conduct had alone been swayed by a feeling of duty; by the manner in which Buckingham had been branded in parliament, and by his own firm belief that the duke was an enemy to the state." He afterwards added, "that Eglesham's scurrilous pamphlet had, in a great degree, instigated him to commit the crime."

Felton, who was a lieutenant in the army, though a man of small stature, had been remarkable among his own associates for his decided disposition and undaunted courage. On one occasion of his receiving an insult, he sent his adversary a challenge, accompanied by a piece of his little finger which he had himself amputated. It was intended to denote how little he cared for pain and how ready he was to peril his life. The patriots, of course, regarded him as a Brutus; and it was hoped that he would uphold his sentiments, and justify his conduct to the last. As he passed through Kingston-on-Thames, an old woman, alluding to the death of Goliath, called out to him, "Now, God bless the little David!" His admirers lost no opportunity of doing him honour. The letters which composed his name were formed into the anagram of

No fie not,
John Felton.

The conceit will be found imperfect; the letter k being omitted.

It may be remarked that the weapon which cut short the life of Buckingham, was a common knife, purchased for tenpence at a cutler's shop on Tower Hill. Felton, having one of his arms maimed, in order that he might effect his purpose with the remaining hand, had sown the sheath in the lining of his pocket. Being extremely poor, the fanatic had traveled to Portsmouth partly on foot, and partly on horseback, in the best manner his means permitted him.

On his being brought to the Tower, a multitude of people flocked thither in order to feast their eyes on the political martyr; he constantly beseeching them to pray for him, and they, on the other hand, with a general voice, crying, "Lord comfort thee! the Lord be merciful unto thee!" or such like words. We are informed that he was well-lodged in the Tower, being allowed two dishes of meat a day.

The manner in which Felton subsequently humbled himself, and expressed his penitence at his trial, was as far from agreeable to his admirers, as it was gratifying to the court. The world without had regarded the act as one of Roman devotion, and looked upon the homicide as a martyr. One Alexander Gill,* a Bachelor of Divinity at Oxford, and an under master of St. Paul's School, was fined two thousand pounds, and degraded from his ministry and degrees, for having drunk Felton's health, and expressed his regret at being deprived of the honour of the deed. There were two other charges against this disciple of the murderer;—one, that he had made use of the expression, "the duke is gone down to hell to meet King James there;" the other, his saying, that "the king, instead of ruling a kingdom, was fitter to stand in a shop in Cheapside, crying, What lack ye?" The expression respecting the king was omitted in open court.

Felton, at his trial, expressed in more than one remarkable manner, his contrition for his crime. When the knife with which he had stabbed Buckingham was produced in court, he is said to have shed tears; and when asked "why sentence of death should not be passed upon him?" he lifted up the hand which had done the deed, requesting "that it might be first cut off, and that afterwards he might suffer death in the manner the court should think fit."

There being reason to suspect that he was instigated by the puritans, it was proposed to put him to the torture, in order to elicit from him the names of his accomplices. When Laud, then Bishop of London, hinted to him this intention of the court, he replied "he could not tell what extreme anguish might draw from him, as in that case he might implicate his lordship himself, or any of the peers present." The question, whether he could legally be put to the rack, was referred to the principal law officers, who decided in the negative. William, Earl of Pembroke, who was present at Felton's examinations, remarked, "that he had never seen valour and piety more temperately mixed in the same person."

After his condemnation, he made two requests to the king; one that he might be allowed to receive the communion before he suffered; and the other, that on the scaffold he might be clothed with sackcloth, with ashes on his head, and a halter round his neck, in testimony of his sincere

* This Gill was the son of Dr. Gill, head master of St. Paul's, and the schoolmaster of Milton. The son was also the friend of the poet, as appears by the three Latin epistles addressed to him by Milton. He appears to have been a vulgar and boisterous demagogue, and was once tossed by the scholars of Trinity College for his indecent conduct in the chapel, when performing the duties of reading-clerk. Wood tells us that he was several times imprisoned; and in 1635 he was compelled to resign his office at St. Paul's, on account of severity to the scholars. Eventually his republican principles brought him into the Star Chamber, where he was sentenced to lose both his ears and pay a fine of 2,000*l*. His ears, however, were saved at the entreaties of his father.

repentance. He sent a message to the Duchess of Buckingham, imploring her to pardon him for the death of her husband. She kindly sent him her forgiveness, a boon which he acknowledged with gratitude in his last moments. Felton mentioned a curious fact to those who were about him. He said, that at the instant he stabbed the duke, he repeated the words, "God have mercy on thy soul!" No wonder it was imagined he had been instigated by the puritans. "When I struck," he said, "I felt the force of forty men in me." Felton was hanged at Tyburn, from whence his body was conveyed to Portsmouth, where it remained suspended for a considerable time in chains.

The court was about four miles from Portsmouth when the news of Buckingham's fate was conveyed to the king. Charles was at public prayers when Sir John Hipposley suddenly entered the room, and without heeding the sacredness of the occasion, went directly to the king, and whispered the tidings in his ear. Much as Charles loved his favourite, he respected his religious duties more; and whatever might have been the shock to his feelings, he allowed the ceremony to proceed, and even preserved his countenance unmoved. As soon as prayers were over, he went suddenly to his bed-chamber, and throwing himself on his bed, he paid an affectionate tribute to the memory of his earliest companion, by the many tears which he shed, and the passionate grief which he displayed. It would appear that he endeavoured to drown his sorrow by a stricter application to public affairs. According to a letter of the period,—"The king, in fourteen days after the duke's death, despatched more business than the duke had done in three months before: some that observe the passages in court, say, the king seems as much affected to the duke's memory as he was to his person; minding nothing so much for the present as the advancement of his friends and followers." Lord Carleton writes, "His majesty's grief for the loss of him was expressed to be more than great, by the many tears he hath shed for him."

The duke's body was conveyed in a barge to his residence at York House in the Strand. His bowels were inhumed at Portsmouth, where his sister the Countess of Denbigh, erected a monument to his memory. It was the king's intention to honour his favourite with a magnificent funeral at the royal expense; the preparations for which are thus spoken of in a letter from a person on the spot:—"On Thursday last the heralds were sent for by my lord treasurer, who gave them order to project as ample and sumptuous a funeral as could be performed; and so they brought in a proportion of some things larger than were in the funeral of King James. And all this must be done at the king's charge; and is said by the courtiers, would stand his majesty in 40,000*l*.; and that my Lord Fielding, Master of the Wardrobe, would gain by the London measure and the lists, 5,000*l*."

However, the amount of Buckingham's debts, and the murmurs which a magnificent funeral would have excited when his memory was odious to so many, doubtless precluded the execution of these splendid designs. Moreover, an argument of the treasurer, whose resources were not superabundant, appears to have added its weight on the occasion. He told the king that a sumptuous interment would be but the show of an hour, while a monument would be not only less expensive, but would remain a lasting memorial to the duke's honour. Charles fell into this view, but when he afterwards reminded the treasurer of what they had agreed upon, "I should be loth," said the latter, "to tell your majesty what the world would say, not only here but all Christendom over, if you should erect a monument for the duke, before you set up one for King James your father." The manner in which Buckingham's obsequies were eventually conducted, may afford food for meditation to the despiser of human greatness. Mr. Meade writes to Sir Martin Stuteville,—"Notwithstanding that on yesterday was se'nnight all the heralds were consulting with my lord treasurer to project as great a funeral for the duke as ever any subject of England had; nevertheless, last night, at ten of the clock, his funeral was solemnised in as poor and confused a manner as hath been seen, marching from Wallingford House over against Whitehall to Westminster Abbey; there being not much above one hundred mourners, who attended upon an empty coffin borne upon six men's shoulders, the duke's corpse itself being there interred yesterday, as if it had been doubted the people in their madness might have surprised it. But to prevent all disorder, the trainbands kept a guard on both sides of the way all along, from Wallingford House to Westminster church, beating up their drums loud, and carrying their pikes and muskets upon their shoulders as in a march, not trailing them at their heels, as is usual at a mourning. As soon as the coffin was entered the church, they came all away, without giving any volley of shot at all. And this was the obscure catastrophe of that great man." Buckingham was assassinated on the 23d of August, 1628, having scarcely completed his thirty-sixth year. At the time of his death he is said to have possessed about 4,000*l.* a-year, and 300,000*l.* in jewels; and that his debts amounted to 61,000*l.* Clarendon says, that though he died possessed of a large estate, yet the love of money had never swayed him either to an unjust or an unkind action.

Of the duke's widow, the particulars which have been recorded are not important. According to the fashion of the age, Sir William Davenant addressed a copy of verses to her on the assassination of her husband, in which the virtues of the duke form the principal topic:—

—"gone is now the pilot of the state,
The court's bright star, the clergy's advocate;
The poet's brightest theme, the lover's flame,
The soldier's glory, mighty Buckingham."

Wilson says that the duchess was bred a papist by her mother; became a zealous protestant after her marriage; but that afterwards, at her mother's instigation, she reverted to the Romish faith. Lord Clarendon, who was personally acquainted with her, says nothing of these tergiversations, but, on the contrary, speaks highly of her wit and spirit. The following lines are annexed to a scarce print of the duchess, engraved by Delaram:

The ancients, who three graces only knew,
Were rude and ignorant: look here and view
Thousands in this one visage; yea in this,
Which of the living but a shadow is.
If these her outward graces be refined,
What be the interior beauties of her mind.

Cowley also addressed a copy of verses to her, in which encomium almost amounts to hyperbole:

If I should say that in your face were seen
Nature's best picture of the Cyprian Queen;
If I should swear under Minerva's name,
Poets (who prophets are) foretold your fame;

The future age would think it flattery;
But the present, which can witness be,
'Twould seem beneath your high deserts as far,
As you above the rest of women are.

The duchess, after the death of her husband, married Randolph Macdonald, Earl and Marquis of Antrim. The king was much displeased with the match, though he afterwards forgave the widow of his friend. Buckingham had four children by his duchess; Charles, who died an infant; George, the witty duke, who succeeded him; Francis, who fell in the civil wars; and Mary, afterwards duchess of Richmond. The king ever regarded and treated them as his own children, and educated them in his own family.

THOMAS WENTWORTH,

EARL OF STRAFFORD.

They were a remarkable party who assembled round the council-table of Charles I. Besides the unfortunate monarch, there sat the magnificent Buckingham, the loyal Hamilton, the severe Strafford, the high-churchman Laud, the melancholy Falkland, and the gay and graceful Holland. In the midst of their haughty councils and high resolves, how little did they foresee the wretched fate which awaited them! There was not one of that assembly whose death was not violent. Charles, Hamilton, Strafford, Laud, and Holland, died on the scaffold; Buckingham fell by the hand of an assassin; and Falkland, under circumstances of peculiar bitterness, on the battlefield.

Were we to select from the royal party a single individual, whose brilliant qualities and open character would most strongly contrast with the wily fanatics and mushroom politicians of the age of Charles, our choice would undoubtedly fall on the stately Strafford. The nobleness of his disposition, his undeviating rectitude, his mental accomplishments, and steadfast fidelity to his sovereign; his high bearing, his long line of ancestry, and his graceful manners, are in strong relief, not only to the Harrisons and Barebones, but even to the Cromwells, and Pym, and Iretons of the day.

The subject of the present memoir, the eldest son of Sir William Wentworth, of Wentworth-Woodhouse, in the county of York, was born in Chancery Lane, London, 13th of April, 1593. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he proceeded on his travels with his tutor, a Mr. John Greenwood, for whose character he ever retained a particular respect. He returned to England early in 1613, and was shortly afterwards married to Margaret, eldest daughter of Francis Clifford, fourth Earl of Cumberland. He had no issue by this lady, who died in 1622, and was buried at York.

About the period of his marriage, Wentworth had been knighted. In 1614, he succeeded to the estates and title of his family, his father having been created a baronet by James the First, at the original institution of that order. In the parliament of 1621 he was returned as one of the representatives of Yorkshire, having, previous to his election, been sheriff of that county. On the 24th of February, 1625, he united himself to Arabella, second daughter of John Holles, first Earl of Clare. This lady died in October, 1631, leaving him with three children: William, who, in 1665, was restored to his father's titles; Anne, married to Edward Watson, Earl of Rockingham; and Arabella, married to John McCarthy, Viscount Mountcashel, in Ireland.

The Lady Arabella, his second wife, is described not only as very beautiful, but as possessing all those mental qualities which are likely to endear her to such a man as Strafford. He appears to have loved her sincerely, and to have deeply lamented her loss. It was of her, and of the children which she bequeathed him, that he spoke so feelingly on his trial. The enemies of Strafford, indeed, raised a scandalous report respecting the manner of this lady's death. It was asserted, that some letters, addressed by her husband to one of his mistresses, had fallen into her hands; that, on remonstrating with him on his infidelity, he struck her on the breast; and that, being with child at the time, she died of the consequences of the blow. The story is undoubtedly an utter falsehood.

There is no passage in Strafford's life where his character appears in a more amiable light, than in his love for his young offspring. When, in 1639, owing to the troubles of the period, he was compelled to send his daughters to their grandmother, the Countess of Clare; he addressed a letter to that lady, which strongly exhibits his affection, and his unwillingness to be deprived of their society. "I must confess," he says, "it was not without difficulty before I could persuade myself thus to be deprived the looking upon them, who, with their brother, are the pledges of all the comfort, the greatest at least, of my old age, if it shall please God I attain thereunto. But I have been brought up in afflictions of this kind, so that I still fear to have that taken first that is dearest unto me." He afterwards adds—"Nan, they tell me, danceth prettily; which I wish, if with convenience it might be, were not lost; more to give her a comely grace in the carriage of her body than that I wish they should much delight or practise it when they are women. Arabella is a small practitioner that way also; and they are both very apt to learn that, or any thing they are taught. Nan, I think, speaks French prettily, which yet I might have been better able to judge, had her mother lived. The other also speaks, but her maid being of Guernsey, the accent is not good. But your ladyship is in this excellent, as that, as indeed all things which may befit them, they may, and I hope will, learn better with your ladyship than they can with their poor father, ignorant in what belongs to women, and otherways, God knows, distracted, and so wanting unto them in all, save in loving them; and therein, in truth, I shall never be less than the dearest parent in the world."

The Lady Anne, or, as her father styles her, "Nan," was Strafford's favourite daughter; indeed, as much may be gleaned from the manner in which he dwells on her accomplishments in the foregoing extract. When Strafford was absent from Yorkshire, during the progress of some family buildings in that county, the little lady, then between three and four years old, used to overlook the workmen, and took much interest in seeing their work advance. Sir William Penynman writes to Strafford:—"Your children are all very well, and your lordship needs not fear the going forward of your building, when you have so careful a steward as Mrs. Anne. She complained to me very much of two rainy days, which, as she said, hindered her from coming down, and the building from going up." The affectionate father was, doubtless, pleased with this precocious humour—indeed, older people have said worse things.

Strafford, as is well known, had been long distinguished among the popular leaders of the House of Commons for his violent opposition to the court. Whether his defection was owing to ambition, the love of power, or to an awakened dread for the constitution of his country; whether it was the splendid promises of Charles, eager to gain over so powerful a mind, or a fear that his associates were proceeding to too great lengths, it is now impossible to determine. However, his sudden leap from a patriot to a courtier was as severe a blow to his own party as it was a triumph to the court. To the astonishment of all men, he was created suddenly, 22d July, 1628, Baron Wentworth, Newmarsh, and Oversley. Shortly after his elevation, he met his old friend Pym. "You see," said Strafford, "I have left you." "So I perceive," was the demagogue's reply; "but we shall never leave you as long as you have a head on your shoulders." Pym kept his word, and never lost sight of Strafford till he had brought him to the block. It would be curious to discover whether a rivalry for the favours of the enchanting Countess of Carlisle had any share in their animosity. They were certainly both of them admirers of her beauty, and at different times successful candidates for her favours: but the supposition can only rest on conjecture, and that too an improbable one.

As Strafford had no apparent claims to the peerage, it was given out that his elevation was solely owing to his illustrious ancestry. Accordingly, the preamble to his patent is emblazoned with a long list of honourable names, and his descent deduced lineally from John of Gaunt; a circumstance, which, of course, would prove his alliance to the blood royal. When the latter fact was mentioned to Lord Powis,—"Damme!" he said, "if ever he comes to be King of England, I'll turn rebel!" On the 10th of December, 1628, Strafford was advanced to be Viscount Wentworth, and, in 1629, he was made a Privy Councillor, appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Yorkshire, and President of the North. In February, 1633, he was nominated Lord-Deputy of Ireland, in which country his splendid services are well known.

Previously to his departure for his government, he united himself, a third time, in October, 1632, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Godfrey Rhodes, Knt., of Great Houghton in Yorkshire. He seems to have been somewhat ashamed of the match, for the ceremony took place in private, and it was some time before it was divulged to the world. His letters to this lady are commonplace, and, though they do not want affection, exhibit no remarkable evidence of her influence, or of her intellectual capacity. The earl was undoubtedly a great admirer of female charms; and in this instance had probably been captivated by mere personal beauty. The following letter may be taken as a specimen of his correspondence with his third wife. The allusion to the two ladies who had gone before her, could scarcely have been gratifying to the young bride. The letter is dated 19th November, 1632, the month after their marriage.

"Dear Bess,

"Your first lines were welcome unto me, and I will keep them, in regard I take them to be full, as of kindness, so of truth. It is no presumption for you to write unto me: the fellowship of marriage ought to carry with it more of love and equality than any other apprehension. So I desire it may ever be betwixt us; nor shall it ever break of my part. Virtue is the highest value we can set upon ourselves in this world, and the chief which others are to esteem us by. That preserved, we become capable of the noblest impressions which can be imparted unto us. You succeed in this family two of the rarest ladies of their time. Equal them in those excellent dispositions of your mind, and you become every ways equally worthy of any thing that they had, or that the rest of the world can give. And be you ever assured to be by me cherished and assisted the best I can through the whole course of my life, wherein I shall be no other to you than I was to them, to wit,

"Your loving husband"

"WENTWORTH."

Strafford mixes strangely the care of his wife's morals with that of her personal appearance. In the postscript of a letter, dated a few days afterwards, he writes:—"If you will speak to my cousin Radcliffe for the paste I told you of for your teeth, and desire him to speak to Dr. Moore in my name, for two pots of it, and that the doctor will see it be good—for this last indeed were not so—you may bring me one down, and keep the other yourself." By his third wife Strafford had two children, Thomas and Margaret, who both died unmarried.

In 1640, his final honours were conferred on him. On the 12th of January, 1640, he was created Baron Raby, of Raby Castle, in the Bishopric of Durham, with a special remainder, and Earl of Strafford; and on the 12th of September following, he was invested with the Order of the Garter.

Strafford's defection from his friends, his powerful intellect, his entire devotion to his sovereign and to the Church of England, and the lofty tone which he adopted in council, had long aroused the fear and hatred of the popular party. In England it was the fashion to speak of him as the common enemy of freedom and mankind. In Scotland, his vigorous opposition to the rebels and covenanters, in the cabinet as well as in the field, had long rendered him detested. In Ireland, for centuries the hot-bed of faction, he was certain to find enemies. The conduct which rendered him the idol of one party, was sure to entail the hatred of the other; and the Irish parliament, which had so lately lauded him to the skies, were the first to buzz around the sick lion.

With three kingdoms thus arrayed against him, and with every advantage of those petty means of which power, though only dishonourably, can avail itself: deserted by the sovereign whom he had so splendidly served; the friend, who might most have assisted him; unconstitutionally imprisoned; and himself deprived of the aid of legal advice, this great man stood on his trial unsupported and alone.

Strafford had no sooner arrived from Ireland, than his former friend and now sworn enemy, Pym, commenced the attack. He informed the House of Commons that he had matter of the utmost importance to communicate to them, desiring, at the same time, that the doors might be locked, and the keys laid upon the table. Pym's famous speech is well known. Though he spoke of the earl as an enemy to his country, and even descended to a low vituperation of his private character, as regarded his admiration of women, he alluded to his courage, enterprise, and capacity, with the highest encomiums. Strafford was impeached of high treason; and before he could even be made aware of the proceedings, Pym was deputed by the Commons to carry up the accusation to the House of Lords.

There is extant a curious journal, addressed by Dr. Robert Baillie, Principal of the University of Glasgow, to the Presbytery of Irvine in Scotland. The person had been delegated by the covenanting lords in Scotland to draw up the articles of impeachment against Archbishop Laud. He was on the spot at the time, and gives the following interesting account of the apprehension of Strafford.

"All things go here as we could wish. The Lieutenant of Ireland came but on Monday to town, late; on Tuesday rested, and on Wednesday came to parliament; but ere night he was caged. Intolerable pride and oppression call to Heaven for vengeance! The lower house closed their doors; the speaker kept the keys till his accusation was concluded. Thereafter Mr. Pym went up with a member at his back to the higher house, and, in a pretty short speech, did in the name of the Commons of all England accuse Thomas Lord Stafford of high treason, and required his person to be arrested till probation might be made: so Mr. Pym and his pack were removed. The Lords began to consult upon that strange and unpremeditated motion. The word goes in haste to the lord lieutenant, where he was with the king. With speed he comes to the House of Peers, and calls rudely at the door. James Maxwell, keeper of the black rod, opens. His lordship, with a proud glooming countenance, makes towards his place at the board head; but at once many bid him void the house. So he is forced in confusion to go to the door till he is called. After consultation, he stands, but is told to kneel, and on his knees to hear the sentence. Being on his knees, he is delivered to the black rod to be prisoner till he is cleared of the crimes he is charged with. He offered to speak, but was commanded to begone without a word. In the outer room, James Maxwell required of him, as prisoner, to deliver him his sword. When he had got it, with a loud voice he told his man to carry the lord lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people towards his coach, all gazing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest in England would have stood uncovered, all crying, 'What is the matter?' He said, 'a small matter, I warrant you.' They replied, 'Yes, indeed, high treason is a small matter!' Coming to the place where he expected his coach, it was not there; so behoved to return the same way through a world of gazing people. When at last he had found his coach, and was entering it, James Maxwell told him, 'My lord, you are my prisoner, and must go in my coach!' so he behoved to do so. For some days too many went to see him: but since, the parliament has commanded his keepers to be straiter. Pursuivants are despatched to Ireland to open all the ports, and to proclaim that all who had grievances might come over."

The famous trial scene of the Earl of Strafford took place in Westminster Hall, 22d March, 1641. At the upper end of the hall was placed a throne for the king, and a chair for the prince: the king, however, though present, did not publicly exhibit himself. On each side of the throne were erected temporary closets, covered with tapestry. In one of these sat some French nobles who were then in England; and in the other the king and queen, with several ladies of the court. A curtain had been attached to the front of this box, which was intended to preserve the royal party unseen, but Charles, for some reason, instantly tore it down with his own hands. The queen, we are told, and the court ladies, were constantly observed employed in taking notes during the trial.

Immediately beneath the throne, on seats covered with green cloth, sat the peers in their parliamentary robes; and near them the judges on "sacks of wool," in their scarlet gowns. Lower down were ten ranges of seats for the members of the house of commons. A bar, covered with green cloth, ran across the centre of the hall. Behind this was placed a table and desk for the convenience of the prisoner, and a chair which he could make use of if he felt himself fatigued. Close to him stood Sir William Balfour, the lieutenant of the Tower. Strafford employed four secretaries, who sat at a desk behind him; and on one side of them were the witnesses for the prosecution. Galleries were erected on each side of the hall, which were filled with spectators, including members of the House of Commons not actually concerned in the impeachment.

Strafford, on each day of the trial, was brought from the tower, attended by six barges, and guarded by a hundred soldiers. On his landing at Westminster, he was received by a hundred of the train-bands, who conducted him to the hall, and afterwards guarded the doors. Strafford and the peers generally arrived about eight in the morning; the king usually preceding them by about half an hour.

Rushworth, who was employed to take notes of the evidence, has supplied most of these particulars. Principal Baillie speaks of it as "daily, the most glorious assembly the isle could afford," and supplies some interesting particulars of Strafford's carriage. "All being set," he writes, "the prince in his robes, in a little chair on the side of the throne, the chamberlain and black rod went in and brought in my Lord Strafford. He was always in the same suit of black. At the entry he made a low courtsey; proceeding a little, he gave a second; when he came to his desk, a third; then, at the bar, the fore face of his desk, he kneeled: rising quickly, he saluted both sides of the house, and then sat down. Some few of the lords lifted their hats to him. This was his daily carriage."

The judgment and ability with which Strafford defended his cause, and the entire illegality of the whole proceedings, are matters of history. Had he not been foredoomed, his unanswerable arguments and pathetic eloquence must undoubtedly have acquitted him. Pointing to his children who stood beside him, he thus concluded his brilliant speech: "My lords, I have now troubled your lordships a great deal longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these pledges that a saint in heaven has left me." He then paused and wept. "I should be loth, my lords,—what I forfeit for myself is nothing: but, I confess, that my indiscretion should forfeit for them, it wounds me very deeply. You will be pleased to pardon my infirmity; something I should have said, but I see I shall not be able, and therefore I will leave it. And now, my lords, for myself, I thank God, I have been, by his good blessing towards me, taught that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared with that eternal weight of glory that shall be revealed to us hereafter. And so, my lords, even so with all humility and all tranquillity of mind, I do submit myself clearly and freely to your judgments, and whether that righteous judgment shall be to life or to death,

Te Deum laudamus, Te Deum confitemur."

Even his enemies beheld his demeanour, and listened to his eloquence, with admiration. After giving his evidence against Strafford, Sir William Pennyman burst into tears. But the strongest testimony is that of Whitelock, who was chairman of the committee who drew up the impeachment. "Never," he says, "any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and actions, than did this great and excellent person, and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted, to remorse and pity." When Cardinal Richelieu was told of Strafford's execution, "The English nation," he said, "were so foolish, that they would not let the wisest head among them stand upon its own shoulders."

While the trial was still proceeding the earl had received the following memorable letter from Charles.

"Strafford,

"The misfortune that is fallen upon you by the strange mistaking and conjunction of these times, being such that I must lay by the thought of employing you hereafter in my affairs, yet I cannot satisfy in honour or conscience, without assuring you, now in all our troubles, that, upon the word of a king, you shall not suffer in life, honour, or fortune. This is but justice, and, therefore, a very mean reward from a master to so faithful and able a servant, as you have shown yourself to be; yet it is as much as I conceive the present times will permit, though none shall hinder me from being

"Your constant faithful friend,

"CHARLES R."

This solemn promise of Charles, and the certainty that no crime amounting to treason could be proved against him, appears to have satisfied Strafford that his punishment would at least not be capital. "Sweet heart," he writes to his wife; "albeit all be done against me that art and malice can devise, with all the rigour possible, yet I am in great inward quietness, and a strong belief God will deliver me out of all these troubles. The more I look into my case the more hope I have, and sure, if there be any honour and justice left, my life will not be in danger." In another letter he writes; "Your carriage, upon this occasion, I should advise to be calm, not seeming to be neglective of my trouble, and yet as there may appear no dejection in you. Continue in the family as formerly, and make much of your children. Tell Will, Nan, and Arabella, I will write to them by the next. In the mean time I shall pray for them to God, that he may bless them, and, for their sakes, deliver me out of the furious malice of my enemies, which yet, I trust, through the goodness of God, shall do me no hurt. God have us all in his blessed keeping.

"Your very loving husband,

"STRAFFORD."

It is painful to perceive how confident was the earl's reliance on the king's promise. He says, in one of his last letters to his wife, "I know, at the worst his majesty will pardon without hurting my fortune, and then I shall be happy. Therefore comfort yourself, for I trust these clouds will away, and that we shall have fair weather afterwards."

There can be no doubt but that a most alarming popular convulsion would have ensued, had Charles exercised the royal prerogative, and refused his assent to Strafford's death. Whitelock says, "A rabble of about six thousand men, out of the city, came thronging down to Westminster, with swords, cudgels, and staves, calling out for justice against the Earl of Strafford, and pretending decay of trade and want of bread." Fear had already prevailed over the lords; but something more was wanting to induce the king to break his word, and to put his hand to the death-warrant of his most faithful friend. However, the patriots still hoped to obtain their end by intimidation. Reports of foreign invasion, of conspiracies against the Commons, and of a general rising in England, were ingeniously and successfully promulgated. So terrified, indeed, were the king's personal friends, that, almost to a man, they endeavoured to persuade him to his dishonour; and the queen, who had formerly been on bad terms with Strafford, though she had more recently exerted herself strenuously in his favour, beseeched the king, with tears in her eyes, to consult the safety of his family, and listen to the fearful outcry which was raised.

There were none of his own misfortunes which so painfully affected Charles as the agony of these distressing moments. On the one hand were the tears and entreaties of his family and friends; the prospect of civil war; and, in all human probability, of utter ruin: on the other hand, there was dishonour and the sacrifice of his friend. A more terrible conflict can scarcely be conceived. That Charles yielded to the emergency; that his own miserable fate was the fruit of that untoward concession, exemplifies in an admirable manner the Christian tenet, not to do evil that good may come.

Charles, however, before he could be induced to assent to the death of Strafford, strained every nerve to save his life. On the first of May he summoned together the two houses of parliament, and fervently implored them not to proceed too harshly against the earl. He said, that, as regarded most of the charges, he was satisfied of Strafford's innocence; that, in his heart, he could not accuse him of high treason, and that neither fear nor any other motive should induce him to consent to his death. The earl, he said, had doubtless been guilty of many misdemeanours; indeed, so satisfied was he of that fact, that he solemnly promised them never again to employ him in any place of trust; "no," he added pointedly, "not even in that of a constable."

But, unfortunately, the security of the patriots was in the death of Strafford, and the king's entreaties were unavailing. Finally, on the 11th of May, the day preceding the earl's death he sent the Prince of Wales to the House of Lords, with a letter written in his own hand, in which he implored them, as a favour to himself, to seek a conference with the Commons, and to use their utmost endeavours to spare the earl's life. When, eventually, Charles put his hand to the death-warrant, "My Lord of Strafford's condition," he said, "is more enviable than mine."

The injustice which Charles thus allowed himself to be guilty of, was looked back upon with the deepest remorse and penitence during the misfortunes which afterwards overwhelmed him. We have seen him making a solemn vow, that should opportunities hereafter offer, he would perform public penance for the death of his servant. To the queen he writes in one of his letters, "Nothing can be more evident, than that Strafford's innocent blood hath been one of the great causes of God's just judgments upon this nation, by a furious civil war; both sides being hitherto almost equally punished, as being in a manner almost equally guilty." He afterwards put to paper some reflections on Strafford's death, which afford painful evidence of his remorse: "I never," he says, "bore any touch of conscience with greater regret, and I have often with sorrow confessed it both to God and man." The bitter recollection still haunted him on the scaffold. Almost in his last moments he exclaimed, "God forbid that I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say that God's judgments are just upon me. Many times he doth pay justice by an unjust sentence: that is ordinary. I will only say this,—that an unjust sentence, that I suffered to take effect, is punished by an unjust sentence upon me." If the world blamed Charles, Charles at least blamed himself more."

The king, in all probability, would never have consented to Strafford's execution, but for the famous letter which the earl himself sent him; in which he prayed him to pass the bill for his attainder, as the only means of setting the conscience of his sovereign at liberty, and of restoring him to the affections of his people. The fact, however, of Strafford so nobly offering his life, to insure the welfare of his master, should rather have acted as an additional inducement to Charles in refusing his assent. Strafford's letter, the authenticity of which has been most unreasonably called in question by Carte, will be found in the Harleian Miscellany. After using many arguments to persuade Charles to consent to his execution; "Sir," he concludes, "my consent shall more acquit you to God, than all the world can do besides. To a willing mind there is no injury done; and as by God's grace, I forgive all the world, so I can give up the life of this world with all cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknowledgment of your exceeding favour; and only beg that, in your goodness, you would vouchsafe to cast your gracious regard upon my poor son and his sisters, less or more; and no otherwise than their unfortunate father shall appear more or less worthy of his death. God long preserve your majesty."

Whether or not the crimes and misdemeanours of Strafford rendered his punishment a just one, did not so much weigh on Charles's conscience, as the fact that no charge whatever which had been brought against him was legally punishable by death. It is this fact which made him say to the queen, that "both sides are equally guilty." The world will more readily forgive the faults of Strafford, than they will acquit Charles for having consented to his death.

The king had no sooner given his assent to Strafford's attainder, than he despatched secretary Carleton to the Tower, to communicate to the earl the reasons which had influenced him. He laid considerable weight on the circumstance of Strafford having himself importuned him to sacrifice his life. When Carleton had concluded, the earl could scarcely credit his senses. Whitelock says, he "seriously asked the secretary whether his majesty had passed the bill or not; as not believing, without some astonishment, that the king would have done it." When the other assured him it was but too true, he rose from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, and laying his hands upon his heart, exclaimed, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation." In a letter to his faithful secretary, Slingsby, "Your going to the king," says Strafford, "is to no purpose. I am lost: my body is theirs, but my soul is God's. There is little trust in man."

Strafford was no sooner convinced that Charles was either unable or unwilling to exercise the royal prerogative, than he sat himself to devise a plan of escape from the Tower. There was a scheme, to which Charles himself was certainly a party, of carrying him away by water. It was unfortunately discovered by some women listening at a keyhole, who contrived to overhear the conversation between Strafford and the captain of a vessel in which he was to have embarked. An examination took place before a joint committee of the lords and commons, when it appeared, by the evidence produced, that either a Captain Billingsley, or the earl's secretary, Slingsby, (for the identity is doubtful,) had received the king's private authority to convey a hundred men into the Tower. Moreover, it was sworn to by Sir William Balfour, the Lieutenant of the Tower, that Strafford had offered him twenty-two thousand pounds to connive at his flight; offering at the same time to exonerate him with the parliament, by placing in his hands a warrant, signed by the king himself, which would authorise him to remove his prisoner to some other place of safety therein named. The remaining witnesses were the women. They deposed that being anxious to obtain a sight of the earl, they had been led to the back door of the gallery in which his apartments were situated; by which means they had observed the prisoner pacing up and down with Billingsley, and had overheard them conversing as to the best means of effecting his escape, and the degree of reliance which could safely be placed in the lieutenant. Mrs. Hutchinson also, in her Memoirs, speaks of a plot for releasing Strafford from prison, and afterwards placing him at the head of eight thousand Irish.

Strafford at length perceiving all earthly hope to be at an end, prepared himself for the fatal stroke with a piety suited to a Christian, and the dignity becoming a great man. He addressed an affectionate letter of advice to his young son, and another to his secretary, Guildford Slingsby; the latter undoubtedly the most beautiful composition which has issued from his pen. The brief but honourable career of this person is worthy of being rescued from oblivion. He was the eldest son of Sir Guildford Slingsby, of a good family in Yorkshire. Strafford had long kept him about his person; had trusted him with his most important papers, and he was present with him both at his trial and after his condemnation. Subsequently to the death of his master, Slingsby went abroad, but on the return of Henrietta Maria to England he came in the train of that princess, and retired to Cleveland, where he possessed a small estate. Here, his popularity was so great, that in a short time he levied a body of eight hundred foot and eighty horse, to aid the fortunes of his sovereign. But before this little army had been half disciplined, they were set upon by Sir Hugh Cholmley, with a force nearly double in numbers. Slingsby was too chivalrous to decline an engagement, and succeeded in routing the enemy's horse. Having effected so much, he placed himself at the head of his infantry, but, unfortunately, receiving a severe wound, and his horse falling, he was taken prisoner. Sir Hugh Cholmley had generosity enough to feel for a brave adversary. He had Slingsby conveyed to Gisborough, where it was found necessary to amputate both his legs. He survived the terrible operation but three days. His mother hastened to Gisborough, where she found the hope of her family, and the prop of her old age, a corpse. Sir Hugh, we are told, lamented almost as deeply as the bereaved parent the loss of "so accomplished a gentleman."

Strafford passed to his execution less like a condemned criminal than like a gentleman at the head of his army. The Lieutenant of the Tower had strongly recommended him to make use of a coach, lest the people, he said, should rush on him and tear him to pieces. "No," said the earl, "I dare look death in the face, and trust the people too. Have you a care that I do not escape, and I care not how I die, whether by the hand of the executioner, or the fury of the people." He is reported to have composed a copy of verses the night previous to his execution, but as there is considerable doubt whether they are genuine, it has not been thought necessary to insert them.

Strafford was accompanied to the scaffold by the Archbishop of Armagh, the Earl of Cleveland, his brother Sir George Wentworth, and others of his friends. Something of his former contempt of the vulgar seems to have clung to him even in that awful moment. His parting speech was addressed rather to the archbishop and to his immediate friends, than to the rabble who hooted him to his death. His last address was such as might be expected from such a man. He asserted that never at any moment had he entertained a thought which he believed to be in opposition to the welfare and happiness, either of the king or the people. He expressed himself to be a true son of the Church of England, adding that he bore enmity to no man, and that he freely forgave all. "Since I was twenty-one years of age," he said, "unto this day, I never had thought or doubt of the truth of this religion; nor had any ever the boldness to suggest to me the contrary, to my best remembrance."

Having shaken hands with his friends, his chaplain laid the book of common prayer on a chair, and kneeling down together, they remained praying for about half an hour. He then rose, and beckoning his brother to him, desired him to bear his love to his wife and sister. Further, he requested him to give his blessing to his son, with these solemn injunctions,—that he should continue firm in the doctrine of the Church of England, and in his duty to his king; that he should entertain no thought of revenge against his father's enemies, and that he should aim at no higher distinction, than to dispense justice on his own estate. "Carry my blessing also," he added, "to my daughters Anne and Arabella. Charge them to serve and fear God, and he will bless them; not forgetting my little infant, that knows neither good nor evil, and cannot speak for itself; God speak for it and bless it. I have well nigh done. One stroke more will make my wife husbandless, my dear children fatherless, my poor servants masterless, and separate me from my dear brothers and all my friends; but let God be to you and them all in all."

The earl then took off his doublet. "I thank God," he said, "I am no more afraid of death; but as cheerfully put off my doublet at this time as ever I did when I went to bed." Having put on a white cap, he thrust his hair underneath it with his own hands. He then inquired for the executioner who came forward and requested his forgiveness. "I forgive you," said Strafford, "and all the world." Kneeling down at the gallantry and good manners. But it would rather seem, that the laws selected by them speak only the same language of contempt and censure held by all eastern nations alike on this topic. However, the ancient men utter, here and there, a seasonable word.—“A man, both day and night, must keep his wife so much in subjection that she by no means be mistress of her own actions; if the wife have her own free will, she will behave amiss.” The law then proceeds to sum up the feminine character with great acrimony of satire: “Women have six qualities; the first, an inordinate desire for jewels and fine furniture, handsome clothes and nice victuals; the second, immoderate love; the third, violent anger; the fourth, deep resentment; the fifth, another person’s good appears evil in their eyes; the sixth, they commit bad actions.” The following provision with which we shall conclude these extracts, refers to the well-known custom of the Hindoo widows. The sacrifice of their lives is not peremptorily en-

This estate of the crown was formerly the outer park attached to the royal mansion of Henry VIII. at Marylebone, which was taken down in the year 1790. It consists of 543 acres, and was granted by three crown leases, the family of Hinds being possessed of 9-24 parts of the property for a term of years, which expired January 24th, 1806; the other 15-24ths being possessed by the Duke of Portland for a term of years, expiring January 24th, 1811.

Soon after this, the then Commissioners of Woods and Forests contemplated improvements of a more extensive kind than had originally been thought of—the long-cherished design of the crown being to convert the Marylebone estate into a military farm, of which we find the following notice in an early number of the Gentleman’s Magazine—

“The intended Military Park at Welling’s farm, Marylebone, is nearly laid out. Two grand barracks are to be erected, one on each wing, spacious enough for the reception of 3000 men; the whole is to be inclosed with a belt of forest-trees, a considerable part of which is already planted, and on the outside of which will be a carobme and show the starry hour

What wealth of love thou hidest from me!

Awake! awake!

Show all thy love, for Love’s sweet sake!

Awake!—ne’er heed, though listening night

Steal music from thy silver voice:

Uncloud thy beauty rare and bright,

And bid the world and me rejoice!

Awake! awake!

She comes, at last—for Love’s sweet sake!

LIFE.—BY BARRY CORNWALL.

We are born; we laugh; we weep;

We love; we droop; we die!

Ah! wherefore do we laugh or weep?

Why do we live or die?

Who knows that secret deep?

Alas, not I!

Why doth the violet spring

Unseen by human eye?

Why do the radiant seasons bring

Sweet thoughts that quickly fly?

Why do our fond hearts cling

To things that die?

We toil,—through pain and wrong;

We fight,—and fly;

We love; we lose; and then e’er long,

Stone dead we lie.

O Life! is all thy song,

Endure and—die!

THE LUNGS OF LONDON.

HYDE PARK.

You observe that unimpeachable pony-phaeton, drawn by two cream-coloured ponies—what simplicity—what taste—such inexpensive elegance you might say! Notwithstanding which, that phaeton has not been turned out of Long Acre under two hundred and fifty guineas, and the ponies one hundred and fifty the pair—not a speck you may perceive of silver or brass on the harness—not an atom of gold lace on the subdued and sober livery of the tiger—the equipage is not, you see, perched on wheels or hung on a perch—it reclines, as it were taking its ease, and floats lightly and easily in perfect equilibrium. The turn-out is, without doubt, the most elegant in the ring—it attracts admiration by a studious endeavour to decline it, and belongs, I think, to the Earl of Harrington. To contrast with it, pray note that continental cab, driven by the man in a huge moustache—an attaché to the French embassy—did you ever—Long Acre would blush for such a concern: you see the body of the machine is painted an odious chocolate colour, picked out with broad stripes of white, that give it the appearance of being bound round the edges with penny tape, a blazing armorial bearing on every side, such as you see on shabby hackney coaches—it is evidently ashamed of itself, too, for you observe it is making a desperate effort to dive down head foremost between the shafts, to counteract which centripetal tendency is, without doubt, the proprietor’s reason for mounting a tiger behind, who, in loudness and size, looks more like an unfledged elephant—regard the harness, too, all brass and no leather. Who is that fellow in military uniform, joggling behind the cab on a wagoner’s black horse, with a couteau de chasse, and a cock’s feather in his cocked hat—a field-marshal, doubtless, of the grand army—no such thing, my dear sir, simply a footman in disguise. Mercy on us, assuredly our heads will be all cut off! Ridiculous as that turn-out appears in our country, and in our eyes, I can assure you that, on the Prado of Madrid, the Corso of Rome, or at the Parisian fête of Long Champs, this attaché and his descending cab would be considered machines of the very first fashion.

You see that slashing yellow chariot with the pair of dark bays—close in the rear of it you may observe a coach of a deep claret-colour—a fine pair of bright bays under it, and the coachman and footmen in pepper and salt, with plain cockades—that is one of the royal carriages and exactly the thing that a royal carriage ought to be—no cock’s feathers, no lubberly footmen, no blazing armorial bearings—no gold, in short, upon our gingerbread. Close at the heels of the royal equipage may be seen three in a gig—such a gig, and such a three!—Fitz-Wiggins and the Frenchman are both thrown into the shade. Hilloa! who would thought of seeing young Capillaire, the fashionable wig-trimmer’s son of Bond street—there he goes, however, at railway pace, on his half guinea hack, making the best use he can of his ten-and-sixpence worth of equestrian exercitation. Now they are all at a dead lock—the triple line of wealth, fashion, and pretension has come to a regular stand-still—we will have time enough to walk half round the circle before they are able to get on again.

The stroll along the beach of that cockney ocean, the Serpentine, is delightful—the carriage-way is carefully watered, and the heat of the summer’s day tempered by a refreshing breeze from the river. There is, on the one side and the other, as George Robins would say, a never ending panorama of moving scenery. Now are we opposite the receiving-house of the Royal Humane Society, and pause a moment to admire the aptitude of the device carved in marble over the door—a cherub endeavouring to relight, with his breath, an extinguished lamp, with the touching and beautiful motto,

Let us turn up this little path, and make our way to the chalybeate springs,—I should rather say to the site of the chalybeate springs—for they are long since dried up, and, like benefits conferred, are forgotten. Here they were in this little glen, once the most beautiful and retired spot within the circumference of the park, and would be so still, if some military Goths—the Board of Ordnance, I suspect—had not desecrated it by the erection of a very ugly barrack—all barracks are ugly, but this particular barrack, being located in a sweet pretty place, is superlatively ugly—we wonder the Board of Ordnance has not a little more taste! A little further on, and we come to a couple of leafless old trees—nature’s own ruins—ivy-mantled, and carefully defended from the rude assaults of idle men and boys by an iron paling—two venerable old cripples are they—what names they are known by I am sure I know not—but this I know, that I never look upon them without humming the old Scottish oldward, old folks’ tune of “John Anderson my jo.”

Now, the classic bridge over the Serpentine—a very neat fresh-water bridge as you would wish to see in a summer day—attracts our architectural optics, and beneath its arches we catch on our picturesque retina small patches of the verdant green of Kensington Gardens, whither we are tending. We are assuredly in the country now?—no such thing; for just at our nose is a powder magazine, of an exploded order of architecture, that transports us back again to the piazza of Covent Garden. Heaven sends fields and groves, hills and dales, wood and water, and ever in the midst of these, the devil sends one of his chosen architects; or, what is ten times worse, the Board of Ordnance send one of theirs, to dissolve the charm, and to load the lovely earth with ugliness not her own!

We are on the bridge of the Serpentine—over the keystone of the centre arch; and without affectation—that is, without cockney affectation—there are few points of view in the immediate vicinity of great cities more attractive than this. To the east lies the whole length of the Serpentine, and to the west extends the sweep of the same river, as it bends towards Bayswater, where it enters the park, with the gently swelling banks rising on either side. The view from the high grounds near Cumberland gate is also very fine, and the Queen’s ride affords many pleasing prospects to the right and left. From the termination of this noble avenue we enter, by a foot gate,

KENSINGTON GARDENS.

Which consisted originally, as we are told by Pennant, of only twenty-six acres. Queen Ann added thirty acres, which were laid out by her gardener, Mr. Wise; but the principal additions were made by the late queen, who took in near three hundred acres out of Hyde Park, which were laid out by Bridgeman. They are now three and a half miles in circumference. The broad walk, which extends from the palace along the south side of the gardens is, in the spring, a very fashionable promenade, especially on Sunday mornings. Kensington Gardens have been the subject of several poems, one especially by Tickell, of which we would here insert some extracts did space permit. The present extent of these gardens is somewhere about three hundred and thirty-six acres, with eight acres of water, occupying a circular pond to the west of the palace—an ugly edifice, as all our metropolitan palatial edifices are—but unpretending enough; nor, unlike its precious colleague in St. James's Park, does it superadd impudence to vulgarity. At this season of the year Kensington Gardens look remarkably well; they have an air more park-like, more secluded, than any of the other public walks of the metropolis, and afford a more unbroken shelter from the noonday heat. Here is a solitude, a seclusion, as complete as can be wished for in the immediate vicinity of a great city; the noise, confusion, and racket of the mighty Babylon close by, is lost in the distance, save when the booming bell of St. Paul's is heard to thunder forth the fleeting hour. The trees here are more numerous, more lofty, and cast a greater breadth of shade than in the parks; but then, regarded individually, they are comparatively insignificant. The grounds are skillfully laid out, partly in the Dutch, partly in the English taste, which combination of the artificial formal, with the more natural irregular style, when cleverly executed, forms the perfection of landscape-gardening. This union of grandeur and breadth of effect with a certain degree of natural arrangement has been very well hit off in these gardens—the long, unbroken, regular avenues of green sward, with the dense columnar masses of foliage between, have something majestic in their appearance; while the absence of statues, hermitages, marble temples, bronze sarcophagi, and spouting monsters, relieves the scene from that constrained and artificial appearance that attends the vast majority of parks laid out in this style.

Our continental brethren carry this adornment of their public walks to a ridiculous excess. One would imagine that such places were intended as retreats from the bustle of cities; but a stranger entering the gardens of the Tuileries, for example, so far from being solaced with the agreeable delusion of retirement, finds himself introduced into the society of marble gentlemen and ladies, dying gladiators, gold and silver fish, orange trees stuck in green gallipots, and tritons spewing water in his face at every angle; so that he begins to feel himself altogether out of his element, and half inclined to resign the privilege of the promenade to the courtly creations of the magic pencil of Watteau, with their laced pocket-holes, clouded canes, velvet embroidery, and ruffles of Point d'Espagne. In Kensington Gardens, on the contrary, the lounge is not obliged to be so much upon his good behaviour; he can enjoy a stroll sufficiently retired for all reasonable purposes; and, if he does not object to good company, the broad walk affords good company in abundance—literary ladies with the last new novel—cooling turtles, squeezing the last drops of ambrosia out of the expiring honey-moon—and faded old gentlemen, in sky-blue coats, virgin waistcoats, Isabella-coloured "smalls," and black gaiters, who emerge from their neat suburban villas of Kensington, Gore, and Bayswater, to take the air, and sigh for the brocaded petticoats, high-heeled shoes, hoops, and powdered toupes of half a century ago.

The view from the centre of this broad walk, exactly in front of the palace, is one of the finest afforded anywhere in the vicinity of the metropolis. The trees, drawn up in close column, like a rifle brigade of his majesty, the Emperor of Brobdingnag—the vistas between extending far away into the shady distance—the verdure of the sward, which is here more luxuriant and unbroken than in the parks—the air of quiet and seclusion that is breathed over the scene, make it altogether superior to any thing the vicinity of towns can afford to the eye wearied with a universe of brick and mortar.

In the fashionable season, when the military bands assemble here for practice, which they usually do on every Tuesday and Friday, from four to six in the afternoon, near the bridge of the Serpentine, the concourse of fashionable people is immense—and the scene altogether of great animation. But it is time to proceed to the only remaining lobe of the Lungs of London: therefore, leaving Kensington Gardens by the Bayswater Gate, we make our way through a neighbourhood that has sprung up, like a mushroom, in one night—by the way, where or when, does any body think, will London stop?—we skirt the Great Western Railway station, enter Paddington, so to St. John's Wood, and find ourselves passing through Hanover Gate to the outer circle of the Regent's Park.

NEW BOOKS.

Irving's Life of Goldsmith.—2 vols. 18mo. Harpers, New York.

A new biography of Goldsmith, by Washington Irving, with a selection from his works by the same hand, is precisely such a book as one would wish to introduce into his own "family library." Irving could not have chosen a more congenial subject for his pen. His writings all evince a style, spirit, and temper entirely in unison with Goldsmith's; and, accordingly, writing con amore, he has produced a most delightful biography, filling the greater part of the first volume. In the extracts which make up the remainder of that volume and the second, are found some of Goldsmith's most delightful essays, stories, and poems.

Lives of Eminent Men.—2 vols. 18mo. Harper & Brothers, New York.

These are selected from the two volumes quarto, with splendid steel portraits, published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. They are written with great spirit, liberality, and intelligence. No doubt the different biographies come from different hands. In some of them we recognise the style of Keightley, who wrote, by the way, his history of Greece for this society. His learning, and the boldness and originality of his views, enable the reader always easily to identify his anonymous works.

Sketches of Distinguished Frenchmen.—Translated by Mr. Walsh, with a portrait of M. Thiers. Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia, 1841.

Bold, piquant, and graphic, these were precisely the papers most likely to arrest the attention of the younger Walsh, who has performed his task as if it were a labour of love. We only regret that one who knows Paris and its notables so well as he, and who converses with so much piquancy and humour on its various "phenomena," should not have enriched the volume before us with a few notes. We would bargain, most cheerfully, M. Thiers's portrait for a single page of Walsh's annotations.

LATE WORKS.

A most provoking accident to our press has delayed the publication of this number a full week. Had it not occurred, we should have presented our readers to-day with the commencement of Bulwer's new novel, "Night and Morning." It is in hand, and will appear immediately.—Feb. 26.

THE LUNGS OF LONDON.

THE REGENT'S PARK.

This estate of the crown was formerly the outer park attached to the royal mansion of Henry VIII. at Marylebone, which was taken down in the year 1790. It consists of 543 acres, and was granted by three crown leases, the family of Hinds being possessed of 9-24 parts of the property for a term of years, which expired January 24th, 1806; the other 15-24ths being possessed by the Duke of Portland for a term of years, expiring January 24th, 1811.

Soon after this, the then Commissioners of Woods and Forests contemplated improvements of a more extensive kind than had originally been thought of—the long-cherished design of the crown being to convert the Marylebone estate into a military farm, of which we find the following notice in an early number of the Gentleman's Magazine—

"The intended Military Park at Welling's farm, Marylebone, is nearly laid out. Two grand barracks are to be erected, one on each wing, spacious enough for the reception of 3000 men; the whole is to be inclosed with a belt of forest-trees, a considerable part of which is already planted, and on the outside of which will be a circular drive, open to the public, to an extent of four miles."

This barbarous notion of covering a lovely tract of land with barracks, and converting it into a grand parade-ground, was long after altogether abandoned; and in 1811, when the Duke of Portland's lease had expired, several eminent architects were invited by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to survey the crown lands of Marylebone Park, and, after considering the several documents communicated to them, to report upon the most advantageous and eligible method of letting the property, "always having in view the beauty of the metropolis, and the health and convenience of the public."

In pursuance of these instructions, surveys were made, and plans submitted by Mr. White, Messrs. Leverton and Chawner, and by that architectural nuisance, Mr. John Nash, whose plans had the sole merit of being the plans of the Surveyor to the Office of Woods and Forests, and for that sole reason were, of course, preferred, and the plan carried into execution, with slight alterations, as it now appears. Space will not permit us to give a detailed description of the beauties of the Regent's Park; we must therefore be content with a slight sketch, or general survey, leaving the tasteful perambulator to detect the minuter excellences for himself. Although the newest of the parks, this, even in its present immature state, is the most beautiful of any, and will become more and more so every succeeding year. It might with propriety be called the Park of Reunion, combining, as it does, all the excellences of all the public walks of the metropolis—extent—variety of prospect and of scenery—noble walks, of imposing breadth and longitudinal extent—a surface gently and pleasingly undulated—ornamental water—villas, encircled each by its little paradise of pleasure-ground—and, for its years, a very considerable quantity of shade.

The most beautiful portion of the park is, as might be expected, that portion to the north, which is hardly interfered with by the hand of art, and where the natural disposition of the ground has scope to show itself;—whereas, wherever the hand of Mr. John Nash is manifest, beauty is at once exchanged for artificial littleness, as in his greater and his lesser circuses, his ornamental bridges over puddles four feet wide, his Swiss cottages, and his terraces crowned with cupolas, that convey to the mind of the spectator the idea of a grotesque giant in his dressing-gown and night-cap. By far the most extensive and varied view within the limits of this delightful retreat, is that from the rising ground immediately above the master's lodge of St. Catharine's Hospital, embracing to the northward the gentle rise of Primrose Hill, behind it, the thickly wooded Hampstead, and its sister hill—close to your feet, the Babel of inarticulate sounds that greets your ears, indicates that modern Ark of Noah—the Zoological Gardens.

We have thus enumerated a very few of the leading features, to borrow a phrase of the prince of auctioneers, of the Lungs of London—the great vehicles of exercise, fresh air, health, and life to the myriads that congregate in the great metropolis. We have been sufficiently minute, we hope, without departing from our original plan of non-interference with the province of the guide-books, and yet not sufficiently discursive to disgust the reader with a subject in a moral, economical, national, and salutary point of view, so deeply interesting. We are surprised, we repeat, that this subject has not been taken up by abler pens—by Mr. Jesse, for example, one of the most natural, easy, and graceful writers who ever put pen to paper on the subject of our parks and royal palaces—a worthy brother of the angle, too—one of Father Isaak's quiet, decent men, who fear God, honour their king, love their neighbour, and peacefully go their way a-fishing. We cannot help thinking the metropolitan parks would furnish a theme not unworthy the pen of this gentleman,

"The apt historian of our royal plains."

But we must not conclude without adverting once again to the moral, if we may so call it, of our description—to the great object, towards the realisation whereof we were incited to put pen to paper on this subject. The total destitution of the people of the east end of the metropolis in the means of taking exercise, or gulping a mouthful of "caller" air, must have painfully obtruded itself on every body who is familiar with that terra incognita eastward of Leadenhall; the very class of the population, too, which is the most helpless in its own behalf, and which most of all requires the extension of those blessings which for themselves they have neither the address, skill, or energy to obtain. It would be found, we do not in the least doubt, that the mortality of the metropolis is exactly in the inverse ratio of proximity and access to public parks and open spaces; and this, for all we know to the contrary, may have already been demonstrated by Mr. Farr, or some other equally high authority in vital statistics.

Whether or not, however, the necessity of public walks—when we say public, we mean public, not gentility-mongering places, but spaces thrown open freely and altogether to the lowest class of our labouring and manufacturing population, who need all the rational recreation we can afford them—is but too apparent. Genteel people are abundantly provided for already: they can afford to go down the Thames and up the Thames—to the suburbs, the parks, the country. Money, and their legs, will carry them whither they will; but with the poor artisan or labouring man it is not so. He cannot afford time or means to set out with his wife and children on a Sunday voyage of discovery—and to find the shades of night, perhaps, falling around him just as he has succeeded in refreshing his eyes with a bit of anything green.

Does any body suppose that the love of nature is not an instinct with the imprisoned poor of our great cities, and of our great city of cities in particular? Go through a crowded neighbourhood, crammed from the cellar to the attic with the children of toil, and look up at their windows; see the attempt the poor people make to cherish the belief in a world of verdure and freshness—of trees, and hills, and vales, and flowers and birds—the little green box of cherished mignonette, the broken tea-pot with a bunch of primrose or of cowslip in it, the geranium in an old cracked jug: and the poor artisan himself, debarred as he is —“The common air, and common use Of his own limbs,”

nurturing with almost paternal affection, his two or three little shrubs or flowers—who will have the impudence to deny the capacity of this man for enjoying that which his condition in life almost precludes the possibility of enjoyment?

Let us hope that the Commissioners of Metropolitan Improvements will bestir themselves, and that in the east end of London—in Southwark and in Lambeth—something may be done in behalf of the creditable, industrious, and well-conducted manufacturing and labouring population of the vast metropolis of this vast empire.

POEMS BY JOANNA BAILLIE.

Fugitive Verses. By Joanna Baillie, author of “Dramas of the Passions,” &c. 12mo. pp. 408. London, 1840. Moxon.

Joanna Baillie's Fugitive Verses belong to a school which has been too much obliterated by the stronger features of romance and passion, of highly wrought sentiment and highly painted guilt, which appealing to the public mind with extraordinary force, have monopolised, rather than taken their fair share in the general productive circle of a nation's genius. But after stimulants and excitement it is pleasant to bring the appetite again to what is simple and natural, as it is to forget the storm in the bosom of repose, or retire from the thundering of eloquence into the easy familiarity of rational conversation. It is thus, that we are charmed with the nature and simplicity of poems composed anterior to the last half century—“written previous to 1790;” and scarcely less so with the more familiar pieces since that period; the former occupying 116 pages, and the latter the remainder of the volume.

The first poem in the volume is entitled “The Winter's day,” and it is paired by another called “The Summer's day;” both reminding us much of Thomson, upon whom it is evident the young Scottish aspirant formed her earlier efforts. The inspiration was from a pure source, and the thoughts and style not unworthy of the original model. Miss Baillie is, indeed, even more faithful in details, polishes and elevates less, and yet is at no great distance for sweet and captivating poetry.—Ex. gr.—

“The night comes on apace—
Chill blows the blast and drives the snow in wreaths;
Now every creature looks around for shelter,
And, whether man or beast, all move alike
Towards their homes, and happy they who have
A house to screen them from the piercing cold!
Lo! o'er the frost a reverend form advances!
His hair white as the snow on which he treads,
His forehead marked with many a care-worn furrow,
Whose feeble body bending o'er a staff,
Shows still that once it was the seat of strength,
Though now it shakes like some old ruined tower,
Clothed indeed, but not disgraced, with rage,
He still maintains that decent dignity
Which well becomes those who have served their country.

With tottering steps he gains the cottage door:
The wife within, who hears his hollow cough,
And pattering of his stick upon the threshold,
Sends out her little boy to see who's there.
The child looks up to mark the stranger's face,
And, seeing it enlightened with a smile,
Holds out his tiny hand to lead him in.
Round from her work the mother turns her head,
And views them, not ill pleased.
The stranger whines not with a piteous tale,
But only asks a little to relieve
A poor old soldier's wants.
The gentle matron brings the ready chair,
And bids him sit to rest his weary limbs,
And warm himself before her blazing fire.
The children full of curiosity,
Flock round, and with their fingers in their mouths

Stand staring at him, while the stranger, pleased,
Takes up the youngest urchin on his knee.
Proud of its seat, it wags its little feet,
And prates, and laughs, and plays with his white locks.

But soon a change comes o'er the soldier's face:
His thoughtful mind is turned on other days,
When his own boys were wont to play around him,
Who now lie distant from their native land
In honourable but untimely graves:
He feels how helpless and forlorn he is,
And big, round tears course down his withered cheeks.

His toilsome daily labour at an end,
In comes the wearied master of the house,
And marks with satisfaction his old guest
In the chief seat, with all the children round him.
His honest heart is filled with manly kindness,
He bids him stay and share their homely meal,
And take with them his quarters for the night.
The aged wanderer thankfully accepts,
And by the simple hospitable board,
Forgets the by-past hardships of the day.

When all are satisfied, about the fire
They draw their seats, and form a cheerful ring.
The thrifty house-wife turns her spinning wheel;
The husband, useful even in his hour
Of ease and rest, a stocking knits, belike,
Or plaited stored rushes, which, with after skill
Into a basket formed, may do good service,
With eggs or butter filled at fair or market.”

The whole poem is like to this, and all its pictures of rural life equally touching and true. We must endeavour to select a passage from “Summer” as another example,—this is morning:—

“For now the sun, slow moving in his glory,
Above the eastern mountains lifts his head;
The webs of dew spread o'er the hoary lawn,
The smooth, clear bosom of the settled pool,
The polished ploughshare on the distant field,
Catch fire from him, and dart their new got beams
Upon the gazing rustic's dazzled sight.

The awakened birds upon the branches hop,
Peck their soft down, and bristle out their feathers,
Then stretch their throats, and trill their morning song,

While dusky crows, high winged over head
Upon the topmast boughs, in lordly pride,
Mix their hoarse croaking with the linnet's note,
Till, in a gathered band of close array,
They take their flight to seek their daily food.
The villager wakes with the early light,
That through the windows of his cot appears,
And quits his easy bed; then o'er the fields
With lengthened active strides betakes his way,
Bearing his spade or hoe across his shoulder,
Seen glancing as he moves, and with good will
His daily work begins.

The sturdy sunburnt boy drives forth the cattle,
And, pleased with power, bawls to the lagging kine
With stern authority, who fain would stop
To crop the tempting bushes as they pass.
At every open door, in lawn or lane,
Half-naked children, half awake are seen
Scratching their heads, and blinking to the light,
Till, rousing by degrees, they run about,
Roll on the sward, and in some sandy nook
Dig caves, and houses build, full oft defaced,
And oft began again, a daily pastime.
The house-wife, up by times, her morning cares
Tends busily; from tubs of curdled milk,
With skilful patience draws the clear blue whey
From the pressed bosom of the snowy curd,
While her brown comely maid, with tucked up sleeves

And swelling arm, assists her. Work proceeds,
Pots smoke, pails rattle, and the warm confusion
Still more confused becomes, till in the mould
With heavy hands the well-squeezed curd is placed.”

In the latter portion of the volume, “Lines to Scott,” and to “Southey,” draw delightful portraits of these departed sons of song; and to the accuracy of their traits, though painted in the kindest spirit, we can bear testimony. We cannot help quoting the opening of the last, as a just tribute to the memory of our old and esteemed friend, whom Byron so sarcastically and injuriously called “some bustling Botherby.”

“Learning and fancy were combined
To stimulate his manly mind;
Open, generous, and acute,
Steady of purpose, in pursuit
Ardent and hopeful; all the while
In childlike ignorance of guile.
There are, who say, that envy lurks concealed
Where genius strives, by slightest traits revealed,
A truth, if true it be, by him forgot,
He turned his eyes away and saw it not.
Success in others, frank and free,
He hailed with words of friendly glee.
Praise given to them he could not feel
Did aught from his own portion steal;
And when offence, designed and rude,
Did on his peaceful path obtrude,
He soon forgave the paltry pain,
Nor could resentment in his breast retain.
His was the charity of right good-will,
That loves, confides, and believes no ill.
He, by his Saviour's noble precept led,
Still followed what was right with heart and head.
Religion did with lofty honour dwell
Within his bosom's sacred cell.

We must now content ourselves,—leaving the fine Scottish, tragic, and supernatural ballads, the songs which are not so good, and the sacred poesy, which is most honourable to the heart and head of the author,—with a brief specimen of the familiar style in part of an address to a steamboat:—

“Freighted with passengers of every sort,
A motley throng, thou leavest the busy port;
Thy long and ample deck,—where scattered lie,
Baskets, and cloaks, and shawls of crimson dye;
Where dogs and children through the crowd are straying,
And on his bench apart the fiddler playing,
While matron dames to tressed seats repair,—
Seems, on the glassy waves, a floating fair.

Its dark form on the sky's pale azure cast,
Towers from this clustering group the towering mast;
The dense smoke, issuing from its narrow vent,
Is to the air in curly volumes sent,
Which coiling and uncoiling on the wind,
Trails, like a writhing serpent, far behind.
Beneath, as each merged wheel its motion plies,
On either side the white-churned waters rise,
And newly parted from the noisy fray,
Track with light ridgy foam thy recent way,
Then far diverged, in many a lustrous line
On the still moving surface shine.

Thou holdest thy course in independent pride;
No leave ask'st thou of either wind or tide,
To whate'er point the breeze inconstant veer,
Still doth thy careless helmsman onward steer:
As if the stroke of some magician's wand
Had lent thee power the ocean to command.
What is this power which thus within thee lurks,
And all unseen, like a masked giant works?
Even that which gentle dames at morning tea,
From silver urn ascending, daily see
With tressy wreathing borne upon the air
Like loosened ringlets of a lady's hair;
Or rising from th' enamelled cup beneath
With the soft fragrance of an infant's breath:
That which within the peasant's humble cot
Comes from the uncovered mouth of savoury pot,
As his kind mate prepares his noonday fare,
Which cur, and cat, and rosy urchins share;
That which, all silvered by the moon's pale beam
Precedes the mighty Geyser's up-cast stream,
What time with bellowing din, exploded forth,
It decks the midnight of the frozen north,
White travellers from their skin-spread couches rise
To gaze upon the sight with wondering eyes.

block, the archbishop being on one side of him and another clergyman on the other, the latter clasped the earl's hands in his while they prayed. Their devotions being at an end, he told the executioner that he would first make an experiment of the block by laying his head on it, but desired him not to strike till he gave him a sign by stretching out his hands. Shortly afterwards, placing his head a second time on the block, he gave the appointed signal, and at one blow his head was severed from the body. The executioner held it up to the people, exclaiming at the same time, "God save the king!"

Such was the fate of the great Lord Strafford, whose political faults were those of principle and conscience, while his private virtues were at least as eminent as his genius. The eulogium of his enemy Whitelock deserves to be his epitaph. "Thus," he says, "fell this noble earl, who for natural parts and abilities, and for improvement of knowledge by experience, in the greatest affairs; for wisdom, faithfulness, and gallantry of mind, hath left few behind him that can be ranked as his equals." Strafford was executed on Tower Hill, on the 12th of May, 1641, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

WILLIAM LAUD,

ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

A good man, but a petulant and mischievous statesman. Undoubtedly his piety was sincere, his industry great, his learning extensive, and his private conduct unimpeachable. On the other hand, he was intemperate and over-zealous in matters of church and state, and perhaps no enemy to arbitrary measures. He was meek and amiable in his intercourse with his own family, and not uncourteous in his manners; but in his public capacity the warmth of his temper was too often displayed, and his address was generally haughty, and not unfrequently even rude. He loved his king, but above all things regarded the welfare and honour of the church. Unfortunately, his zeal was productive of intolerance, and almost amounted to bigotry. His conscientious severity in the Star Chamber; his rigorous prosecutions of the Puritans, Separatists, Brownists, and other sects; and his introduction of pictures and other paraphernalia into churches, at a time, too, when such innovations were most unseasonable, obtained for him more enemies than he had the power to resist. The vulgar require strong colouring to excite their enmities to a proper pitch. Their leaders described Laud to them as more than a monster, something between a prelatical Draco and a Romish priest.

Laud was born at Reading on the 7th of October, 1573. He was educated at the free-school of that town, and afterwards removed to St. John's College, Oxford. He was inducted into the vicarage of Stanford, in Northamptonshire, in 1607, and from thence rose, through a gradation of church preferments, and after enjoying successively the bishoprics of St. Davids, Bath and Wells, and London, to be Primate of England in 1633.* His predecessor in the See of Canterbury, was the amiable but puritanical Abbot. At the period of that prelate's death, Laud was on his way from Scotland, and probably little anticipated the elevation that awaited him. It was first announced to him by Charles himself. When Laud entered the presence chamber, the king addressed him somewhat playfully,—"My lord's grace of Canterbury, you are welcome," and instantly issued directions for his translation.

Heylin, the archbishop's biographer, makes a good defence against the charge of extreme meanness of birth, which had been brought against his patron by Lord Brook; and which was echoed in the thousand libels which his splendour and unpopularity called into birth. His origin is what might be termed respectable. His father was a clothier of Reading, and his mother, sister to Sir William Webbe, afterwards Lord Mayor of London.

Laud, in the days of his magnificence, was, no doubt, much annoyed by these scurrilous attacks on his birth and parentage. Heylin mentions a particular occasion of his paying a visit to his patron, when he was admitted to the episcopal gardens at Lambeth, and found the countenance of the archbishop full of care. He held in his hand a gross pasquinade, which was seized shortly before it issued from the press. He told Heylin, that he was accused in this document of as mean a parentage as if he had been raked out of a dunghill. At the same time he exclaimed, (and his countenance cleared up as he dwelt on the virtues of his parents,) "that though he had not the good fortune to have been born a gentleman, yet that his parents had been honest; that they had lived in good circumstances; had employed the poor, and had left a good name behind them." Heylin's ingenious attempt at consolation is worth recording. He reminded his patron of what had been retorted by Pope Sixtus the Fifth when similarly attacked. "If the sun's beams," said that pontiff, "found their way through the rugged roof and broken walls of my father's cottage, they at least illumined every corner of the humble dwelling in which I was born." The comparison implied in this beautiful anecdote, was far from displeasing to Laud.

Our imaginations would naturally depict this exalted prelate as of lofty stature and commanding appearance. The contrary, however, was the case. Sir Symonds D'Ewes speaks somewhat ill-naturedly of him, as a "little, low, red-faced man." He was, indeed, below the common height, and his complexion was florid. Fuller describes him as "one of low stature, but high parts; piercing eyes, and cheerful countenance, wherein gravity and pleasantness were well compounded." But he concludes with higher praise. "He was admirable in his naturals, unblameable in his morals, and very strict in his conversation." In a curious parallel between Wolsey and Laud, published in the lifetime of the latter, "Laud," says the writer, "was of less size, but might be called a pretty man: both of ingenious and acute aspects, as may appear by this man's face, the other's picture." It is singular that, at the university, Wolsey should have been nicknamed the boy-bachelor, and Laud the little bachelor.

Laud's abhorrence of puritanism, and his high notions of the dignity of the church, are amusingly illustrated by the following anecdote. He had accompanied Charles the First into Scotland, on his progress into that country to be crowned. It was proposed that, during the ceremony, the king should be supported, on each side, by the Archbishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow. The latter prelate, being inclined to the tenets of the puritans, appeared purposely in the procession without his episcopal robes. The high-churchman Laud actually thrust him from the king's side. "Are you a churchman," he said, "and want the coat of your order?"

This enlightened man appears to have been singularly superstitious, even for the age in which he lived. His elevation to the See of Canterbury was received with mixed satisfaction, owing to a strange presentiment which he conceived of coming evil. In a letter to the Earl of Strafford, dated Fulham, 9th September, 1633, alluding to his change of residence from that place to the palace of Lambeth, he writes as follows: "I doubt I shall never be able to hold my health there one year, for instead of all the jolting which I had over the stones between London House and Whitehall, which was almost daily, I shall now have no exercise, but slide over in a barge to the Court and Star Chamber; and, in truth, my lord, I speak seriously, I have had a heaviness hang upon me since I was appointed to this place, and I can give myself no account of it, unless it proceed from an apprehension that there is more expected from me than the craziness of these times will give me leave to do." His curious diary is full of the most idle fancies and ridiculous prognostics. The falling of the episcopal arms at Canterbury cathedral in a storm, and of his own picture by the breaking of a string unequal to its weight, were circumstances sufficiently ominous to cause him real uneasiness and pain. Even the idle predictions of the mad prophetess, Lady Davies, appear to have excited distress, and are more than once alluded to in his letters: on the 15th of November, 1633, he writes from Fulham, to his friend the Earl of Strafford: "The indisposition of which I spake unto your lordship, I thank God, passed over quickly, though I find I cannot follow your counsel, for Croydon is too far off to go often to it, and my leisure here hath hitherto been extremely little, I may truly call it none; besides, the Lady Davies hath prophesied against me, that I shall not many days outlive the 5th of November, and then to what end should I trouble myself with exercise, or the like." He attached much importance to dreams, and usually committed them to his common-place book. Among his papers was discovered a curious account of his father's spirit presenting itself to him in a dream, in 1639, forty six years after his death. Laud describes his father as looking as well and cheerful as he had ever seen him in his lifetime. After a short conversation, Laud inquired of the spirit the proposed length of his visit. The latter added portentously, that he should remain till they departed together. Laud was then in the sixty-seventh year of his age; at least old enough to attach a due share of importance to such phenomena.

Some of the visions which he has chronicled, have, however, a somewhat suspicious reference to the tenor of his waking thoughts. The following were dreamed in the height of his hostility to his old patron, the Lord Keeper Williams, and will be curious to the minute observer of history.

"December 14, Sunday night.—I did dream

* Those who murmur at the plurality of church benefices at the present time, will scarcely credit the extent to which favouritism was carried in the reign of the first James. Bishop Williams, the enemy, and as some would say the victim, of Laud, had been at one and the same time, Keeper of the Great Seal, Bishop of Lincoln, Dean of Westminster, Prebend and Residentiary of Lincoln Cathedral, and Rector of Walgrave in Northamptonshire.

that the lord keeper was dead; that I passed by one of his men that was about a monument for him; that I heard him say his lower lip was infinitely swelled and fallen, and he rotten already. The dream did trouble me."

"January 14, Sunday.—Towards morning dreamed that the Bishop of Lincoln (the lord keeper) came, I know not whither, with iron chains. But returning loosed from them, leaped on horseback; went away, neither could I overtake him."

His attachment to church ceremonials, and a praiseworthy but impracticable scheme of reconciling the religions of Rome and England by mutual concessions, obtained for him the character of being papistically inclined; an imputation, however, which was certainly very far from being deserved. It is an undoubted fact that the Pope sent him a serious offer of a cardinal's hat: indeed Laud tells us as much in his diary. Arthur Wilson, in his life of himself, mentions an interview he had with one Dr. Weston, a catholic, at Bruges, the particulars of which are not uninteresting. "The little Archbishop of Canterbury," he says, "Weston could not endure. I pulled a book out of my pocket, written by the provincial of the English friars, which tended to reconcile the Church of England and the Church of Rome. 'I know the man,' said Weston, 'he is one of Canterbury's trencher-flies, and eats perpetually at his table; a creature of his making.' 'Then,' said I, 'you should better approve of my lord of Canterbury's actions, seeing he tends so much to your way.' 'No,' replied he, 'he is too subtle to be yoked; too ambitious to have a superior. He will never submit to Rome. He means to frame a motley religion of his own, and be lord of it himself.'"

The rigorous persecution of Franciscus, a Franciscan Friar, (or, as we should style him, Father Davenport,) who published a work in which he endeavoured to unite the two religions by mutual concession, is sufficient evidence that such a project was any thing but favourably contemplated by the Papal See. The catholics, we are told, regarded it as "a union between hell and heaven, Christ and Luther!"

One of the daughters of William, Earl of Devonshire, having turned catholic, she was questioned by Laud as to the motives of her conversion. She replied that her principal reason was a dislike to travel in a crowd. "The meaning being obscure, the archbishop asked her what she meant. "I perceive," she said, "your grace and many others are making haste to Rome, and, therefore, to prevent being crowded, I have gone before you." Notwithstanding the satire of this lively lady, proof might be readily adduced, that not only was Laud regarded by the catholics as unfriendly to the interests of their faith, but that he was even considered at Rome as its greatest enemy.

The private virtues and munificent benefactions of Laud were naturally overlooked by his enemies. Nevertheless he did much for learning and humanity, and would have done more but for the disasters which overtook him. There was found among his papers a long list of benefits which he had intended to have conferred upon mankind. "But for his untimely fate," says Anthony Wood, "St. Paul's would have silenced the fame of ancient wonders; the English clergy would have been the glory of the world; the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, had outstripped the Vatican, and his public structures overtopped the Escorial." As it was, his services to the public are of no mean order. He subscribed munificently to the building of St. Paul's. He procured an important charter for the University of Oxford; he founded there an Arabic lecture, and presented them with a magnificent collection of books. He adorned St. John's College, Oxford, and obtained for it the valuable living of St. Lawrence, Reading, in which parish he was born. Moreover, he obtained a charter for Dublin College; established a Greek press in London; and also founded some alms-houses at Reading, with a revenue of two hundred a-year.

The dissolution of the Parliament, on the 5th of May, 1640, was generally attributed to the instigation of Laud. His unpopularity had now reached its height. Two thousand persons entered St. Paul's at the same time, exclaiming, "No bishop!" "No high commission!" The most scurrilous libels were affixed to the walls in every quarter of the town; ballads were composed, and sung in the streets; and pictures, in which he was exhibited in the most undignified postures, were publicly displayed. The songs, in which he was held up to derision, were usually first sung in the ale-houses, and other scenes of low debauchery. When this was told to the archbishop, "His lot," he said, "was not worse than that of David;"—at the same time quoting the sixty-ninth Psalm, "They that sat in the gate spake against me, and I was the song of the drunkards." He is styled in a lampoon of the time—

"One of Rome's calves, far better fed than taught."

His enemies, alluding to the title with which he was addressed, said of him, with some humour, "that he had better have had more grace, or no grace at all." But, a paper which was posted in the Exchange, had nearly led to important consequences. In this document the apprentices were incited to rise in a body and attack the house of the archbishop. Accordingly, in the dead of the night, about five hundred persons came to Lambeth, and endeavoured to effect a violent entrance into the palace. Laud, however, was prepared for them; and the rabble, after venting a good deal of abusive and treasonable language, and breaking a few windows, eventually took to their heels. The next day some of the ringleaders were arrested and carried to prison. However, the doors of the prison were broken open by the mob, and the offenders liberated by their companions. Only one person, Bensted, a sailor, was executed, and his quarters exposed on the gates of the city.

On the subject of Laud's impeachment and iniquitous trial, it would be needless to dwell at length. He was accused of high treason, in endeavouring to subvert the laws and constitution of his country. Added to this, the unfounded charge of Popery was confidently insisted upon. The proceedings were as unjust and tyrannical as they had previously been in the case of Strafford. Evidence was accumulated in the same dishonourable manner; the same threats were exercised towards the House of Peers; and the sentence passed was equally illegal.

After a deliberation in the House of Commons of only half an hour, the charges against the archbishop were carried up to the lords by Denzil Holles, son of the Earl of Clare. On this, Laud was committed to the custody of the black rod; and ten weeks afterwards the old prelate was voted guilty of high treason, and sent to the Tower. His enemies, the Commons, attacked him in the most opprobrious terms. Harbottle Grimston spoke of him in his speech, as the great and common foe of goodness and good men; a viper, who instilled his poison into the sacred ear of his majesty. "This man," said Sergeant Wilde, "is like Naaman, the Syrian, a great man, but a leper." Nicholas, another lawyer, in his violent attack, styled him repeatedly, "the pander to the whore of Babylon." When the lords voted him guilty there were but seven peers in the house; the rest, either from too much shame, or too little courage, refraining from being present.

Laud was conveyed to the Tower amidst the shouts and revilings of the populace. The crowd had first collected in Cheapside, and from thence to the Exchange their behaviour and language are described as "beyond barbarity." Laud all the time sat quietly in his coach. He exhibited neither the contempt, which he must have felt, nor the fear, which was a stranger to him. "I look," he said, "upon a higher cause than the tongues of Shimei and his children."

Laud, on his first committal, had sent the key of his cabinet to Warner, Bishop of Rochester, desiring him either to burn or conceal such papers as might be prejudicial to his own interests or those of his friends. Warner was engaged for three hours at the task, and had only just completed it when a messenger from the House of Lords came to seal up the cabinet. Among the documents carried off by Warner was the original Magna Charta. This valuable piece of antiquity was found among Warner's papers at his death. It was afterwards presented to Bishop Burnet, and is now in the British Museum.

In the absence of all proof of guilt, the House of Commons had the baseness to seize and publish the archbishop's private diary. He was in bed at the Tower when Prynne, followed by a guard of soldiers, suddenly entered the apartment, and advancing to where his clothes lay by the bedside, drew the volume from one of his pockets. Prynne afterwards published it, with the concurrence of the Commons, and with several infamous additions of his own.

When Laud was first brought to the Tower, the lieutenant was proceeding to conduct his prisoner to the apartments recently occupied by Bishop Williams, as affording the best accommodation in the place. Laud requested he might be lodged in any other rooms;—"he was certain," he said, "they would smell so of puritanism." His enemies have accused him of undue severity towards Williams. They forgot, however, how much harsher was their own conduct towards an old man of seventy-one, whom they persecuted tyrannically, and executed unjustly.

A friend who came to visit the aged prelate in his confinement, inquired of him, how he fared. "I thank God," he said, "I am well. The king has provided me with a comfortable lodging; I have good and wholesome fare, and by none of my troubles have I been deprived of an hour's rest." He said of the Tower, that if he ever quitted it, he would take care to have it beautified and improved. At this period he frequently repeated two verses of the eighty-second Psalm:—"I have said, ye are gods, and all of you children of the Most High. But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes."

There had long existed a strong affection between Laud and Strafford. The earl, on the night previous to his execution, expressed a great desire to have an interview with his friend, but the boon was barbarously denied. However, he sent a message to the archbishop, desiring to be remembered by him in his prayers, and requesting that his fellow-prisoner would appear at his window the next morning, in order that he might bid him a last farewell as he passed to his execution. The message was delivered to Laud by the Primate of Ireland. The old man expressed his fears that, owing to the weakness of his frame, he should be prevented from acceding to the wishes of his friend. The next morning, as Strafford passed by to the scaffold, he looked up to Laud's window, but the archbishop was not there.—“Though I do not see him,” said Strafford to the Lieutenant of the Tower, “give me leave, I pray you, to do my last observance towards his rooms.” In the mean time, Laud, having been informed of the earl's approach, had been assisted to the window. These two great men thus beheld each other for the last time. Strafford requested the prayers and blessing of the archbishop. Laud lifted up his hands to heaven, and fervently blessed and prayed for him. A moment after, overcome with grief and natural infirmity, he sunk to the ground. On his recovery, he expressed much concern lest his weakness should be attributed to dread of his own approaching fate. “I hope,” he said, “by God's assistance, and through my own innocence, that when I come to my own execution, I shall show the world how much more sensible I am of my Lord Strafford's loss than I am of my own.”

When the fatal sentence was communicated to Laud, he received the intimation with the composure and fortitude of a Christian. “No one,” he said, “can be more desirous to send me out of life than I am to go.” The period between his sentence and execution was principally spent in prayer, having with some difficulty obtained the attendance of one of his chaplains. The night previous to his death was passed in sound sleep. When he was awakened on the fatal morning, by the Lieutenant of the Tower, he expressed not the slightest dismay; and it was remarked that his countenance exhibited the same freshness of colour which it had ever worn.

He passed to the scaffold as to a triumph. The mob barbarously reviled and hooted him as he went along; but his hopes were not of this world; and his temper appeared as even, and his countenance as cheerful, as they had ever been. He would seem even to have sported with his fate, and to have exhibited instances of that anomalous merriment which has not unfrequently been displayed by the criminal in his last moments. In his discourse on the scaffold, he says, “I am not in love with this passage through the red sea, for I have the weaknesses and infirmities of flesh and blood plentifully in me; and I have prayed with my Saviour, ut transiret calix iste, that this cup of red wine might pass from me; but, if not, God's will, not mine, be done.” Happening to perceive, through a chink in the boards, that some people were standing underneath the scaffold, and indeed immediately below the spot where the block was placed, he called for the authorities to remove them. “He was unwilling,” he said, “that his blood should fall on the heads of the people.”

The bitter revilings of the mob, which continued to follow him to the last moment, had no power to ruffle the composure of his mind. One fanatic, in particular, Sir John Clotworthy, a prominent speaker in the House of Commons, continued harassing him with impertinent questions, and attempted to draw him into a controversy. The answers of Laud were mild and pertinent; but his tormentor persisting in his ill-timed zeal, he turned to the executioner, and presenting him with some money, he appealed to him to do his duty, requesting him to perform his task with as much adroitness as possible. Kneeling down, he repeated a short and appropriate prayer for the happiness of the kingdom, and his own eternal salvation through the merits of his Redeemer. Then, laying his head upon the block, he gave the appointed sign to the executioner by uttering aloud, “Lord, receive my soul!” and at one blow his head was severed from his body.

Laud suffered on Tower Hill, on the 10th of January, 1645, in the seventy-second year of his age. His old friend, Judge Whitelock, described his character in a few words. “He was too full of fire, though a just and a good man. His want of experience in state matters, and his too much heat and zeal for the Church, had he proceeded in the way he was then in, would have set the nation on fire.” The insight of King James into his character is more remarkable, and does credit to the penetration of that monarch. When pressed by Buckingham and Williams, to consent to Laud's advancement, “Laud,” he said, “is a restless spirit, to be kept back from all places of authority; for he cannot see when matters are well, but loves to toss and change, and bring things to a reformation floating in his own brain.” Philips tells us, in his Life of Lord Keeper Williams, that the king, having been wearied into a complacence, exclaimed, passionately, as he quitted the apartment, “Then take him to you, but on my soul you will repent it.” The remains of Laud were decently interred in the church of Allhallows, Barking. In 1663 they were removed to Oxford, and deposited with some ceremony near the altar of St. John's College chapel, in that University.

HENRY RICH,

EARL OF HOLLAND.

The personal beauty and untimely fate of Holland have thrown an interest over his history, which neither his capacity nor his conduct would otherwise have justified. It is to the credit of human nature, that meanness and ingratitude are crimes which the world is the least inclined to forgive. The despicable apostacy of Holland can never be excused. Without any especial merit of his own, he had risen to wealth, honour, and titles, by the personal regard of two sovereigns. Charles had more than once incurred obloquy by preferring him to offices for which others were either more competent, or at least considered themselves to have greater claims. And yet, after basking for more than a quarter of a century in the sunshine of royalty, he deserted his unfortunate master in his utmost need, and leagued himself with the most inveterate enemies of his benefactor. Verily, he had his reward. The once brilliant courtier was dragged to the scaffold, sick, miserable, and unregretted.

Henry Rich was a younger son of Robert, Lord Rich, (created Earl of Warwick in 1610,) by Penelope, sister of Robert Devereux, the unfortunate Earl of Essex. The date of his birth is uncertain, but must have been previous to the commencement of the seventeenth century. As his family, though noble, were not wealthy, and, moreover, were extremely numerous, the future favourite was content to enlist as a volunteer in the Dutch wars.

After two or three campaigns, the army being in winter quarters, he paid a visit to his friends in England. His handsome person soon caught the eye of James, and honours were heaped on him with almost unexampled rapidity. Within a few years, he was made Knight of the Bath, Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the Prince of Wales, Captain of the King's Guard, and created Viscount Fenton in Scotland in 1615, Baron Kensington in Middlesex, 8th March, 1622, and 24th September, 1624, Earl of Holland in Lincolnshire. He was also made a privy counsellor and a Knight of the Garter. Holland was employed in Spain at the period of Prince Charles's matrimonial visit; and the following year was sent to Paris, with Hay, Earl of Carlisle, (two as accomplished courtiers, we are told, “as were to be found in the palaces of all the princes of Europe,”) to negotiate the marriage between the prince and Henrietta Maria. Here, according to some writers, he gained the affections of that princess.

Holland, on his first introduction to the royal favour, had encountered a dangerous rival in the Duke of Buckingham. Perceiving, however, the improbability of his superseding that great favourite, and unwilling to risk the chances of a hazardous competition, he wisely contented himself with occupying the second place in the royal affections. His politic conduct on this occasion is dwelt upon by Lord Clarendon. “He took all the ways he could to endear himself to the duke, and to his confidence, and wisely declined receiving any grace or favour but as his donation; above all, avoided the suspicion that the king had any kindness for him, upon any account but of the duke, whose creature he desired to be esteemed, though the Earl of Carlisle's friend: and he prospered so well in that pretence, that the king scarcely made more haste to advance the duke, than the duke did to promote the other.” It was suspected by his contemporaries, that Holland's attachment to the sumptuous Carlisle had originated in interested motives, and that he too frequently availed himself of the purse of his friend. In whatever manner their intimacy may have commenced, it certainly outlasted the period when such surmises were at all probable, and only ceased with their lives.

King James is said to have conferred on Holland, within a few years, nearly 150,000*l*. On his first coming to court he presented him with 3,000*l*. at a single gift. In addition to these favours, he exercised the royal prerogative, by uniting his handsome favourite to one of the richest heiresses in England. This lady was Isabella, daughter and heiress of Sir Walter Cope, and by his marriage with her the manor and seat of Kensington came into his possession. The family residence of the Copes, which, from this period, has borne the title of Holland House, had been built by the father of his bride in 1607. It was afterwards purchased by Henry Fox, who from this circumstance assumed the title of Baron Holland, on his elevation to the peerage in 1762.

The advantages of wealth and beauty rendered Holland in an eminent degree the idol of the fair sex. He was perhaps the handsomest man of his time, and even some fulsome verses, addressed to him by Mercer, appear scarcely to exaggerate his personal advantages:

Thy beauty too exceeds the sex of men;
Thy courtly presence, and thy princely grace,
Add to the splendour of thy royal race.

In early life his manners were gay and joyous, and his conversation extremely fascinating; while a love of magnificence formed a prominent feature in his character. 'The world was naturally captivated by so brilliant a combination of shining qualities, and from the queen to the maid of honour there were too many who confessed his influence over their hearts. Arthur Wilson speaks of his "features and pleasant aspect as equalling the most beautiful women;" to which he adds, that he had excellent natural parts, but was "youthfully expensive." Lord Clarendon mentions his "lovely and winning presence," and does credit to his courage; though, according to Sir Philip Warwick, he was far more fitted for the show than for the field.

In 1639, Holland was employed as lord general of the horse under the Earl of Arundel in the expedition against the Scots. From his conduct on this occasion, either his loyalty or his valour may be reasonably called in question. Subsequently, in 1641, having been denied a trifling boon by his sovereign, which it was extremely inexpedient to grant, he turned rebel, betrayed the secrets of his benefactor, and joined, as cordially as was in his nature, with the opposite party. Probably he had other reasons for this scandalous defection. 'The tide of royalty was beginning to ebb, and the sun, in which he had long basked, was necessarily withdrawing his beams. "Whilst the weather was fair," says Lord Clarendon, "he continued to flourish, but the storm no sooner arose than he changed as quickly, and declined from that character of honour of which he was formerly supposed to be master."

If the queen's attachment to Holland had ever amounted to tenderness, it was shortly converted into anger and contempt. In 1642, at her express desire, he was dismissed from his post of first gentleman of the bedchamber; Henrietta affirming that she would never live in the court as long as he continued to keep his place. From this period his conduct was so vacillating, that he was trusted by no party and despised by all.

In 1643, the king's affairs presenting a more favourable aspect, Holland seceded from his new friends, and renewed his professions of duty and allegiance to his sovereign. He presented himself to Charles at the siege of Gloucester, and, notwithstanding the coldness of his reception, persisted in following him to the battle of Newbury, where he behaved himself with much credit. The queen, after these circumstances, not only restored him to her favour, but showed a strong inclination to trust him as before.

After the battle of Newbury, the earl again hastened to the king, who was then at Oxford. He had imagined that the services he had so recently performed for his sovereign, the renewed confidence of the queen, his return to his allegiance, and the fact that he had induced many influential persons to follow his example, would have been sufficient to obliterate all recollection of his former misconduct. He had flattered himself that the king would have opened his arms to receive him; that all unkindness would have been forgotten; and that he should have been honourably restored to the royal confidence and his former places and honours. So confident indeed was he that he had fairly earned not only his pardon, but the gratitude of his sovereign, that he attempted not the least excuse for his apostacy, nor condescended to make the slightest apology for his past conduct.

Charles might have pardoned a rebel, but his notions of friendship were too sacred ever to have restored Holland to familiarity and esteem. He received him indeed with all proper civility, and even admitted him to his private parties; but his intercourse was reserved, and his manner undisguisedly cold and dignified. 'The queen had exerted herself in Holland's favour, and had he made a proper concession and admitted his fault, he might have been restored to his former posts, and ostensibly have been reinstated in the royal favour. But he foolishly fancied himself aggrieved, and adopted so high a ground that Charles complained of it to his friends. 'The spirit of the king's complaints is given by Lord Clarendon. "His majesty," he says, "observed, that the earl behaved himself with the same confidence and assurance as he had done when he was most in his favour; and that he retained still the old artifice at court, to be seen to whisper in the king's and queen's ear, by which people thought there was some secret, when the matter of those whispers was nothing but what might be said in the open court; and that the Earl of Holland had several times seemed to say somewhat in private to him, upon which he had withdrawn from the company, to the end or corner of the room, and, at first, expected and apprehended that he would say somewhat in his own excuse: but that he had never then said one word, but what he might have spoke in the circle; with which, the king said, he was the better pleased, and that he believed he had not been more particular in his discourse with the queen, save that he used to entertain her with the wisdom and power of the parliament, and what great things they would be able to do, and how much they were respected in foreign parts; which, his majesty said, was a strange discourse for a man to make, who had so lately left them because he thought the king's condition the better of the two." Lord Clarendon himself sought out the earl, and endeavoured to persuade him to confess his fault and sue for the king's pardon. Holland indignantly refused to make the first advances; insisting that his faults were extremely venial; that he had committed no crime which could call for the formality of a humble submission; but adding, that should the king in the first instance confer on him any public mark of his favour, his own inclination would then induce him to make the apology required. Charles, though anxious to secure his services, would of course reject such an arrangement; and Holland, whether imagining the king's affairs to be in a worse posture than before, or disliking the cold looks which he every where encountered in the court at Oxford, again deserted to the parliament.

He seems to have met with some difficulty in effecting his escape. Having, however, in the first instance retired to a small village in the neighbourhood of Oxford, he contrived to take advantage of a dark night, and sought refuge in the quarters of the enemy. His reception was different from what he had anticipated. The Parliament committed him to prison and sequestered his estate. After a short confinement, his liberty and property were restored to him, and he was allowed to retire to his own house. He published a defence of his conduct, which was chiefly conspicuous for its want of truth, and was only productive of contempt. By both parties Holland was regarded as one whose services could do them no good, and whose enmity no harm.

His rising in favour of the king, in 1648, appears to have been a last effort to wipe away the infamy which attached to him, and to retrieve his character and fortunes. Doubtless in his heart he had ever preferred royalty to republicanism, and if praise can decently be conferred on so weak and vacillating a person, his last effort for his sovereign, entailing a bloody campaign in an almost hopeless cause, may claim some slight commiseration for the apostate. 'The defeat at Nonsuch; the hurried pursuit into Kingston on Thames; the romantic death of the beautiful Francis Villiers, and the flight of the young Duke of Buckingham and of Holland himself, are tolerably well known. Holland fled into Huntingdonshire, and was seized at an inn, near St. Neots, by the parliamentary horse. He delivered himself to the officer of the troop without a struggle, and was carried as a prisoner to Warwick Castle.

The last scenes of his life did little credit to his character. Bishop Warburton says, "that he lived like a knave and died like a fool." But Holland was in extremely bad health, and under such circumstances, a public trial and execution are little calculated to throw romance or dignity over human suffering. At his trial he said but little in his defence; his manner being rather as if he would have received life as a favour, than as claiming it from the goodness of his cause.—Heath tells us that he was so extremely weak, that when he made his defence, a spoonful of cordial was handed to him at the end of every sentence.

Having been found guilty of treason by the court, of which, it may be remarked, the president was the famous Bradshaw, whom Walker styles "the horseleech of hell," the question of reprieve or execution was put to the vote of the Commons; when "this unfortunate fine gentleman" (as he is styled by Echard) was condemned to death, though by a majority only of three or four votes.* Much interest was used to save his life. His brother, the Earl of Warwick, exerted his powerful influence, and the Presbyterian members were favourable to him to a man. He owed his death, it is said, to the animosity of Cromwell, of whom he had formerly spoken contemptuously, but who must otherwise have despised and detested him for his mean and vacillating conduct.

After his condemnation, Holland was sent to St. James's Palace, where he remained till his execution. Previously to his case being submitted to the Commons, his friends had frequently sent assurances to him that they had obtained a sufficient number of votes to insure his life. But ill-health had generated superstition, and he invariably expressed his belief that a few days would terminate his career. On the other hand, Goring, the reprobate Earl of Norwich, who had no friends in the parliament, and whose case appeared entirely hopeless, had expressed a similar conviction that he should escape. They were both right in their superstitious conjectures. The one was condemned by an extremely small majority, the other saved by the single vote of the speaker.

It was decided that the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and the gallant Lord Capel,

* At the same time with the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and Lord Capel, Sir John Owen, a gallant and loyal Welshman, was also condemned to the block. When the latter heard his sentence, he made a bow to the court, and returned them his most grateful thanks: "It was a very great honour," he said, "to a poor gentleman of Wales, to lose his head in such noble company,"—and making use of a great oath,—"he was afraid," he added, "they would have hanged him." Owen, however, at the intercession of Ireton, was afterwards pardoned.—Echard, vol. ii. p. 655.

should be executed on the same day, and on the same stage. Horace Walpole writes: "It was a remarkable scene exhibited on the scaffold on which Lord Capel fell. At the same time was executed the once gay, beautiful, gallant Earl of Holland, whom neither the honours showered on him by his prince, nor his former more tender connections with the queen could preserve from betraying, and engaging against both. He now appeared sunk beneath the indignities and cruelty he received from men, to whom and from whom he had deserted,—while the brave Capel, who, having shunned the splendour of Charles's fortunes, had stood forth to guard them on their decline, trod the fatal stage with all the dignity of valour and conscious integrity." That memorable scaffold was erected in front of Westminster Hall. On the 9th of March, 1649, not six weeks after the murder of the king, the three prisoners were conducted from St. James's to the residence of Sir Robert Cotton, at the upper end of the hall,—a house of some note, from so many great and unfortunate men having at different times partaken of its melancholy hospitality, in their last step to the grave.

The Duke of Hamilton was the first who was brought forth to execution. The judges were sitting when he passed into the hall, and from their places beheld the fatal scene. Hamilton, who to the last had entertained hopes of a reprieve, lingered for some time in the hall; but the Earl of Denbigh coming up to him, and whispering in his ear that there was no hope, he forthwith mounted the scaffold, and, after an address to the people submitted himself to the executioner with decent courage.

Holland came next. He was so exhausted by his long illness that it was with extreme difficulty he could harangue the crowd. Walker, in his "History of Independency," supplies some interesting particulars relating to his last moments:—"After some divine conference with Mr. Bolton for near a quarter of an hour, and having spoken to a soldier that took him prisoner, and others, he embraced Lieutenant-Colonel Beecher, and took his leave of him. After which he came to Mr. Bolton, and having embraced him, and returned him many thanks for his great pains and affection to his soul, he prepared himself to the block; whereupon, turning to the executioner, he said: 'Here, my friend, let my clothes and my body alone; there is ten pounds for thee; that is better than my clothes. I am now fit. And when you take up my head, do not take off my cap.' Then taking farewell of his servants, he kneeled down and prayed for a pretty space with much earnestness. Then going to the front of the scaffold, he said to the people—'God bless you all; God give all happiness to this kingdom, to this people, to this nation.' Then laying himself down, he seemed to pray with much affection for a short space; and then lifting up his head, seeing the executioner by him, he said, 'Stay while I give the sign;' and presently after, stretching out his hand, and saying, 'Now! now!' Just as the words were coming out of his mouth the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body." In his last moments he had expressed deep regret for the desertion of his master, and died penitent and a Christian. When his head was struck off, his bodily weakness was rendered sufficiently apparent by the little blood which flowed.

Lord Capel was the last summoned. He passed through Westminster Hall with a serene countenance, greeting his friends and acquaintances as he went along. Having ascended the scaffold, he inquired whether the other lords had addressed the people bayheaded. Being assured that they had, he took off his hat, and delivered that fine and effective appeal which, more than any other circumstance, elevated the character of monarchy, and disgusted the people with their fanatical and republican leaders. "Like Samson," says Heath, "he did the Philistines more harm by his death than he had done by his life." His demeanour at the last afforded a beautiful picture of dignified virtue and Christian courage. Even Cromwell, though he refused to save his life, did honour to the talents which he feared, and the probity, which it would have been well if he had imitated.

On the other hand, the meanness and tergiversation of the unfortunate Holland, as it had entailed only contempt in his lifetime, so it excluded all commiseration for his fate. It was no argument, that he had laid down his life for his sovereign, for had he lived longer, who could tell but that he might again have proved a traitor. With the exception of his numerous family, there was perhaps not a single person who felt regret for his loss. It is said, that he had ever anticipated poverty as the most intolerable of human evils; and when the hour of trial came, when it was found imperative to forfeit either his honour on the one hand, or his ease on the other, he unfortunately made choice of the former. The end was answerable to the means. Misconduct was followed by misfortune, and his last hours were embittered by that deepest curse of wickedness, the memory of a crime committed in vain.

LUCIUS CARY,

VISCOUNT FALKLAND.

Lord Clarendon has drawn the character of this nobleman, as it developed itself to him during a friendship of more than twenty years. Nothing can be more exquisite than the portraiture, or apparently more admirable than the person, whom he introduces. The historian dwells fondly on the virtues of his friend, till admiration warms into enthusiasm, and we distrust the truth of the colouring almost from its very beauty. Wit, learning, eloquence, and generosity; the highest sense of honour, and a feminine tenderness of heart; transcendent parts, and the most admirable virtue, added to the sweetest Christian humility:—such is the assemblage of excellences with which Lord Clarendon has invested his friend. "There never," says Horace Walpole, "was a stronger instance of what the magic of words, and the art of an historian, can effect, than in the character of this lord; who seems to have been a virtuous well-meaning man, with a moderate understanding, who got knocked on the head early in the civil war because it boded ill; and yet, by the happy solemnity of my Lord Clarendon's diction, Lord Falkland is the favourite personage of that noble work." Between the sneer of Walpole, and the somewhat exaggerated encomiums of Clarendon, it is not difficult to form a proper estimate of his character.

The conduct indeed of Lord Falkland both in public and private life, appears almost faultless. He was possessed of deep scholastic knowledge; his memory was extraordinary, and his eloquence, if not first-rate, was considerable. He was superior to the passions and artifices of vulgar minds; was favourable to religious toleration; was most exemplary in his private conduct, and loved truth and justice for their own sake. On the other hand, his genius has undoubtedly been greatly exaggerated; and there was a weakness of mind, arising, it may be, from too scrupulous notions of probity, which, though they detract not from the amiability of his character, divest it to a certain degree of its power.

Lucius Cary, eldest son of Henry, Lord Falkland, is supposed to have been born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, about the year 1610. His father being lord deputy of Ireland, his boyhood was passed in that country, and he was for some time a student of Trinity College, Dublin. He was afterwards removed to St. John's College, Cambridge.

In early life, the future statesman and moralist appears only remarkable for wildness and frolic. Aubrey says: "My lord in his youth was very wild, and also mischievous, as being apt to state and do bloody mischiefs; but it was not long before he took up to be serious, and then grew to be an extraordinary hard student." For one of his indiscretions he was confined in the Fleet. There is extant a moving petition, addressed by his father to the king, in which he prays for the release and pardon of his offending son. Shortly after this period, accompanied by a suitable tutor, he departed on his travels; and from this time we hear nothing more of the profligacy or extravagance of Lord Falkland.

He was not of age when his grandmother, heiress of Lord Chief Baron Tanfield, bequeathed him a large property, independent of his parents, who were both alive. He had scarcely come into possession of the estate, when he unfortunately offended his father by an imprudent marriage; the circumstances, as related by Lord Clarendon in his "Life of Himself," are, however, far from discreditable to Lord Falkland's heart. "Before he was of age, he committed a fault against his father, by marrying a young lady whom he passionately loved, without any considerable portion, which exceedingly offended him, and disappointed all his reasonable hopes and expectation of redeeming and repairing his own broken fortune and desperate hopes in court by some advantageous marriage of his son, about which he had then some probable treaty. Sir Lucius Cary was very conscious to himself of his offence and transgression, and the consequence of it, which, though he could not repent, having married a lady of a most extraordinary wit and judgment, and of the most signal virtue and exemplary life that the age produced, and who brought him many hopeful children, in which he took great delight, yet he confessed it with the most dutiful and sincere applications to his father for his pardon that could be made; and, for the prejudice he had brought upon his fortune by bringing no portion to him, he offered to repair it by resigning his whole estate to his disposal, and to rely wholly upon his kindness for his own maintenance and support; and to that purpose he had caused conveyances to be drawn by counsel, which he brought, ready engrossed, to his father, and was willing to seal and execute them, that they might be valid. But his father's passion and indignation so far transported him, though he was a gentleman of excellent parts, that he refused any reconciliation, and rejected all the offers that were made him of the estate; so that his son remained still in possession of his estate against his will, for which he found great reason afterwards to rejoice. But he was for the present so much afflicted with his father's displeasure, that he transported himself and his wife into Holland, resolving to buy some military command, and to spend the remainder of his life in that profession; but being disappointed in the treaty he expected, and finding no opportunity to accommodate himself with such a command, he returned again into England, resolving to retire to a country life, and to his books, that, since he was not likely to improve himself in arms, he might advance in letters."

Lord Falkland persevered in his resolution; and though extremely attached to the society of London, determined to absent himself from the capital for some years, and to devote himself entirely to study. The death of his father compelled him to visit the metropolis before the period of his self-exile had expired; however, as soon as practicable, he returned to his house in the country, and to the severe course of study which he had prescribed for himself. Before he was twenty-three, he had obtained a profound knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues, and was deeply conversant with all theological controversies. His house at Burford, within twelve miles of Oxford, was resorted to by the principal persons of the university, and frequently by the most learned scholars of the metropolis. Lord Clarendon says, "They found their lodgings there as ready as in the colleges; nor did the lord of the house know of their coming or going, nor who were in his house, till he came to dinner or supper, where all still met; otherwise there was no troublesome ceremony or constraint to forbid men to come to the house, or to make them weary of staying there; so that many came there to study in a better air, finding all the books they could desire in his library, and all the persons together whose company they could wish, and not find in any other society." According to Wood, such was the opinion entertained by the university of Oxford of Lord Falkland's reasoning powers, that it was a common remark at the time, that if the Devil or the Grand Turk were to be converted, his lordship and Chillingworth would be able to effect it. Lord Falkland was at this time a gay and cheerful man, and his delightful conversation was not the least attraction to this happy academical retreat. He continued this laudable course of life for a few years, and when he again entered the world at twenty-six, was acknowledged to be one of the deepest scholars of his time.

It would be useless to dwell on the writings of Lord Falkland, which have, doubtless, their merit, but are now either forgotten, or remembered only by name. In early life he had been an ardent admirer of the muses, and of the lighter literature of the times: indeed he was himself a poet. Suckling pays him a beautiful compliment in his Session of the Poets. Apollo has summoned Falkland to his presence, but,

He was of late so gone with divinity,
That he had almost forgot his poetry;
Though to say the truth, and Apollo did know it,
He might have been both, his priest and his poet.

Swift tell us (it is doubtful on what authority) that Lord Falkland, in his writings, whenever he entertained any doubts as to the intelligibility of a sentence, "used to consult one of his lady's chambermaids (not the waiting women, because it was possible she might be conversant in romances), and by her judgment was guided, whether to receive or to reject it." Lord Falkland used to remark, that "he pitied unlearned gentlemen on a wet day."

Not a few of his contemporaries have paid a grateful tribute to his genius and social qualities. Cowley addressed a poem to him, on his return from the expedition against the Scots. It commences,

Great is thy charge, O North! be wise and just;
England commits her Falkland to thy trust;
Return him safe. Learning would rather choose
Her Bodley or her Vatican to lose.
All things that are but writ or printed there,
In his unbounded breast engraven are.
There all the sciences together meet,
And every art does all her kindred greet.

Waller, also, in a poem on the same subject, thus panegyrises him:

Brave Holland leads, and with him Falkland goes;
Who hears this told, and does not straight suppose
We send the graces and the muses forth,
To civilise and to instruct the North?

Lord Falkland's reverence for parliaments, and a representative form of government; a preconceived distaste to the manners and practices of a court; and an especial admiration of the character of Hambden, had early induced him to connect himself with the popular party. Even when he had come fully to comprehend the dangerous lengths to which the patriots were proceeding, and had entirely seceded from his former friends, it was with extreme difficulty that he could be induced to declare himself an adherent of the court. So jealous was he, lest his conduct should be attributed to interested motives, that, although Charles openly courted his friendship, and invited him to several personal interviews, his manners to his sovereign, to say the least, were far from conciliatory, while, to the hangers-on at court, they were morose and almost insulting. When disinclination at length yielded to duty, and he accepted the appointment of secretary of state, he carried his high sense of probity to a laudable though unfortunate weakness. At a period when the meanest advantages were seized upon by the republicans, his chivalrous notions of honour prevented him either from employing spies, or opening a suspected letter. A statesman may be a man of sense, without being a Machiavelli. Lord Falkland was too pure for his generation, and became the dupe of knaves and hypocrites.

His personal advantages were not considerable. Lord Clarendon says in his autobiography, "His person and presence were in no degree attractive or promising. His stature was low, and smaller than most men; his motion not graceful, and his aspect so far from inviting, that it had somewhat in it of simplicity; and his voice, the worst of the three, so untuned, that instead of reconciling, it offended the ear, so that nobody would have expected music from that tongue; and sure no man was less beholden to nature for its recommendation into the world." Such a description adds little to our romantic notions of Lord Falkland. Anthony Wood tells us "that he had no great strength; that his hair was black and somewhat flaggy, and his eye black and lively."

Lord Falkland's marriage, imprudent as it was considered by the votaries of the world, was productive, as far as can be ascertained, of no unhappiness to himself. Wood informs us that "her Christian name was Lettice, and that she was daughter of Sir Richard Morison, Knight, of Tookey Park, Leicestershire." Lord Clarendon styles her "a lady of most extraordinary wit and judgment, and of the most signal virtue and exemplary life." Aubrey, however affords us a more amusing insight into Lord Falkland's domestic history. "I will tell you," he says, "a pretty story from Will Hawes, of Trinity College, who told me that my lady was, after the manner of women, much governed by, and indulgent to, the nursery. When she had a mind to beg anything of my lord, for one of her maids, women, nurses, &c. she would not do it of herself, if she could help it, but put this gentleman, Lord Falkland's former tutor, upon it, to move my lord. My lord had but a small estate to his title, and the old gentleman would say, 'Madam, this is so unreasonable a motion to propose to my lord, that I am certain he will never grant it; c. g. one time to let a bargain, a farm, twenty pounds per annum under value. At length, when she could not prevail on him, she would say, 'I warrant you, for all this, I will obtain it of my lord; it will cost me but the expense of a few tears.' Now she would make her words good, and this great wit, the greatest master of reason and judgment of his time, at the long run being stormed by her tears (I presume there were kisses and secret embraces that were also ingredients,) would this pious lady obtain her unreasonable desires of her poor lord."

Wood speaks of Lady Falkland as "a disconsolate widow, and the most devout, pious, and virtuous lady of the time she lived in." Granger also remarks, "When that great and amiable man was no more, she fixed her eyes on heaven, and, though sunk in the deepest affliction, she soon found that relief from acts of piety and devotion, which nothing else could have administered." It appears, that the greatest portion of her time was spent in religious worship, in family prayer, "singing psalms," and catechising her children and her servants. She visited her poor neighbours, and read aloud from religious books while they employed themselves in spinning. Lord Falkland bequeathed her the whole of his property, and committed his three sons to her care.

Of these sons, Lucius, Lord Falkland, a young man of great parts, died at an early age at Paris. Henry, who succeeded to the title, appears to have been principally remarkable for the mildness of his disposition, and an early taste for dissipation. He is even said to have parted with his father's splendid library for a "horse and a mare." He afterwards reformed, and, like his father, by his great diligence, made up for time mispent, and talents misapplied. He was elected member for Oxfordshire, and was afterwards lord lieutenant for that county. When he first took his seat in the house of commons, an old senator objected to his youthful appearance, and questioned whether he had yet sown his "wild oats"—"Then," said the young lord, "I am come to the proper place, where there are so many geese to pick them up." The youngest son, who also became Lord Falkland, was a lord of the admiralty, and died in 1693.

To return to the subject of the present memoir. The breaking out of the civil war, and the miseries which threatened his country, embittered more and more the happiness of his life. In moments of mental anguish he was frequently heard to exclaim, peace, peace; and he himself remarked, "that the calamities of the kingdom robbed him of his sleep, and would shortly break his heart." Depressed as his spirits usually were, on the morning of a battle he appeared invariably cheerful, and his spirits rose with the increasing excitement. According to his own statement, inclination led him to be a soldier, and the camp had especial charms for the philosopher. Though merely a volunteer, he ever took his share in the hour of danger, and attached himself to the most daring and reckless commander, who was likely to lead his followers into the thickest of the fight. At Edgehill he incurred considerable risk, by interposing in favour of the flying and defenceless wretches, who had thrown down their arms. "Some thought," says Lord Clarendon, "that he had come into the field out of curiosity to see the face of danger, and out of charity to prevent the shedding of blood."

There can be no doubt but that Lord Falkland voluntarily threw away his life at the battle of Newbury. He flung himself into the middle of the fight, and opened his breast to the weapons of his foes. Whitelock tells us, that on the morning of the battle, he asked for a clean shirt, and being asked the reason of it,* "If I am slain," he said, "they shall not find my body in foul linen." When his friends would have dissuaded him risking his life, on the ground that he filled no ostensible post, and could not be considered as a military officer: "I am weary," he said of the times, and foresee the misery of my country: I believe I shall be out of it before night." At another time, when remonstrated with by a friend, he replied, "that he made himself so conspicuous from his desire of peace, that it was necessary to show how little he dreaded the worst hazards of war." It has been generally supposed that grief for the impending miseries of his country was Lord Falkland's inducement in sacrificing his life. Aubrey, however, who is in some degree borne out by other authority, attributes his rashness to his private sorrows. "At Newbury," he says, "my Lord Falkland being there, and having nothing to do but to charge, as the two armies were engaging, rode in, like a madman as he was, between them, and was, as he needs must be, shot. Some would attribute it to the unfortunate advice which he had given Charles, but I have been well informed by those that best knew him and knew intrigues behind the curtain, that it was the grief of the death of Mrs. Moray, a handsome lady at court, who was his mistress, and whom he loved above all creatures, was the true cause of his being so madly guilty of his own death. The next day, when they went to bury the dead, they could not find his lordship's body: it was stripped, and trod upon, and mangled. So there was one that waited on him in his chamber, would undertake to know it from all other bodies, by a certain mole his lordship had in his neck, and by that mark did find it."

There is a passage in Clarendon's Life of himself, which evidently bears on the scandal of Aubrey. "Those who did not know him very well," (writes the noble historian,) "imputed, very unjustly, much of his sadness to a violent passion he had for a noble lady; and it was the more spoken of, because she died the same day, and, as some computed it, in the same hour that he was killed. But they who know either the lord or the lady, knew well that neither of them was capable of an ill imagination. She was of the most unspotted virtue; never married; of an extraordinary talent of mind, but of no alluring beauty, nor of a constitution of tolerable health, being in a deep consumption, and not like to have lived so long by many months." There will be found a material difference between the accounts of Aubrey and Clarendon. The lady alluded to by the former was not possessed of rank, and it is to the fact of her death that Falkland's grief is attributed. Lord Clarendon's heroine is evidently of noble birth, and, for any thing that Falkland knew to the contrary, was alive to the hour of death.

On the morning of the battle of Newbury, Lord Falkland, as was usual on such occasions, appeared remarkably cheerful. He had insisted on placing himself in front of Sir John Byron's regiment, which it was supposed would be engaged in the hottest of the action. If his prayer was for death, it was not breathed in vain. In charging a body of infantry, he was shot from behind a hedge, in the lower part of the stomach, and instantly fell dead from his horse: his body, as related by Aubrey, was not discovered till the following day.

Lord Clarendon mourns affectionately over his unfortunate friend:—"In that unhappy battle," he says, "was slain the Lord Viscount Falkland, a person of such prodigious parts, of learning and knowledge, of that inimitable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it would be most infamous and execrable to all posterity." The praise of Whitelock is almost equally fervent, while his political hostility renders it more valuable.

Lord Falkland was killed on the 20th of September, 1643, having only completed his thirty-third year. He was buried in the church of Great Tew, in Oxfordshire.

LUCY,

COUNTESS OF CARLISLE.

This "Erynnys of her time," as she is styled by Bishop Warburton, was undoubtedly the most enchanting woman at the court of Charles. Next to the far-famed Sacharissa, she was the goddess of Waller's idolatry; the mistress of the high-minded Strafford, and of the demagogue Pym; celebrated by Voiture, Suckling, and half the poets of the day, it would nevertheless have been better for her had she courted respect more, and admiration less. Such, however, were her wit and loveliness, and such was the fascination of her address, that her very foibles rendered her more charming. Though she never understood her own mind, she imagined that she had a deep insight into that of others. Dissatisfied with the influence which a combination of wit, youth, and beauty, are able to confer, and with an unhappy distaste to the duties and pleasures of domestic life, it was her object to become the queen of a political party; and though disqualified both by her sex and her incapacity from attaining that object, yet her accomplishments and talents for intrigue rendered her an acquisition to her own friends, and frequently caused embarrassments to the court. However, had she quite deserved the strong epithet of Warburton, it is probable that her admirers would have been fewer, and their praises less warm.

The Lady Lucy Percy was the youngest daughter of Henry, eighth Earl of Northumberland. On the 6th of November, 1617, she was married, without her father's consent, to James Hay, the fantastic spendthrift, afterwards created Earl of Carlisle. We know little of the terms on which they lived together; but it appears certain that her intimacy with Strafford commenced during the lifetime of her husband. The name of Lady Carlisle is frequently mentioned with interest in the Strafford Letters. On the 9th of January, 1633, Mr. Garrard writes to the earl in Ireland: "My Lady Carlisle hath not been well of late, looks well, but hath utterly lost her stomach, insomuch that she is forced to leave the court for a while, and be at Mr. Thomas Cary's house in the Strand, for the taking of physic and recovery of her health; which house her lord hath taken at £150 a year rent, ever since Mr. Carey was designed ambassador for Venice." The fact of her intrigue with Strafford has been questioned, but their intimacy is sufficiently established by more than one letter among the Sidney Papers.

In 1636 her husband left her a young and beautiful widow. It was on this occasion that Waller composed his fine verses, "To the Countess of Carlisle in mourning;" when he addresses her so happily, as—

A Venus rising from a sea of jet.

Perhaps she did not mourn deeply for her eccentric lord, for the poet proceeds in his consolation in rather a singular strain:

We find not that the laughter-loving dame
Mourned for Anchises; 'twas enough she came
To grace the mortal with her deathless bed,
And that his living eyes such beauty fed;
Had she been there, untimely joy through all
Men's hearts diffused, had marred the funeral.

Sir William Davenant, also, addressed a copy of verses to her on the same melancholy occasion. They commence with some elegance:

This cypress folded here, instead of lawn!
These tapers winking, and these curtains drawn!
What may they mean?

Voiture, who was probably acquainted with her when he was in England, has also celebrated her charms.

There is a character of Lady Carlisle, drawn by Sir Toby Matthews, which, notwithstanding its bombastic solemnity, obtained considerable note at the time. It is scarcely of sufficient importance to be transcribed at length, but an extract may not be unacceptable. Though intended for a panegyric, it leaves an impression as little favourable to the lady's character as to the author's sense. Sir Toby proceeds: "She will freely discourse of love, and hear both the fancies and powers of it; but if you will needs bring it within knowledge, and boldly direct it to herself, she is likely to divert the discourse; or at least seem not to understand it. By which you may know her humour and her justice; for since she cannot love in earnest, she would have nothing from love; so contenteth herself to play with love as with a child. She hath too great a heart to have naturally any strong inclination to others. Though she be observed not to be very careful in the public exercises of our religion; yet I agree not with their opinion who hold her likely to abandon and change it. She is in disposition inclined to be choleric, which she suppresses, not perhaps in consideration of the persons who occasion it, but upon a belief that it is unhandsome towards herself; which yet, being

* It is amusing to find so daily an act of cleanliness requiring an explanation. If the days of chivalry are over, the days of comfort are at least improved.

thus covered, doth so kindle and fire her wit, as that in very few words, it says somewhat so extracted, as that it hath a sharpness, and strength, and taste, to disrelish, if not to kill, the proudest hopes which you can have of her value of you. She more willingly allows of the conversation of men than of women; yet when she is amongst those of her own sex, her discourse is of fashions and dresses, which she hath ever so perfect upon herself, as she likewise teaches them by seeing her." Sir 'Toby attributes to her another, and more rare accomplishment of her sex. He tells us that she said what she had to say in the fewest words.

It is to this "Character," that Suckling alludes in his Session of the Poets. In introducing Sir 'Toby to Apollo's notice as one of the candidates for the laurel, he proceeds with much pleasantness:

Toby Matthews (plague on him!) how came he there?
Was whispering nothing in somebody's ear;
When he had the honour to be named in court;
But, sir, you may thank my Lady Carlisle for't;
For had not her character furnished you out
With something of handsome, beyond all doubt
You and your sorry lady-muse had been
In the number of those that were not let in.

Another poem of Suckling's, entitled "On the Lady Carlisle's walking in Hampton Court Gardens," consists of an amusing dialogue between Suckling and his friend Thomas Carew. The latter appears to have been deeply smitten, and apostrophises the lady's charms in the following exquisite verse.

Didst thou not find the place inspired?
And flowers, as if they had desired
No other sun, start from their beds,
And for a sight steal out their heads?
Heardst thou not music when she talked?
And didst not find that as she walked
She threw rare perfumes all about,
Such as bean-blossoms newly out,
Or chafed spices give?—

Suckling naturally amuses himself with the romance of his friend, on which the latter breaks out passionately,—

'Twas well for thee she left the place,
There is great danger in that face.

But Carew's praises grow far too glowing and enthusiastic for further insertion.

A poem of Waller's on Lady Carlisle's bed-chamber, commences with the following happy couplet:

They taste of death that do at heaven arrive,
But we this paradise approach alive.

How strange are the anomalies of the human mind! This frivolous lady, worldly, beautiful, and unprincipled, deserted the gay and refined society in which she had basked from her childhood, to become the companion of gloomy enthusiasts and sanctimonious hypocrites. Her panegyrist tells us that ambition often led her into extremes, and that notoriety was as dear to her as life. Probably the court had grown unusually dull; her charms might have become less attractive, or the death of Lord Strafford might have weakened her influence. Weariness, disgust, vanity, such are too often the real motives of human actions.

Lady Carlisle had been under many obligations to Queen Henrietta Maria, and had been trusted by her in her most private affairs. Moreover her intimacy with Strafford, and her acquaintance with the leading politicians of the time, had initiated her in many of the secrets of the council-table, and with the projects and sentiments of the court; the defection of the fair renegade was therefore hailed with delight by the republicans. She discovered to them what ever she had been intrusted with, and zealously plotted and intrigued against her former friends; indeed, if we are to credit Sir Philip Warwick, she, who had won the affection, and listened to the eloquence of the lofty Strafford, became the mistress of his most deadly enemy, Pym. Probably the puritan was really dazzled with her charms. However, it is certain that she attended the worship of the enthusiasts; affected to listen to their sermons, and even took notes of their discourse.

At the Restoration, the politics of this volatile lady appear to have undergone another change, and to have hurried her into fresh intrigues. In a letter from Ignatius White to Sir G. Lane, dated 12th May, 1660, it is stated,—“The Queen of England's party is much dejected, their designs and projects being totally defeated. They have daily consultations at the Lady Carlisle's and some of them have expressed that they wished things had not succeeded in this manner, if the Marquess of Ormond and Sir E. Hyde must govern.” This passage evidently refers to the disinclination of the parliament to consent to the return of Henrietta into England. However, Lady Carlisle survived the date of this letter but a very few months; dying on the 5th of November, 1660, about the sixtieth year of her age.

Her death took place suddenly at Little Cashio-bury House. She had dined heartily about two hours before, and having ordered her chair for the purpose of visiting the queen-mother, was employed in cutting some riband, when she suddenly fell lifeless without uttering a word. The Earl of Leicester says in his dairy,—“It may be observed that she died upon the 5th of November, the day of the powder treason, for which her father was suspected and imprisoned.” The coincidence loses its ill-natured point, since Lord Leicester must have well known, that the stout old earl was as innocent of that detestable treason as himself.

The countess was buried near her father at Petworth.

SIR KENELM DIGBY.

Graceful, eloquent, and chivalrous even for the age in which he lived, with a genius as diversified as that of the admirable Crichton, and with the wonderful promise of a Picus de Mirandola, to whom he has been happily compared; with a vast capacity and amazing knowledge: how singular that littleness, vanity, and wrong-headedness, should have been the drawbacks of so many accomplishments. Changeable in religion, fantastic in his ideas of virtue, and false in his notions of honour, the hero turns braggart, the philosopher disregards truth, the orator wastes his eloquence in the drawing-room, the royalist becomes a suppliant to republicans, and the metaphysician condescends to write a cookery-book!

Sir Kenelm was born on the 11th of June, 1603. His father was Sir Everard Digby, the handsomest man of his time, and the misled but conscientious fanatic, who suffered at the age of twenty-four, for his share in the gunpowder conspiracy. His mother was Mary, daughter and sole heiress of William Mulsho, Esq., of Gotherst, in Buckinghamshire. By the attainder of Sir Everard, a portion of their large property was lost to the Digbys, and his son complains bitterly that a “soul stain on his blood” was the whole of his inheritance. At another time he speaks of the “scanty relics of a shipwrecked estate.” Lord Clarendon, however, informs us, that he inherited a “fair and plentiful estate;” and we are told that so much of Sir Everard's property as was entailed, and consequently escaped confiscation by the crown, amounted annually to the then considerable income of 3000*l*.

Sir Kenelm was entered at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, in his fifteenth year. His tutor was Mr. Thomas Allen, a scholar of great eminence, whom he ever treated with regard and respect. In 1621, accompanied by Mr. Aston Cockaine, a person of graceful character and literary attainments, he proceeded on his travels into France, Italy, and Germany. In 1623, we find him at Madrid; being the period when Prince Charles and Buckingham were on their visit to that capital. In October following, he was knighted by King James at Hinchinbroke, when only in his twenty-first year, the monarch paying him, in the presence of Prince Charles and the court, a very handsome compliment on his scholastic acquirements. He held, at different times, the appointments of Gentleman of the Bedchamber, Commissioner of the Navy, and Governor of the Trinity House.

Sir Kenelm was exactly formed for a courtier, and was consequently consulted in all the gay plans and elegant diversions of the court of Charles. The king admired him for his genius, the queen for his grace and figure, and the courtiers for his good-nature, his vivacity, and the delightful powers of his conversation.

There is a peculiar and universal charm in the name of Venetia Stanley. Her singular story, her connection with the eccentric philosopher, her accomplishments, and the portraits which still bloom with her unexampled loveliness, will ever excite an interest in whatever is connected with her name. It is a strange and undefinable feeling which attracts us to the erring beauties of former times. Jane Shore, the Fair Rosamond, and Nell Gwynne; La Belle Gabrielle, La Valière, and a hundred others; how singular, that those who were shunned and contemned in their lifetime, over whose sorrows and frailties the pride triumphed and the virtuous wept, should excite so deep an interest by the sight of their portraits, or the tale of their lives—that the grave of tainted beauty should be brightened by the sunshine of romance and sympathy, while its maligners are unnoticed or forgotten! There have been attempts to rescue the fair fame of Venetia Stanley from the attacks of Aubrey and the scandal-mongers. It is to be feared, however, after a candid examination of all the facts, that none but a very gallant or a very simple-minded person would become the champion of such questionable virtue.

Sir Kenelm has written the memoirs of his own life under the title of Loose Fantasies, in which he introduces himself under the name of Theagenes, and Venetia Stanley as Stellanina. They were written after his marriage, and were never intended to see the light.*

* They have been published within the last few years by Sir Harris Nicolas from the original among Venetia's beauty appears to have chiefly prompted him to the task, and perhaps he was desirous of flattering himself with the purity of his bride; his apologies for her conduct were doubtless received from her own mouth.

Venetia Stanley was daughter of Sir Edward Stanley, of Tongue Castle, in Shropshire, a Knight of the Bath, and grandson of Edward, third Earl of Derby. Her mother, who died when Venetia was but a few months old, was Lucy, daughter and co-heiress of Thomas Percy, seventh Earl of Northumberland. Sir Kenelm may well boast of the genealogy of his bride.

Sir Edward, Venetia's father, is said to have been so deeply affected at his wife's death, (whom, however, he had neglected in his lifetime,) that he secluded himself altogether from the world, and committed his infant to the care of a kinsman. Aubrey places the scene of her childhood at Euston Abbey, in Oxfordshire, where he asserts that she was under the sole charge of the tenant and his servants. It is difficult to authenticate such minute facts.

The residence of Lady Digby, Sir Kenelm's mother, was in the neighbourhood of Euston, and consequently the two children were frequently in each other's society. Their early, indeed almost infantine attachment, is reverted to in after-life with considerable pathos by the handsome philosopher. "The first time," he says, "that ever they had sight of one another they grew so fond of each other's company, that all who saw them said, assuredly that something above their tender capacity breathed this sweet affection into their hearts. They would mingle serious kisses among their innocent sports; and whereas other children of like age did delight in fond play and light toys, these two would spend the day in looking upon each other's face, and in accompanying these looks with gentle sighs, which seemed to portend that much sorrow was laid up for their understanding years; and if at any time they happened to use such recreations as were suitable to their age, they demeaned themselves therein so prettily and so affectionately, that one would have said love was grown a child again, and took delight to play with them. And when the time of parting came, they would take their leaves with such abundance of tears and sighs, as made it evident that so deep a sorrow could not be borne and nursed in children's breasts, without a nobler cause than the usual fondness in others."

According to Sir Kenelm, the fair Venetia was still exceedingly young when she accompanied her father to London on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of James I., with the Elector Palatine. "Her beauty and discretion," he says, "did soon draw the eyes and thoughts of all men to admiration." Aubrey's account of her visit is very different. "She was a most beautiful desirable creature," he says, "and being matura viro, was left by her father to live with a tenant and servants at Euston Abbey, in Oxfordshire; but as private as that place was, it seems her beauty could not lie hid. The young eagles had spied her, and she was sanguine and tractable, and of much suavity, which to abuse was great pity. I have now forgot who first brought her to town, but I have heard my uncle Danvers say, who was her contemporary, that she was so commonly courted that it was written over her lodging one night in litteris uncialibus,

Pray come not near,

For Dame Venetia Stanley lodgeth here."

Shortly after this period, Sir Kenelm departed on his travels. His prowess and erudition, his extraordinary personal strength and his gigantic stature, rendered him the wonder and admiration of foreign courts. It was said of him, in allusion to his address and powers of persuasion, that had he dropped from the clouds in any part of the world, he would have made himself respected. The Jesuits admitted the truth of the flattery: they added, however, that he must first have remained in the place where he fell at least six weeks, in order to give time for his accomplishments to develope themselves. Aubrey says, alluding to his personal advantages—"He was a person of extraordinary strength. I remember one at Shirburne protested to us, that he, being a middling man, being set in a chair, Sir K. took him up, chair and all, with one arm: he was of an undaunted courage, yet not apt in the least to give offence." But we must follow the philosopher in his discourse of himself.

Sir Kenelm informs us, that during his stay at Paris, the Queen of France, Mary de Medicis, not only fell deeply in love with him at a masque, but her admiration, he says, increased to such violence, that in order to preserve his faith to Venetia, he was compelled to quit the French court; and that, further, to avoid the effects of her jealousy, he caused a report to be spread of his death. It is singular that, many years afterwards, Sir Kenelm was released from confinement in Winchester House, (to which he had been sentenced by the parliament,) at the express intercession of this princess.

From Paris, Sir Kenelm proceeded to Angers, and thence into Italy. At Florence, in which town he fixed his residence, he wrote a letter to Venetia, cautioning her to place no credence in the reports of his death, and renewing his protestations of unalterable love. Unfortunately his letters were intercepted by his mother, and Venetia continued impressed with the conviction that he was no more.

Her long silence had for some time plunged him into a deep melancholy; but the news of her approaching marriage was at length brought to him at Florence, "coupled," he says, "with such circumstances as went to the prejudice of her honour." Such were his misery and despair, that not all his philosophical precepts, nor his long course of study and reflection, proved of the least avail to mitigate the heart-rending blow. In the mean time, however, the match had been broken off. His rival, it seems, while on a visit to his country-seat, had been captivated by "a new rural beauty," and Venetia, being informed of his defection, disdainfully refused to admit him to an interview, and encountered all his overtures for a reconciliation with hatred and scorn.

At this period, Sir Kenelm, ignorant of what was passing in England, was proceeding on his way to Madrid, where his relation, the Earl of Bristol, was then playing so prominent a part in the Spanish match; and whither Charles and the Duke of Buckingham were also progressing. In his journey he encountered a Brahmin, who not only convinced him that Venetia's honour remained unspotted, but even conjured up her spirit to his view. His description of her supernatural appearance, "seated," he says, "in the attitude of grief, at the foot of a blasted tree, her long hair hanging dishevelled over her white shoulders, and her head leaning on her hand," is given in the most poetical language; but of course, can only be considered as a beautiful picture.

After more than one singular adventure, in which it is extremely difficult to draw the exact line between truth and fiction, so highly are they coloured by the vanity of the narrator, Digby sailed from Spain in company with Prince Charles, and landed at Portsmouth on the 5th of October, 1623. As he entered London, he accidentally encountered Venetia. "After so long an absence," he says, "her beauty seemed brighter to him than when he left her: but she sat pensively in one side of the coach by herself, as Apelles might have taken her counterfeit to express Venus sorrowing for her beloved Adonis." He instantly sent his servant to make inquiries where she lived, and having respectfully solicited an interview, was admitted to her presence on the following day. Though fully convinced of her unworthiness, he describes their meeting as rapturous in the extreme. "It can be conceived," he says, "by no one, but such as have loved in a divine manner, and have had their affections suspended by misfortunes and mistakes." The interview concludes by Venetia, like a true woman, convincing her lover of her purity and faith.

Whoever has studied human nature, or been in any degree conversant with the dispositions of women, will discover internal evidence in Sir Kenelm's own relation, that he himself discredited the purity of his beautiful mistress. There is, indeed, throughout his narrative, an entire want of candour; a plausible and manifest apology for his weak marriage; and a desire to cloak folly under the garb of romance.

There must have been much temptation in that beautiful face. Aubrey says: "She had a most lovely sweet-turned face, delicate dark-brown hair. She had a perfect healthy constitution; strong; good skin; well-proportioned, inclining to bona roba. Her face, a short oval; dark-brown eyebrow, about which much sweetness, as also in the opening of her eyelids. The colour of her cheeks was just that of the damask rose, which is neither too hot nor too pale. She was of a just stature, not very tall." There are none of her contemporaries who do not speak of Venetia Stanley as the loveliest creature they had ever beheld.

Considering the opposition of his mother, his own doubts as to the purity of his mistress, and the arguments of his friends, it seems that Digby would never have made Venetia his wife, but for an act of feminine generosity which the real nobleness of his nature could well enable him to appreciate. Having been selected to accompany the Duke of Buckingham in his splendid mission to France, to conduct Henrietta Maria to England, his means scarcely enabled him to present a proper figure in so illustrious a pageant. It was his Venetia who averted the mortification. She lost no time in pawning both her plate and jewels, and at once made him master of all she possessed in the world. Digby's heart relented, and, forgetting, or scorning the stories against her honour, he made her the offer of his hand. But Sir Kenelm says he received from her an answer much contrary to what he expected; "the effect of which was a flat refusal, pronounced with much settledness and a constant gravity, which yet she could not deliver without many tears." "She had consented," she said, the Harleian MSS. The introductory memoir will be considered by many readers as more entertaining than the autobiography itself.

"to marry another man, and had allowed him to possess himself of her picture." "Hereafter," she added, "the heat and edge of his passion might be somewhat abated, and he might give another interpretation to her past actions than now he did, and peradventure deem her not so worthy of his affection and respect." A hint to the most chivalrous person of his age, was of course sufficient. He challenged his former rival to single combat; but the latter proved "unworthy to be his enemy." He returned the picture into Sir Kenelm's hands; at the same time, proclaiming in writing, that he had been guilty of falsehood if he had ever slandered her honour.

Sir Kenelm's mother continuing strongly opposed to his union with Venetia, their marriage took place in private. Their first child was born in October, 1625. Lady Digby's confinement having been hastened by a fall from her horse, and her labour attended by considerable danger.

Lord Clarendon merely remarks on his friend Digby's union: "He married a lady of extraordinary beauty, and of as extraordinary a fame."

The activity of Digby's character seems to have been little impaired by marriage, and, as he himself informs us, he longed to give proof of it to the world. At this period, in consequence of some disputes with the Venetians, and especially from the frequent piracies of the Algerines, the English trade in the Mediterranean had suffered to a ruinous extent. Accordingly, having succeeded in obtaining the king's commission, and having fitted out a squadron at his own cost, Sir Kenelm sailed from England on the 29th of December, 1627, in pursuit of fame for himself, and satisfaction for his countrymen. This was about three years after his marriage; and his parting with Venetia is affectingly described. It may be remarked, that previous to quitting England he announced his union to the world.

Shortly after sailing, a disease broke out in his ships, and made a great havoc amongst his men. His officers would have persuaded him to return, but he was obstinate in pursuing his course. Fortune at length favoured him. After capturing several armed vessels of the Algerines, and setting many English slaves at liberty, he suddenly fell in with a combined French and Venetian squadron in the Bay of Scanderon. Though his own force was greatly inferior in point of numbers, he determined on giving them battle; and, setting a gallant example to his followers by bringing his own vessel alongside the flagship of the enemy, the action was speedily decided in his favour. Lord Clarendon says: "He encountered their whole fleet, killed many of their men, and sunk one of their galliasses; which, in that drowsy and inactive time, was looked upon with a general estimation, though the crown disavowed it." Ben Jonson thus celebrates the engagement:

Witness thy action done at Scanderon,
Upon thy birth-day, the eleventh of June.

Owing to the difficulty in fixing the precise day of Digby's birth, this indifferent couplet has given rise to far more controversy than it would otherwise have deserved. The merit of such a conceit can only consist in the truth of the coincidence, and unfortunately there is a question in both instances as to the poet's chronological accuracy. Both Anthony Wood and Aubrey, the latter on the authority of Ashmole and Napier, insist that his birth took place on the 11th of July, and consequently, that Jonson altered the month for the sake of the rhyme. It appears, moreover, by Digby's own letter, describing the action at Scanderon, that the battle was fought on the sixteenth of June. As the 16th would have served the metre as well as the 11th, probably Jonson in this instance was really misled. In the other case, the merits of his correctness are not so easily decided.

After all, it is singular that the 11th of June should have proved the day of Digby's decease. Ferrar's epitaph, while it echoes the conceit of Jonson, improves it by this important addition to the coincidence:

Born on the day he died, the eleventh of June,
And that day bravely fought at Scanderon;
It's rare that one and the same day should be
His day of birth, of death, and victory!

With the relation of his famous action, Sir Kenelm's autobiography concludes. But for the difficulty of arriving at plain facts, and the vanity and hectoring which occasionally sully its pages, it would be an extremely valuable, as it is certainly an entertaining work. Were we to place confidence in one half of what the author relates of his own feelings, the partition between eccentricity and madness would indeed be slender. But it is to be feared (though to have expressed such an opinion might have been dangerous in the life-time of the knight) that truth was not the golden mean in the code of Sir Kenelm's philosophy. Agreeable as his conversation is admitted to have been, his stories of what he had seen and heard, were received with considerable caution by his auditors, whom he appears to have astounded, almost as much as he delighted them.

Henry Stubbe, the physician, called him "the Pliny of his age for lying;" and Anthony Wood mentions an especial story of his, which, he adds, "put men to very great wonder:"—"viz. of a city in Barbary, under the king of Tripoli, that was turned into stone in a very few hours by a petrifying vapour that fell upon the place, that is, men, beasts, trees, houses, utensils, &c.; every thing remaining in the same posture, as children at their mother's breasts, &c." It is but fair to add, that, although the account was certainly transmitted by him to England, Sir Kenelm was not the originator of this absurd fiction. His authority was the librarian to the grand duke at Florence, who, it appears received it from the grand duke himself.

But a story, almost as strange, is related by the philosopher himself in his Powder of Sympathy. A beautiful female relation, he says, who was on the point of becoming a mother, had not only fallen into the detestable fashion of wearing patches on the face, but was conspicuous for the number which she wore, and the nicety of their arrangement. Sir Kenelm had a peculiar abhorrence of this new and unbecoming mode. "Have you," he said to the lady, "no apprehension that the child may be born with half-moons upon its face; or, rather, that all the black patches which you bear up and down in small portions, may assemble in one, and appear in the middle of his forehead?" His words had the effect of frightening the lady, and the patches were discarded. Sir Kenelm asserts, however, that such was the power of imagination, that the child, which proved to be a daughter, had the misfortune of being born with a mark, "as large as a crown of gold," in the centre of its forehead.

Lady Fanshawe, in her memoirs, mentions her having met Sir Kenelm at dinner, at the house of the governor of Calais, where several French gentlemen were present. She informs us, that he took the lead in the conversation, and entertained them with a number of stories, far too marvellous to be true. "But," she adds, "the concluding one was that barnacles, a bird in Jersey, was first a shell-fish to appearance, and from that, sticking upon old wood, became in time a bird: after some consideration, they unanimously burst out in laughter, believing it altogether false; and, to say the truth, it was the only thing true that he had discoursed with them; that was his infirmity, though otherwise a person of most excellent parts, and a very fine-bred gentleman."

On another occasion, at the house of a chemist in France, a question having arisen among the company respecting the dissolvent of gold, we find this strange person relating another of his astonishing stories. "One of the royal houses in England," he said, "having stood covered with lead for five or six ages, and being sold after that time, was found to contain three fourths of silver in the lead;" he further said, "that a fixed salt, drawn out of a certain potter's earth at Arcueil, in France, being for some time exposed to the sunbeams, became saltpetre, then vitriol, then lead, tin, copper, silver, and, at the end of fourteen months, gold; which he affirmed to have experienced himself, as well as another able naturalist."

Although, as Lady Fanshawe observes, Sir Kenelm was a "very fine-bred gentleman," and although he was good-natured in the extreme, (two circumstances extremely opposed to the general idea of a bully,) still, his fantastic notions of honour, and a natural love of a fray, were constantly leading him into quarrels. There is a curious tract in the British Museum, entitled, "Sir Kenelm's Honour Maintained, by a most courageous combat which he fought with the Lord Mount le Ros," &c. It seems that Digby (then an exile in France, in consequence of some disgrace, the cause of which it is now fruitless to inquire into,) received an invitation from a French nobleman, Monsieur Mount le Ros, to dinner. In the course of the entertainment several healths were drunk, and, among others, the kings of France, Spain, and Portugal. At last their host proposed the health of the arrantest coward in the world. Sir Kenelm inquired who was meant. The host replied, that after the health was drunk he would acquaint him. Having drained their glasses,—"I mean," he said, "Sir Kenelm's master, the King of England."

Digby said nothing at the time, but invited his host to dine with him on the following day. During the evening, he desired his company to fill their glasses, and drink to the bravest king upon earth. He then named his own sovereign, at which the Frenchman laughed, and repeated his opinion of the previous day. Sir Kenelm told him, that though a disgraced man, he was still loyal, and challenged him to single combat with the sword. Accordingly, dinner being over, they proceeded to a retired spot, and having taken off their doublets, commenced the encounter. At the fourth bout, Sir Kenelm ran his rapier through the Frenchman's breast till it came out at his throat. Sir Kenelm instantly set off to the French court, and, introducing himself to the king, acquainted him with the particulars of the quarrel. His majesty praised him for what he had done; assuring him that the proudest noble in France should not with impunity revile his brother monarch. He even sent a guard with Sir Kenelm to conduct him in safety through Flanders, whence he shortly afterwards set sail for England; his gallant conduct having probably obtained for him his pardon. The tract ends with the following doggerel verses:

Now I conclude, commanding fame to show
Brave Digby's worthy deed, that all may know
He loved his king; may all so loyal prove,
And like this Digby to their king show love.

But we must conclude the strange story of Venetia Stanley. After the period of her marriage, even her stern stigmatiser, Aubrey, admits that her conduct was irreproachable; and yet Sir Kenelm appears to have been continually jealous of her unrivaled loveliness. To his uxorious adoration we owe many of the beautiful portraits which remain of her: in the picture at Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, once the seat of Sir Kenelm, she is painted in a Roman habit, a serpent in one hand, and a pair of white doves resting on the other. At Windsor she is painted in a different dress, but with the same emblems. The doves seem to denote her innocence, and the serpent her triumph over the venomous malignancy of her detractors.* Beneath her is a prostrate Cupid, and behind, a figure of Calumny bound to the earth. These devices were doubtless invented by her eccentric husband: notwithstanding his professed indifference to female virtue, many circumstances denote how gladly he would have been a believer in the chastity of his wife.

Sir Kenelm had several portraits painted of her by Vandyke. In one of these she is represented as treading on Malice and Envy, unhurt by a serpent which twines round her arm. At Althorpe there is another picture of her by that great artist, taken after she was dead.

At Gothurst there are two busts of her in brass; and Sir Kenelm had her feet, her hands, and her face taken in plaster. Ben Jonson says,—

Sitting and ready to be drawn,
What mean these tiffany, silk and lawn,
Embroideries, feathers, fringes, lace,
When every limb takes like a face!

It is believed that her husband made use of the most singular expedients to increase the lustre of her charms,—that he invented cosmetics with this object, and among other fantastic experiments, supplied her with the flesh of capons which had been fed with vipers. After her death, but little brains being found in her head, Sir Kenelm attributed it to her drinking viper wine; but, says Aubrey, "spiteful women would say it was a viper husband who was jealous of her." Pennant tells us, that the most northern residence of the great snail, or pomatia, which is of exotic origin, is in the woods in the neighbourhood of Gothurst. He adds, "tradition says it was introduced by Sir Kenelm, as a medicine for the use of his lady."

Digby's jealousy, and the application of these strange medicaments, gave rise to a report that he had administered poison to his wife. Probably her dissolution was in reality hastened by his experiments. This beautiful woman was found dead in her bed, on the 1st of May, 1633, in her thirty-third year. She was discovered in the attitude of sleep, her head resting upon her hand. She was interred in Christ Church, near Newgate, under a monument of black marble, which supported her bust in copper gilt. This tomb was completely destroyed by the great fire, and her vault partially opened by its fall; but the bust escaped, and was afterwards seen by Aubrey, exposed for sale, in a brazier's stall. He neglected to purchase it, and he afterwards discovered that it had been melted down.

Ben Jonson composed no less than ten pieces on the death of Lady Digby. Of her descent he says:

I sing the just and uncontroled descent
Of Dame Venetia Digby, styled the fair;
For mind and body the most excellent,
That ever nature, or the latter Ayre
Gave two such houses as Northumberland,
And Stanley, to the which she was coheir.
Speak it, you bold Penates, you that stand
At either stem, and know the veins of good Run from your roots; tell, testify the grand
Meeting of graces, that so swelled the flood
Of virtues in her, as in short, she grew
The wonder of her sex, and of your blood.

But the poet joins still higher praises:

She was in one a many parts of life;
A tender mother, a discreeter wife;
A solemn mistress: and so good a friend,
So charitable to religious end;
In all her petite actions so devote,
As her whole life was now become one note
Of piety and private holiness.

Jonson called her his muse, and lingers on her person and character with unbounded admiration.

Sir Kenelm appears to have felt deeply the loss of his wife. He shut himself up in Gresham College, where he amused himself with the study of chemistry, and the conversation of the professor. His garb at this time was a long mourning cloak and a high-crowned hat; and he allowed his beard to grow in testimony of his grief. His eccentricity, however, had scarcely been less conspicuous in happier days. "No man," says Aubrey, "became grandeur better; yet sometimes he would live only with a lackey, and a horse with a foot-cloth." At the commencement of the civil troubles Sir Kenelm enlisted on the side of royalty; and having made himself obnoxious to the popular party was confined in Winchester House,* by order of the Long Parliament, till 1643. Having at length obtained his release, at the intercession of his old adviser the Queen-Mother of France, he retired to that country, where he divided his time between his philosophical pursuits and the brilliant society of the French metropolis. About the year 1648, he was sent by Henrietta Maria as her envoy to the Pope.—His profession of the catholic religion, his majestic appearance, and his great learning, caused him to be much admired by the enthusiastic Romans. His eccentricity, however, soon led him into scrapes, and the Pope declared that he was mad. Wood tells us, that he "grew high and huffed his holiness," adding, what is perhaps not exactly true, that having been trusted with some of the funds of the catholics, he proved an indifferent steward on the occasion. It has been asserted that, on one occasion, he flatly gave his holiness the lie.

* Winchester House, one of the most interesting ancient dwelling-houses left in London, is in the act of being demolished (1839) while these sheets are in the press. It stands, or rather stood, in a street which bears its name, to the west of Bishopsgate Street. In the windows, within the few last weeks, was still to be seen the motto of the Powletts, "Aimez Loyauté." Every one remembers the glorious defence of Basing House, from 1643 to 1645, during which its gallant lord, John, fifth marquis of Winchester, wrote that famous motto of his family with a diamond in every window. Winchester House, of which we are now speaking, stood on the site of a monastery of Augustine Friars, which had been granted to William Lord St. John, afterwards Marquis of Winchester, by Henry the Eighth. In 1602, William Powlett, fourth Marquis, was reduced to such extremities by his magnificent style of living, as to be compelled to dispose of it for the payment of his debts. It appears to have been purchased by John Swinnerton, a rich merchant, and afterwards Lord Mayor, from whom it came into the family of the present proprietor, who reports it to have been the property of his forefathers for about two centuries. When the author recently bade farewell to apartments which had entertained Elizabeth and her courtiers, he found them the scene of busy trade, and was told that their occupants were packers!

It is difficult to decide at what period Sir Kenelm became a Roman Catholic; or indeed if he was ever at heart of any other religion. Later in life, his political conduct also appears as strange and vacillating as his religious principles. Cromwell had no sooner assumed the Protectorate, than Digby, notwithstanding that he lay under the ban of the government, returned to England. To the astonishment of all men, he was not only well received by Cromwell, who is said to have taken great pleasure in his society, but there was evidently some great design on foot, of which the Protector had invited him to the discussion. Probably it was a reconciliation of the papists with the new government; but, whatever may have been the secret of so strange an intimacy, any inquiry into the subject would now be in vain.—Mysterious as seems to have been Digby's conduct at this period, we must be cautious not to regard it in too harsh a light. As there is no reason to suppose that his connection with Cromwell was productive of injury to his rightful master, it would be unfair to brand him with the name of a traitor. Considering also the eccentricity of his character, it is quite as possible that he may have been actuated by a regard for his sovereign, and a desire to promote his interests, as that he should have been influenced by a selfish expectation of advancing his own.

The summer of 1656 was passed at Toulouse, and part of the following year at Montpellier. He had been suffering for some time under severe attacks of the stone, and had sought the south of France in hopes of relief. At Montpellier it was his good fortune to encounter several learned and scientific persons, who had formed themselves into a kind of academy, and to whom he read his famous discourse on the Sympathetic Powder. Part of 1658 and 1659 was spent in Lower Germany, where he went by the name of Count Digby; and in 1660 we again find him at Paris. At the Restoration he returned to England, and at the formation of the Royal Society was appointed one of the council. The few remaining years of his life were passed in literary and scientific pursuits. Chemistry, mathematics, and philosophy, had severally their charms for him; and from the meetings of the new society he was but rarely absent. His residence was a house westward of the north portico of Covent Garden, where he had his laboratory, and where Wood informs us that he died.

His admiration of genius, and thirst after knowledge, induced him to pay rather an interesting visit to a brother philosopher. The story is related by Des Maizeaux in his "Life of St. Evremond." According to that writer, Sir Kenelm himself assured St. Evremond that, having perused the writings of Des Cartes with great interest, he conceived so strong a desire to become personally acquainted with him, as to undertake a journey to Holland expressly with that object. Having discovered the philosopher in his retirement, he engaged him in conversation, and, without revealing his name, continued to discourse with him for some time on philosophical matters. At last, Des Cartes, who was acquainted with some of Digby's writings, on a sudden remarked, inquiringly, that "It must certainly be the celebrated Sir Kenelm Digby with whom he was conversing?" "And if you were not the celebrated Des Cartes," said the other, "I should not have quitted England on purpose to visit you."

* These emblems, however, may possibly have reference to the text in the Scriptures—"Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves;" such, at least, is the ingenious suggestion of a literary friend.

Lord Clarendon's character of his friend is too admirably drawn to be passed over in silence:—"He was a person," he says, "very eminent and notorious throughout the whole course of his life, from his cradle to his grave; and inherited a fair and plentiful fortune, notwithstanding the attainder of his father. He was a man of a very extraordinary person and presence, which drew the eyes of all men upon him, which were more fixed by a wonderful graceful behaviour, a flowing courtesy and civility, and such a volubility of language, as surprised and delighted; and though in another man it might have appeared to have somewhat of affectation, it was marvellous graceful in him, and seemed natural to his size and mould of his person, to the gravity of his motion, and the tune of his voice and delivery. He had a fair reputation in arms, of which he gave an early testimony in his youth, in some encounters in Spain and Italy, and afterwards in an action in the Mediterranean Sea. In a word, he had all the advantages that nature and art, and an excellent education, could give him; which, with a great confidence and presentness of mind, buoyed him up against all those prejudices and disadvantages, as the attainder and execution of his father for a crime of the highest nature; his own marriage with a lady, though of an extraordinary beauty, of as extraordinary a fame; his changing and re-changing his religion; and some personal vices and licenses in his life, which would have suppressed and sunk any other man, but never clouded and eclipsed him from appearing in the best places and the best company, and with the best estimation and satisfaction."

We must each form our own opinions of so remarkable a man. Whatever may be Sir Kenelm's merit as an author, his magnificent donation of books to the Bodleian Library at Oxford will ever procure for him the gratitude of the learned. His death took place on the 11th of June, 1685, at the age of sixty-two. He desired, by his will, to be buried in the same vault with his wife, and that no inscription should be placed on his tomb.

SIR JEFFERY HUDSON.

Sir Jeffery Hudson, whose name has been immortalised by the great genius of modern times, was born in 1619, at Oakham, in Rutlandshire.—"the least man in the least county." His father was a broad-shouldered, broad-chested person of the common height. Jeffery himself was only eighteen inches high in his eighth year, and is said to have grown no taller till he was past thirty, when he shot up to be three feet nine inches.

Notwithstanding his inferiority in stature, he was well proportioned and not ungraceful.

His father, who had charge of the "baiting bulls" of George Villiers, first Duke of Buckingham, presented his son to the duchess when he was in his ninth year, and about his nineteenth inch. The duchess dressed him in satin, and had two tall men to attend him. Charles the First and Henrietta, soon after their marriage, paid a visit to the Duke of Buckingham, at his seat, Burghley on the hill. At one of the entertainments, the little fellow was served up to a table in a cold pie. As soon as he stepped forward, the duchess presented him to Henrietta, in whose service he ever afterwards remained. He was twice painted by Vandyke in attendance on the queen.

Fuller says: "It was not long before he was presented in a cold baked pye to King Charles and Queen Mary at an entertainment; and ever after lived, whilst the court lived, in great plenty therein, wanting nothing but humility, (high mind in a low body,) which made him that he did not know himself, and would not know his father; and which by the king's command caused justly his sound correction: he was, though a dwarf, no dastard." At one of the court masques, the king's gigantic porter drew him from his pocket, to the astonishment of the guests.

Sir Jeffery, as he grew older, forgot that it was merely his deformity which had brought him into notice. As Fuller tells us, he despised his father, the bull-baiter, and began to consider himself a personage of importance. Probably he was really clever, and he was undoubtedly trustworthy. Previous to one of her accouchements, Henrietta despatched him to Paris for a midwife. He was much petted by the queen-mother of France, and the ladies of her court, who heaped presents on him to the amount of £2500l. On his return to England, in company with the midwife and the queen's dancing-master, he was seized by the Dunkirkers, and stripped of all he possessed. Sir William D'Avenant wrote a poem called Jeffreidos, or the Captivity of Jeffery, on the occasion. The scene is laid at Dunkirk, and describes a fight between the little gentleman and a ferocious turkey-cock, from whose fury Sir Jeffery is snatched by the midwife. The poem is protracted to a considerable length, and is not conceived in the happiest style of the poet. The actual encounter between Jeffery and his feathered foe affords, perhaps, the best specimen of the merits of the poem.

—Jeffery strait was thrown; whilst faint and weak,

The cruel foe assaults him with his beak.

A lady midwife now, he there by chance
Espied, that came along with him from France.

"A heart nursed up in war, that ne'er before
This time (quoth he) could bow, doth now implore
Thou, that deliverest hast so many, be
So kind of nature to deliver me."

But stay! for though the learned chronologer
Of Dunkirk, doth confess him freed by her;
The subtler poets yet, whom we translate
In all this epic ode, do not relate
The manner how; and we are loth at all
To vary from the Dutch original.

There is in the British Museum a little work entitled, "The New Year's Gift, presented at court from the Lady Parvula to the Lord Minimus, commonly called Little Jeffery." It was printed in London in 1636. The volume is one of remarkably small dimensions, with a view of adapting it to the subject. After a number of indifferent jokes and some wretched pedantry, it concludes with some slight humour:—"In short, who desireth not in debt to be as little as may be, and what a rare temper is it in men of descent not to be ambitious of greatness, even in the highest matters which men attempt, how commonly the most do come short, and in their greatest business effect but little. And, therefore, as it was said of Scipio, that he was namquam minus solus quam cum solus, never less alone than when alone; so it may be said of you, excellent abstract of greatness, that you are namquam minus parvus quam cum parvus, never less little than when little. I hope you will pardon me if in my style I have used a little boldness and familiarity, you knowing it to be so commendable, and that it is nimia familiaritas, great boldness only, which breedeth contempt: especially since you are no stranger, but of my own country; though some, judging by your stature, have taken you to be a low-country man. Many merry new years are wished unto you by,

"The sworn servant of your honour's perfections,

"PARVULA."

At the commencement of the civil troubles, Sir Jeffery accompanied his royal mistress into France. He had long been the butt of the court, and even of the servants of the royal household. The gigantic porter was his especial horror. But whether he had acquired an accession of dignity from his important mission to bring back the midwife, or whether he particularly disliked being laughed at in the presence of foreigners, his irritability at this period was productive of fatal consequences to one of his tormentors. Mr. Crofts, a young man of good family, having teased the little gentleman beyond bearing, Sir Jeffery sent him a challenge. Crofts appeared at the place of appointment with a squirt in his hand. Sir Jeffery was so extremely enraged that a real meeting was agreed upon, at which both parties were to appear on horseback, armed with pistols. At the first shot, this Elzevir Achilles shot his persecutor dead. He was imprisoned in consequence, but probably escaped with a short incarceration.

Soon after this he was taken prisoner by a Turkish vessel, and sold as a slave among the Moors. His captivity must have been of brief duration, for we find him a captain of horse in the civil wars. When the royal cause became hopeless, he again followed the queen into France, where he remained till the Restoration. He had probably embraced the religion of his royal mistress, for in 1682, in the decline of life, he was implicated in the absurd Popish plot, and was committed to prison. He died shortly afterwards, in the sixty-third year of his age, a prisoner in the Gate House, Westminster. In Newgate Street, over the entrance to a small court, on the north side of the street may still be seen (1839) a small sculpture in stone, on which are engraved the figures of William Evans, the king's gigantic porter, and by his side the redoubtable Sir Jeffery. There is an engraving of the sculpture in Pennant's London, and, at Hampton Court, an original picture of Sir Jeffery by Mytens.

THE END.

Thou hast to those 'in populous city pent'
Glimpses of wild and beauteous nature lent,
A bright remembrance ne'er to be destroyed,
That proves to them a treasure long enjoyed,
And for this scope to beings erst confined,
I fain would hail thee with a grateful mind."

LORD KAIMES.

Lord Kaimes being on the Circuit at Perth, after a witness on a capital trial had concluded his testimony, his lordship said, "Sir, I have one question more to ask you, and remember you are on your oath. You say you are from Buchin?" "Yes, my lord." "When do you return thither?" "To-morrow, my lord." "Do you know Colin Gillies?" "Yes, my lord, I know him very well." "Then tell him I shall breakfast with him on Tuesday morning."

AFFIDAVIT OF AN IRISH PROCESS-BEARER.

And this deponent further says, that on arriving at the house of the said defendant, situate in the county of Galway aforesaid, for the purpose of personally serving him with the said writ, he, the said deponent knocked several times at the outer, commonly called the Hall door, but could not obtain admittance; whereupon this deponent was proceeding to knock a fourth time, when a man, to this deponent unknown, holding in his hand a musket or blunderbuss, loaded with balls or slugs, as this deponent has since heard and verily believes, appeared at one of the upper windows of the said house, and presenting said musket or blunderbuss at this deponent, threatened, "that if said deponent did not instantly retire, he would send him, this deponent's, soul to hell," which this deponent verily believes he would have done, had not this deponent precipitately escaped.

Here is a letter of the great Frederick, in his old age, which seems to us worthy of an English dress—to his friend Voltaire.

"I perceive, my dear Voltaire, with regret, that twenty years have now revolved since we have had the pleasure of seeing each other. Your memory yet represents your friend to your imagination such as he then was, "his knees yet green," and his spirits buoyant with the ardour and activity of manhood; but alas, you would now find him an old man bending under the weight of decrepitude and disease. Each day robs him of some portion of the small remnant of his existence, and he is plodding on insensibly to that last exile from which kings and their subjects no more revisit this earth.

Nos ubi decidimus
Quo pius Æneas, quo tullus dives et Ancus, Pulvis et umbra sumus!

"The observers of human life, tell us that men of letters preserve their powers of intellect, and that soldiers terminate their career of old age by a state of atrophy and dotage. The great Conde, Marlborough, and Eugene, experienced a depredation of the mental faculties before those of the body, whilst Homer, Varré, Fontinelle, and a multitude of others, reached an extreme old age without being subject to any intellectual infirmity. There is also a certain philosopher of Ferney, who would also furnish a direct confirmation of this doctrine. For him time has no wings; his mind seems to grow young with the decadence of his body. As for me I have already sent a part of my memory, the little imagination I had, with my legs, to the shores of the black Cocytus. The light troops have gone before, and the heavy baggage follows after.

"Do not, my friend, wonder that I meddle not in the operations of the eastern war. I have renounced the battle, as well for military reasons, as that I may not incur the excommunication of the philosophers. You seem not to have read the article, War, of the Encyclopedia, (written it is supposed by the Philosopher of Ferney) in which so many pleasant epithets are lavished upon warriors and princes. 'They are no more than privileged assassins, sent out to ravage the universe.'

"There are, however, notwithstanding this high authority, some wars that are just; those which exact the defence of our property and persons are uncontestedly such. The distance of the Turkish frontiers obviate all causes of discord between our states. I agree with you that the domination of that Empire is oppressive and barbarous; I acknowledge that Greece is of all other countries most worthy of commiseration; but let us remember also the unjust sentence of the Aresopagus against Socrates, and the atrocious iniquity exercised by that Republic towards its admirals and generals at the very height of its prosperity. You say yourself, it is perhaps in retribution of these crimes that the Greeks are now tyrannised and vilified by barbarians. If so, it is not my province to deliver them. I know not the destined term of their penitence, and I, who am but dust and shadow, oppose not myself to the dispensations of Providence.

"Every day brings news of the insurgents of America, and their glorious exploits. We are reading in our Gazettes, news of a General Howe—every dog of Berlin barks his name in our faces. I am not a little concerned to learn whether Quakers, as they are, they may not be forced to defend their liberty, and combat for their firesides. If that should happen, as it is likely, you will be obliged then to consent that war sometimes is necessary, since the most humane and peaceable of the species are forced to encounter it.

"I have had news of Morival, and the progress of his law-suit, which, it is said, may yet last a whole year. They inform me that certain important formalities require the delay, and that it is only for want of patience that a man, who has money, can lose a law-suit in the Parliament of Paris. I heard these fine things with astonishment, and without comprehending them.

"In considering the transcendent less useful than practical geometry, you are undoubtedly right; the one being necessary to the common purposes of life, and the other but a luxury of the mind. These sublime abstractions, however, do honour to the human faculties, and those who cultivate them seem to me to be divested, as far as possible, of the gross matter of humanity, and to rise up into those regions, which are above the elevation of our senses, of reverence, genius, whatever be the direction of its flights, and though unable to comprehend the language of the geometrician, I lament my ignorance and do not esteem him the less.

"Maupefluis, whom you hate, had good qualities; he had an honest heart; he had great natural talents, and honourable acquirements; he was indeed irascible in temper, and this was the sole cause of your implacable enmity. By what fatality is it, that two Frenchmen are never friends in a foreign country? Millions suffer each other at home, but their kind affections seem to be lost the moment they have crossed the Rhine, the Pyrenees, and the Alps. But it is time to forget men's faults when the tomb has closed upon them. You will see Maupefluis no more but in the valley of Jehosophat, to which nothing yet presages your departure.

"Lekain informs me your health is yet good, and that you still walk in your garden, and yet retain that gaiety, that attic spirit in conversation, which distinguished your writings. I do not, therefore, fear any more, that the throne of Parnassus will become soon vacant; I will name you without apprehension my testamentary executor. We have here my Lord Marchal, at eighty years of age, with full blown cheeks, and with the exception of his legs, a young man. We have the Baron of Poltitz, also an octogenarian, who yet counts upon many years of life and activity, and why should not the author of the Henriade, of Merope, and Semiramis, who has much more of the celestial, elementary fire, of the vital spirit that prolongs the duration of our frail mortality, yet live to enjoy his glory in this world many years, to enlighten mankind, to honour his country, and to charm the old age of the solitary of Sans-Souci. May Apollo and Minerva preserve you for all these purposes. Valé.—Frederick."

NEW BOOKS.

Patchwork.—By Capt. Basil Hall, 2 vols. London.

"Never was the noble art of book-making carried to such high perfection as at present. The compilers seem to forget that people have libraries. One vamps up a new book of travels merely of disguised extracts from former publications. Another fills his pages with Greek and Latin extracts from Aristotle and Quintillian. A third, if possible more insipid, gives us long quotations from our poets, while a reference was enough, the books being in the hands of every body. Another treats us with old French ana in masquerade, and by a singular fate derives advantage from his very blunders, which makes the thing look new. Pah! I, and an amanuensis could scribble one of these books every twenty-four hours."

—H. Walpole.

"Of making books there is no end."—Solomon.

What would Walpole and Solomon have said had they lived in our plummy times of 1841. The wonder is what has become of this biblical accumulation of centuries. A Welsh scullion wench, on hearing the servants speak of new moons, gravely asked what had become of the old moons. A new book is now but a reproduction,

—"Aliusque et idem Nascitur."

Or another way, not noticed by Mr. Walpole, is, in the confection of a book, to throw aside the cuttings, and remnants, and other mercery unused into a repository, such as in Yankee house-wifery is called the rag-bag, and when of sufficient quantity, to stitch them into a book. This is lately the favourite way among the travellers. Prince Puckler began with his Tutti Frutti; he was followed by Capt. Marryat's Olla Podrida, and thirdly and lastly Capt. Hall, (we can imagine him in his study—legs decussated, his sartorial goose and thimble at his side,) has just basted together his "Patchwork," to be expected over by the next packet.

Do you know the reason the Captain did not love us in America very much? One of the reasons was, he had just before been travelling in Loo Choo, (as we have read in his book) and was shocked by the violent contrast. Of these Asiatics he says, "They are remarkably gentle and engaging, exceedingly coy of acquaintance—seem restrained by a genteel self-denial from gratifying curiosity, lest it might be thought obtrusive." Imagine any one, after this, coming straight into Kentucky! Now, these are precisely the Loo Choos, who have been lately eating half a dozen of our clergymen. "So coy of acquaintance!" We have seen a note of one of them in a French newspaper thus; "Mrs. Choo's compliments to Mrs. Choo something else—please come round this evening to supper, we have a missionary."

English travellers in America have yet a full swing; for nine tenths of their native readers know no more of us than of the Loo Choos. We are by no means so considerable a people as we apprehend. "My dear," a well bred London lady said to her husband, in our hearing, "who is that General Jackson you are talking about?" "My love, he is the President of the United States." Think!—to be well bred and not to know General Jackson! In a great metropolis wonderful objects are so multiplied there is no time for excursive information. When Whiston predicted the world would be burnt in three years, the Duchess of Bolton said, "Let us go to China." This is about the kind of information London ladies have of the United States.

We cannot offer our readers any extracts of Capt. Hall, for the same reason that the lady in the play could not see the Spanish fleet, it has not yet come in sight—but, which is nearly the same, we will translate from Pliny the Elder, an account written in the unknown tongues of people, who beat the Loo Choos and Americans, "all hollow." Of the authenticity of his relation, Pliny does not even intimate a doubt, but supports his narrative with an argument. "Who," says he, "would have credited the existence of the Æthiopian, had he not become acquainted with his complexion and physiognomy? and what is not a miracle when for the first time presented to our knowledge?"

Passing by the Cyclops, Lestrigons, and Anthropophagi, the other most remarkable cotemporaries of Pliny, were as follows:

"At the bottom of Mount Imaus there is a race of people whose feet are inverted, their heels being before. They cannot exist beyond the atmosphere of their native valley, and if at any time they wander to its extremity, they immediately take to their heels and retire into this congenial air, and are restored from suffocation.

"Ten days' journey beyond the Boristhenes is a tribe, who drink from men's skulls, and who repose their limbs at night upon mattresses made from the skins and hair of their fellow mortals;" this story is related upon the authority of a traveller calling himself Isogorus.

"A nation exists in Africa, at whose praises infants die, and the leaves wither on the trees. (Laudibus arrescant arbores, amoriuntur infantes.) Another tribe somewhat related to these, kill their enemies by a glance." "All women," says Cicero, "who have two pupils in the eye are possessed of this noxious quality. Others are mentioned, whose eyes are endowed with the power of fascination." This we do not pretend to pervert as any thing strange in our city. "In the eyes of some," says Pliny, "nature has also placed poison, lest there should be an evil in the world not found in women." For this last remark, he has made many enemies among the fair part of his readers.

"In the northern part of the same country are men five cubits long, who never spit—have no head ache, tooth ache, and rarely any other human infirmity. Their philosophers, called Gymnosophists, remain from morning to night staring at the sun, with eyes immovable, lifting their feet alternately from the burning sand, (so they make turkeys dance in Paris on a hot floor)—this is the sole occupation of their lives. There are others, who walk in the fire without injury." The author of this story is Apolonides, a Greek writer of great veracity.

"There are others, who bark like dogs, and live on vipers' flesh." These are said to be exceedingly jealous of each others' reputation for barking.

"There is a tribe in Asia, where the women have but one child, which is gray from its birth. Others of the same country have but one leg, and are of wonderful agility, surpassing all the inhabitants of the east in the art of hopping.

"In the interior of Ethiopia are a people, whose feet are immense, and in wet weather they lie on their backs and turn them up for umbrellas. To the west of these are a people without heads—distinguished for the excellence of their statesmen and tranquillity of their government. On the borders of this region is a tribe destitute of voice. They are, however, eminent as public speakers, having a kind of utterance resembling the sound of a saw." But a bad chorus for an opera.

"In the south of India is a tribe, of whom the males have feet a cubit long, and the females no feet at all—called the Struthopedes.

"The Megasthenes have no noses. At the source of the Ganges, also is a people, who have no mouths, called Atomones. Their bodies are covered with leaves and moss. They subsist on the odour of trees, of flowers, or apples, which they carry with them on a journey. Too strong odours give them indigestions of which they often die. There is also a small race in this country, who by day are blind, and (like certain modern critics) have eyes only to guard against the light.

"The Pigmies are three inches long. These people are of great antiquity and are mentioned by Homer. They are indefatigable, warlike, and extremely ambitious. Whole regiments seated on the backs of goats or rams, and armed with pikes, descended from the Trispithamian Mountains to the sea shore, committing horrible depredations among the eggs and young of the cranes, till at length these birds for mutual preservation formed an alliance and after long and dreadful hostilities, were vanquished and destroyed." Caricles, on a visit to this nation, counted to the number of three hundred villages. Their palaces, according to this author, are constructed of egg shells, and feathers, and cemented by the glutinous substance of the egg. Aristotle, however, avers that they reside in subterranean caverns. These are the people noticed by Milton—

"The small infantry, warr'd on by cranes."

"In those parts of India where there are no trees, the inhabitants are one hundred feet high. They live a thousand years, and always die in the bloom and vigour of youth. Others are old, and feeble, and gray-headed at their birth—towards the close of life, their cheeks become ruddy and their hair black as the raven's wing, and die in all the grace and strength of adolescence.

"In the deserts of Africa are a people who just appear and then vanish from sight—peep into the world, then peep out. It requires good eyes to see them as they pass through."

So you see, gentle reader, "nature has made strange fellows in her time." Of the remarkable ones mentioned by Pliny, we have not given you the twentieth part. Don't you wish Captain Hall had lived in those days?—What materials for a "Patchwork!"

Examination of Dr. Edwards's Treatise on the Will.

By Jeremiah Day, D. D., L.L.D., President of Yale College. New Haven: Durrie and Peck. Philadelphia: Smith and Peck, corner of Third and Arch streets, 1841.

Quite a rarity! A new book of thought—of close metaphysical reasoning; a book which exacts thought and compels reflection in the reader, and exhibits profound learning, study, and inquiry in the writer. Real, hard, close thinking has been out of fashion so long, that it seems like old times to receive a publication of this class; and it is quite refreshing to sit down for a few hours and lose one's self in following out these nice, abstract entities and quiddities of the metaphysicians. Formerly not only clergymen, but professional men, and men of letters and leisure, used to take an interest in the progress of philosophical inquiry and the advance of metaphysical science. But matter, not mind, is now attracting the regard of the learned as well as the busy; and but for the exertions of such men as President Day, the field of inquiry most interesting to an immortal being would be utterly abandoned.

The work before us will receive attention from the religious world, on account of its able discussion of the question, how far and in what manner reason and philosophy are to be applied to the explanation of the Scriptures. Other questions of a kindred nature, are incidentally brought forward, and ably and earnestly debated.

We commend President Day's work to the notice of all who are willing to submit to the labour of thought and reflection. Whether they subscribe to his theological dogmas or not, they will be pleased to recognise in him, a worthy commentator on the acknowledged Coryphæus of American metaphysicians, the renowned Jonathan Edwards.

Christ Our Example. By Caroline Fry, author of the Listener, &c. R. S. H. George, Philadelphia, 1841.

This excellent book of practical Christianity, is printed in very large type for the special accommodation of aged people, with whom it is understood to be a great favorite. The name of the author is so well known in her own useful department of religious literature, that it is always regarded as a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of any work appearing under its sanction.

The Kinemen, or the Black Riders of Congaree.—A Tale. By the author of Guy Rivers. Lea and Blanchard, Philadelphia, 1841.

Mr. Simms, having taken a longer time than usual for the writing of this novel, has produced an unusually fine one. He is an artist who can elaborate his productions to any degree he chooses, without impairing their breadth and freedom, or detracting from their general effect. His capabilities in description, narrative, and the development of individual character, appear to great advantage in the work before us, which was evidently composed in a genial season, and has its scene in the natural home of his genius, the sunny clime of the South. He may be truly denominated one of our happiest national novelists, as he always pays his own country the compliment of making its characters and history form the materials of his works.

Who shall be Greatest?—By Mary Howitt. New York. D. Appleton & Co. 1841.

This is a capital story; designed to show the folly of rivalry in equipage and style of living. The conversations and soliloquies of the rival ladies are inimitable. The opening part of the narrative is given in a style of grave banter which would do credit to Boz himself, who, all the world knows, is the phoenix of grave humourists—the writer of all others who keeps his countenance best, if we may so express ourselves, while he sets his readers all in a roar.

BULWER'S LAST WORK.

In our next we shall commence "Night and Morning," the latest production of the author of "Pelham," &c. &c. This work has the usual display of power, for which the author is so celebrated, and is free from many of the objectionable traits pervading his previous works. We hope to issue our next number on Saturday next.

PART I.

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY, 1841.

NO. 10.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY ADAM WALDIE & CO. No. 46 CARPENTER STREET, PHILADELPHIA. $5 for 60 numbers, payable in advance.

We commence this number with "Night and Morning," the new novel of Sir Edward Bulwer. This book is already much talked about; and seems to be more generally admired than any work of the kind, that has made its appearance for the last twelve-month. To us, it appears to be no way inferior to the very best of its predecessors, from the same hand. The story is of the most engaging interest, the characters well drawn, and the descriptions moral and physical, are powerfully written. However, it is not difficult to perceive in this, many of the defects from which none of Bulwer's productions are entirely free—to wit, the unskilful introduction of the episodes—scenes, incidents, and characters, are frequently forced upon the reader, which impede the action, and contribute nothing to the development of the catastrophe—and, again, the improbability of a man's associating with low and wicked people without becoming either vulgar or vicious. But, notwithstanding these considerable faults, we look upon this as the very best novel that we have read in a long time, and superior to several by the same ingenious author.

SPRING.

We cannot lift up our eyes, in this delightful season, without being tempted to ask, on what principle can we account for the beauty of Spring? Winter has shades as deep, and colours as brilliant; and the great forms of nature are substantially the same, through all the revolutions of the year. We shall seek in vain, therefore, in the accidents of mere organic matter, for the sources of that "vernal delight," which subject all finer spirits to an annual intoxication, and strike home the sense of beauty even to hearts that seem proof against it under all other respects. And it is not among the dead, but among the living, that this beauty originates. It is the renovation of life and joy to all animated beings, that constitutes the great jubilee of nature; the young of animals bursting into existence—the simple and universal pleasures which are diffused by the mere temperature of the air: and the profusion of sustenance—the pairing of birds—the cheerful resumption of rustic toils—the great alleviation of all the miseries of poverty and sickness—our sympathy with the young life, and the promise and the hazards of the vegetable creation—the solemn, yet cheering impression of the constancy of nature to her great periods of renovation—and the hopes that dart spontaneously forward into the new circle of exertions and enjoyments that is opened up by her hand and her example. Such are some of the conceptions that are forced upon us by the appearances of returning Spring, and that seem to account for the emotions of delight with which these appearances are hailed, by every mind endowed with any degree of sensibility, somewhat better than the brightness of colours, or the agreeableness of the smells, that are then presented to our senses.—Lord Jeffrey.

TWILIGHT.—By Mrs. NORTON.

It is the twilight hour,
The daylight toil is done,
And the last rays are departing
Of the cold and wintry sun:
It is the time when Friendship
Holds converse fair and free,
It is the time when children
Dance round the mother's knees.
But my soul is faint and heavy,
With a yearning sad and deep,
By the fireside lone and dreary
I sit me down and weep!
Where are ye, merry voices?
Whose clear and bird-like tone,
Some other ear now blesses,
Less anxious than my own!
Where are ye, steps of lightness,
Which fell like blossom showers?
Where are ye, sounds of laughter,
That cheer'd the pleasant hours?
Through the dim light slow declining,
Where my wistful glances fall,
I can see your pictures hanging
Against the silent wall;—
They gleam athwart the darkness,
With their sweet and changeless eyes,
But mute are ye, my children!
No voice to mine replies,
Where are ye? are ye playing
By the stranger's blazing hearth;
Forgetting in your gladness,
Your old home's former mirth!
Are ye dancing? are ye singing?
Are ye full of childish glee?
Or do your light hearts madden
With the memory of me?
Round whom, oh gentle darlings,
Do your young arms fondly twine,
Does she press you to her bosom
Who hath taken you from mine?
Oh! boys, the twilight hour
Such a heavy time hath grown,—
It recalls with such deep anguish
All I used to call my own,—
That the harshest word that ever
Was spoken to me there

Would be trivial—would be welcome,
In this depth of my despair!
Yet, no! Despair shall not sink,
While life and love remain,—
Tho' the weary struggle haunt me,
And my prayer be made in vain:
Tho' at times my spirit fail me,
And the bitter tear drops fall,
Tho' my lot be hard and lonely,
Yet I hope—I hope thro' all!

By the sudden joy which bounded
In the banish'd Hagar's heart,
When she saw the gushing fountain
From the sandy desert start;—
By the living smile which greeted
The lonely one of Nain,
When her long last watch was over,
And her hope seem'd wild and vain;
By all the tender mercy
God has shown to human grief
When fate or man's perverseness
Denied and barr'd relief,—
By the helpless woe which taught me
To look to Him alone,
From the vain appeals for justice
And wild efforts of my own,—
By the light—thou unseen future,
And thy tears—thou bitter past,
I will hope—tho' all forsake me
In His mercy to the last!

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR.

The Aberdeen Journal has recently published a letter, first written soon after the publication of Sir Walter Scott's "Tales of My Landlord," by a descendant of the Earl of Stair, stating that the original of the Bride of Lammermoor was the Hon. Janet Dalrymple, sister of the first Earl of Stair, in the time of William and Mary, and that she has always been spoken of in the family by the name of "The Bride of Baldoon." The lover to whom she had plighted her faith was Lord Rutherford, but her enforced husband was David Dunbar, eldest son of the Laird of Baldoon. On the wedding night young Baldoon was killed, not as Sir Walter has left it to be inferred, by the hands of his bride to free herself from her hateful fate, but by the lover who had secreted himself in the bridal chamber, and escaped by the window; the bridegroom obstinately refused, while he survived, to give an account of the fray; and the bride was found in the chimney corner a raving maniac; she refused all food, and died soon after; the only words she ever spoke are those recorded by Sir Walter Scott, "Ye has ta'en up your bonnie bridegroom." The general fidelity of the characters is admitted by the writer, except that he says justice is not done to the character of Lord Stair, under the guise of Sir William Ashton, and that the fictitious bridegroom is a much more respectable person than was the real one in young Baldoon.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING.

The delight of the court and the darling of the Muses; at least, such are the encomiums of his cotemporaries. He was the sweetest poet, the most refined gentleman, and perhaps the wildest and most reckless cavalier of the age in which he lived. There were many among the younger of Charles's followers, who, in proportion as the Puritans cropped their hair closer, and affected an increased sourness in their looks, considered it imperative on their part to add to the gaudiness of their attire, and to startle by the dissipation of their lives. Such may have been, in some degree, the case with Suckling; but, on the other hand, he had faults of the heart as well as of the age. There is fortunately some interest in the memoir of his life, though his reputation as a poet has faded in the eyes of posterity.

He was the son of Sir John Suckling, one of the principal secretaries of state in the reign of James, and who was afterwards a privy councillor, and comptroller of the household, in the reign of Charles. The father is spoken of as a person of great gravity, though Aubrey passes him over as a "dull fellow."

His son, the poet, according to Lloyd, was born at Witham, in Middlesex, in April, 1613. The writers, however, of the "Biographia Dramatica," without stating their authority, place his birth at Twickenham, in February, 1608-9. As his death is generally stated to have taken place either in his twenty-ninth or thirtieth year, the period to which Lloyd ascribes his birth is probably correct.* When only eleven years of age he was sent to Cambridge, where he remained three or four years, though, like most persons of a vivacious genius, he appears never to have taken a degree. He is said to have conversed in Latin when only five years old.

Shortly after leaving Cambridge, he set out on his travels over Europe, and eventually made a campaign under the celebrated Gustavus Adolphus, during which he was present in three battles and five sieges. He returned to England with somewhat of foreign effeminacy in his manners, but with an openness of heart, a sprightliness of conversation, and an utter recklessness of conduct, which distinguished him to the close of his career.

His agreeable discourse, and showy person, rendered him a great favourite at court. Aubrey styles him an "extraordinary and accomplished gentleman;" and adds, that "he was incomparably ready at repartee; and his wit was most sparkling when set upon and provoked." As long as his finances lasted, he presented a splendid figure at the court of Charles. His entertainments were costly in the extreme; and one of them is especially mentioned, to which only the young and the beautiful appear to have been invited, and where every rarity that gold could purchase met the eye, and gratified the taste, of his guest. The last service was fantastic enough: it consisted of silk stockings, gloves, and garters. When his play of "Aglaura" was acted at court, he thought proper to provide the splendid dresses of the actors out of his own purse. There was no tinsel, we are told, but all was "pure gold and silver." Such lavish expenditure would naturally reduce a moderate fortune to its lowest ebb; and after a time, we are informed, that there was not a single shopkeeper who would trust him with sixpence.

Probably he practised gaming, or rather the foul arts which insure success, to a greater extent than had hitherto been known in England. Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, declared to Pope, on the authority of Lady Dorset, that Suckling had contrived certain marks, known only to himself, to be affixed to all the cards that came from the principal makers in Paris. Like all who follow that most unhappy vice, he was affluent at one time and a beggar at another. However, he always affected the most splendour when in the greatest distress. He contended that it raised his spirits. He used to practise cards in bed.

He was a skilful player at bowls, at that time the most fashionable game in England. The great resort of the bowlers, and indeed of all the gay society of London, was the Peccadillo, a place then far removed from the bustle of the metropolis, but which has given a name to one of our principal streets, Piccadilly. On one occasion, we are told, his sisters followed him to this place, and, finding him engaged in his favourite pastime, entreated him, with tears in their eyes, not to risk their all. In his "Session of the Poets" Suckling himself alludes to his delight in the game:

Suckling was next called, but did not appear;
But strait one whispered Apollo i' the ear,
That of all men living he cared not for 't,
He loved not the Muses so well as his sport;
And prized black eyes and a lucky hit
At bowls, above all the trophies of wit.
And Apollo was angry, and publicly said—
'Twere fit that a fine were set on his head.

The goddess of his poetry was Lady Frances Cranfield, daughter of Lionel, first Earl of Middlesex, and wife of Richard Sackville, fifth Earl of Dorset. As she was only seventeen at the time of her marriage, it is probable that her intimacy with Suckling commenced after that event; she was, indeed, scarcely twenty-one when Suckling died. As Lady Dorset survived till 1692, (at which period she must have been in her seventy-third year,) she became the cotemporary of Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, to whom she related some of the scandal of former times. The duke told Pope, that so vain was she of her intimacy with Suckling, that she used herself to send to the printer the verses which he had addressed to her. He added, that she took a singular pride in boasting of the familiarities which had passed between them.

Aubrey mentions a Countess of Middlesex, with whom Suckling had been in love, and on whom he had squandered several thousand pounds. This must be a mistake. There was only one Countess of Middlesex, a cotemporary of Suckling, and, unhappily, that lady was the mother of his idol. As Lady Dorset, however, afterwards became sole heiress of her brother Lionel, third Earl of Middlesex, and as her son Charles eventually united the titles of Dorset and Middlesex in his own person, this close connection of names probably led Aubrey into the error. Lady Middlesex and Lady Dorset are undoubtedly the same person.

Notwithstanding his campaign under the great Gustavus, Suckling was but little formed for a soldier. A quarrel is recorded to have taken place between the poet and Sir John Digby, brother to Sir Kenelm, of which the origin was either a mistress or a dispute at a gaming-table. Suckling, supported by two or three friends, set upon Digby as he was leaving the theatre; a dastardly mode of revenge not unfrequently resorted to at the period. The poet was of a slight figure, while Digby was one of the most powerful men, and one of the best swordsmen in England. The latter, with only the aid of his servant, gallantly flew at his assailants, and the affray ended by his putting them to a disreputable flight.

In a letter from Mr. Gerrard to the Earl of Strafford, dated 10th November, 1634, the story of Suckling's adventure with Digby is differently related, but the circumstances are scarcely less discreditable to the unfortunate poet. The narration is a curious one, as throwing a light on the manners of the time. "I come now to arodomantado of such a nature as is scarce credible. Sir John Suckling, a young man, son to him that was comptroller, famous for nothing before, but that he was a great gamester, was a suitor to a daughter of Sir Henry Willoughby's, in Derbyshire, heir to a thousand a year. By some friend he had in court, he got the king to write for him to Sir Henry Willoughby, by which means he hoped to get her; for he thought he had interest enough in the affections of the young woman, so her father's consent could be got. He spoke somewhat boldly that way, which coming to her knowledge, she entreated a young gentleman, who also was her suitor, a brother of Sir Kenelm Digby's, to draw a paper in writing, which she dictated, and to get Sir John Suckling's hand unto it; therein he must disavow any interest he hath in her, either by promise or other ways. If he would undertake this, she said, it was the readiest way he could use to express his affection to her. He willingly undertakes it, gets another young man, a Digby, into his company, and having each of them a man, goes out upon this adventure, intending to come to London, where he thought to find him; but meeting Suckling on the way, he saluted him, and asked him whither he was going; he said on the king's business, but would not tell him whither, though he pressed him, if not to Sir Henry Willoughby's! He then drew forth his paper and read it to him, and pressed him to underwrite it; he would not, and with oaths confirms his denial. He told him he must force him to it. He answers, nothing could force him. Then he asked him whether he had any such promise from her as he gave out: in that he said he would not satisfy him. Mr. Digby then falls upon him with a cudgel, which being a yard long, he beat out upon him almost to an handful, he never offering to draw his sword; Suckling's two men standing by and looking on. Then comes in Philip Willoughby with his man, a proper gentleman, a man held stout, and of a very fair reputation, who was assistant to this Suckling in all his wooing business. Mr. Digby presses him also to avow by word of mouth, that Suckling had no such interest in his kinswoman as he pretended. He denies to do it; whereupon he struck him three or four blows on the face with his fist. They then cried out that they were the king's messengers, and that they should have some other time to speak with them. This report comes quickly to London; Sir Kenelm Digby comes to Hampton Court before the king comes up; to his friends there avows every particle of this business. Since, Suckling and Philip Willoughby are both in London, but they stir not. Also Sir Henry Willoughby and his daughter are come hither, Lawrence Whitaker being sent by the king for them. One affront he did them more, for finding them the next day after he

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

"Now rests our vicar. They who knew him best,
 Proclaim his life to have been entirely rest;
 Nor one so old has left this world of sin,
 More like the being that he entered in."—Crabbe.

In one of the Welsh counties is a small village called A——. It is somewhat removed from the high-road, and is, therefore, but little known to those luxurious amateurs of the picturesque who view Nature through the windows of a carriage and four. Nor, indeed, is there anything, whether of scenery or association, in the place itself, sufficient to allure the more sturdy enthusiast from the beaten tracks which tourists and guide-books prescribe to those who search the sublime and beautiful amid the mountain homes of the ancient Britons. Still, on the whole, the village is not without its attractions. It is placed in a small valley, through which winds and leaps, down many a rocky fall, a clear, babbling, noisy rivulet, that affords excellent sport to the brethren of the angle. Thither, accordingly, in the summer season, occasionally resort the Waltons of the neighbourhood—young farmers, retired traders, with now and then a stray artist, or a roving student from one of the universities. Hence the solitary hostelry of A——, being somewhat more frequented, is also more clean and comfortable than could be reasonably anticipated from the insignificance and remoteness of the village.

At the time in which my narrative opens, the village boasted a sociable, agreeable, careless, half-starved parson, who never failed to introduce himself to any of the anglers who, during the summer months, passed a day or two in the little valley. The Reverend Mr. Caleb Price had been educated at the University of Cambridge, where he had contrived, in three years, to run through a little fortune of £3500, without gaining in return any more valuable mental acquisitions than those of making the most admirable milk-punch, and becoming the most redoubted boxer in his college; or any more desirable reputation than that of being one of the best natured, rattling, open-hearted companions whom you could desire by your side in a tandem to Newmarket or in a row with the bargemen. He had not failed, by the help of these gifts and accomplishments, to find favour, while his money lasted, with the young aristocracy of the "Gentle Mother." And, though the very reverse of an ambitious or calculating man, he had certainly nourished the belief that some one of the hats or tinsel gowns—i.e., young lords or fellow-commoners, with whom he was on such excellent terms, and who supped with him so often—would do something for him in the way of a living. But it so happened that when Mr. Caleb Price had, with a little difficulty, scrambled through his degree, and found himself a Bachelor of Arts and at the end of his finances, his grand acquaintances parted from him to their various posts in the State-Militant of Life. And, with the exception of one, joyous and reckless as himself, Mr. Caleb Price found that, when money makes itself wings, it flies away with our friends. As poor Price had earned no academical distinction, so he could expect no advancement from his college—no fellowship—no tutorship leading hereafter to livings, stalls, and deaneries. Poverty began already to stare him in the face, when the only friend who, having shared his prosperity, remained true to his adverse fate—a friend, fortunately for him, of high connections and brilliant prospects—succeeded in obtaining for him the humble living of A——. To this primitive spot the once jovial roister cheerfully retired—contrived to live contented upon an income somewhat less than he had formerly given to his groom—preached very short sermons to a very scanty and ignorant congregation, some of whom only understood Welsh—did good to the poor and sick in his own careless, slovenly way—and, uncheered or unvexed by wife and children, he rose in summer with the lark, and in winter went to bed at nine precisely, to save coals and candles. For the rest, he was the most skilful angler in the whole county; and so willing to communicate the results of his experience as to the most taking colour of the flies and the most favoured haunts of the trout, that he had given especial orders at the inn, that whenever any strange gentleman came to fish, Mr. Caleb Price should be immediately sent for. In this, to be sure, our worthy pastor had his usual recompense. First, if the stranger were tolerably liberal, Mr. Price was asked to dinner at the inn; and, secondly, if this failed, from the poverty or churlishness of the obliged party, Mr. Price still had an opportunity to hear the last news—to talk about the Great World—in a word, to exchange ideas, and perhaps to get an old newspaper or an odd number of a magazine.

Now it so happened that, one afternoon in October, when the periodical excursions of the anglers, becoming rarer and more rare, had altogether ceased, Mr. Caleb Price was summoned from his parlour, in which he had been employed in the fabrication of a net for his cabbages, by a little white-headed boy, who came to say there was a gentleman at the inn who wished immediately to see him; a strange gentleman, who had never been there before.

Mr. Price threw down his net, seized his hat, and in less than five minutes he was in the best room of the little inn.

The person there awaiting him was a man who, though plainly clad in a velvetene shooting-jacket, had an air and mien greatly above those common to the pedestrian visitors of A——. He was tall, and of one of those athletic forms in which vigour in youth is too often purchased by corpulence in age. At this period, however, in the full prime of manhood, the ample chest and sinewy limbs, seen to full advantage in their simple and manly dress, could not fail to excite that popular admiration which is always given to strength in the one sex as to delicacy in the other. The stranger was walking impatiently to and fro the small apartment when Mr. Price entered; and then, turning to the clergyman a countenance handsome and striking, but yet more prepossessing from its expression of frankness than from the regularity of its features, he stopped short, held out his hand, and said, with a gay laugh, as he glanced over the parson's threadbare and slovenly costume, "My poor Caleb! what a metamorphosis! I should not have known you again!"

"What! you! Is it possible, my dear fellow? How glad I am to see you! What on earth can bring you to such a place? No! not a soul would believe me if I said I had seen you in this miserable hole."

"That is precisely the reason why I am here. Sit down, Caleb, and we'll talk over matters as soon as our landlord has brought up the materials for—"

"The milk-punch," interrupted Mr. Price, rubbing his hands. "Ah, that will bring us back to old times indeed!"

In a few minutes the punch was prepared, and, after two or three preparatory glasses, the stranger thus commenced:

"My dear Caleb, I am in want of your assistance, and, above all, of your secrecy."

"I promise you both beforehand. It will make me happy the rest of my life to think I have served my patron—my benefactor—the only friend I possess."

"Tush, man! don't talk of that: we shall do better for you one of these days. But now to the point: I have come here to be married—married, old boy!—married!"

And the stranger threw himself back in his chair, and chuckled with the glee of a school-boy.

"Humph!" said the parson, gravely. "It is a serious thing to do, and a very odd place to come to."

"I admit both propositions: this punch is superb. To proceed. You know that my uncle's immense fortune is at his own disposal; if I disoblige him, he would be capable of leaving all to my brother. I should disoblige him irrevocably if he knew that I had married a tradesman's daughter. I am going to marry a tradesman's daughter—a girl in a million! The ceremony must be as secret as possible. And in this church, with you for the priest, I do not see a chance of discovery."

"Do you marry by licence?"

"No; my intended is not of age; and we keep the secret even from her father. In this village you will mumble over the bans without one of your congregation ever taking heed of the name. I shall stay here a month for the purpose. She is in London, on a visit to a relation in the city. The bans on her side will be published with equal privacy in a little church near the Tower, where my name will be no less unknown than here. Oh, I've contrived it famously!"

"But, my dear fellow, consider what you risk."

"I have considered all, and find every chance in my favour. The bride will arrive here on the day of our wedding: my servant will be one witness; some stupid old Welshman, as antediluvian as possible—I leave it to you to select him—shall be the other. My servant I shall dispose of, and the rest I can depend on."

"But—"

"I detest buts; if I had to make a language, I would not admit such a word in it. And now, before I run on upon Catharine, a subject quite inexhaustible, tell me, my dear friend, something about yourself."

* * * * *

Somewhat more than a month had elapsed since the arrival of the stranger at the village inn. He had changed his quarters for the parsonage; went out but little, and then chiefly on foot-excursions among the sequestered hills in the neighbourhood: he was, therefore, but partially known by sight even in the village; and the visit of some old college friend to the minister, though indeed it had never chanced before, was not, in itself, so remarkable an event as to excite any particular observation. The bans had been duly, and half inaudibly, hurried over, after the service was concluded, and while the scanty congregation were dispersing down the little aisle of the church, when one morning a chaise and pair arrived at the parsonage. A servant out of livery leaped from the box. The stranger opened the door of the chaise, and uttering a joyous exclamation, gave his arm to a lady, who, trembling and agitated, could scarcely, even with that stalwart support, descend the steps. "Ah!" she said, in a voice choked with tears, when they found themselves alone in the little parlour, "ah! if you knew how I have suffered!"

How is it that certain words, and those the homeliest—which the hand writes and the eye reads as trite and commonplace expressions—when spoken, convey so much—so many meanings complicated and refined? "Ah, if you knew how I have suffered!"

When the lover heard these words, his gay countenance fell—he drew back—his conscience smote him: in that complaint was the whole history of a clandestine love—not for both the parties, but for the woman—the painful secrecy—the remorseful deceit—the shame—the fear—the sacrifice. She who uttered those words was scarcely sixteen. It is an early age to leave childhood behind for ever!

"My own love! you have suffered indeed; but it is over now."

"Over! And what will they say of me—what will they think of me at home? Over! Ah!"

"It is but for a short time, in the course of nature, my uncle cannot live long: all then will be explained. Our marriage once made public, all connected with you will be proud to own you. You will have wealth—station—a name among the first in the gentry of England. But, above all, you will have the happiness to think that your forbearance for a time has saved me, and, it may be, our children, sweet one! from poverty and—"

"It is enough," interrupted the girl: and the expression of her countenance became serene and elevated. "It is for you—for your sake. I know what you hazard: how much I must owe you! Forgive me; this is the last murmur you shall ever hear from these lips."

An hour after those words were spoken the marriage ceremony was concluded.

"Caleb," said the bridegroom, drawing the clergyman aside as they were about to re-enter the house, "you will keep your promise, I know; and you think I may depend implicitly upon the good faith of the witness you have selected?"

"Upon his good faith?—no," said Caleb, smiling: "but upon his deafness, his ignorance, and his age. My poor old clerk! he will have forgotten all about it before this day three months. Now I have seen your lady, I no longer wonder that you incur so great a risk. I never beheld so lovely a countenance. You will be happy!" And the village priest sighed, and thought of the coming winter and his own lonely hearth.

"My dear friend, you have only seen her beauty: it is her least charm. Heaven knows how often I have made love—and this is the only woman that I have ever really loved. Caleb, there is an excellent living that adjoins my uncle's house. The rector is old; when the house is mine, you will not be long without the living. We shall be neighbours, Caleb, and then you shall try and find a bride for yourself. Smith"—and the bridegroom turned to the servant who had accompanied his wife, and served as a second witness to the marriage—"tell the postboy to put to the horses immediately."

"Yes, sir. May I speak a word with you?"

"Well, what!"

"Your uncle, sir, sent for me to come to him the day before we left town."

"Aha! indeed!"

"And I could just pick up among his servants that he had some suspicion—at least, that he had been making inquiries—and seemed very cross, sir."

"You went to him?"

"No, sir, I was afraid. He has such a way with him! Whenever his eye is fixed on mine, I always feel as if it was impossible to tell a lie; and—and—in short, I thought it was best not to go."

"You did right. Confound this fellow!" muttered the bridegroom, turning away; "he is honest, and loves me; yet, if my uncle sees him, he is clumsy enough to betray all. Well, I always meant to get him out of the way—the sooner the better. Smith!"

"Yes, sir!"

"You have often said that you should like, if you had some capital, to settle in Australia—your father is an excellent farmer—you are above the situation you hold with me—you are well educated, and have some knowledge of agriculture—you can scarcely fail to make a fortune as a settler; and, if you are of the same mind still, why, look you, I have just £1000 at my banker's: you shall have half if you like to sail by the first packet."

"Oh, sir, you are too generous."

"Nonsense; no thanks—I am more prudent than generous; for I agree with you that it is all up with me if my uncle gets hold of you. I dread my prying brother, too; in fact the obligation is on my side: only stay abroad till I am a rich man and my marriage made public, and then you may ask of me what you will. It's agreed, then—order the horses—we'll go round by Liverpool, and learn about the vessels. By the way, my good fellow, I hope you see nothing now of that good-for-nothing brother of yours?"

"No, indeed, sir. It's a thousand pities he has turned out so ill, for he was the cleverest of the family, and could always twist me round his little finger."

"That's the very reason I mentioned him. If he learned our secret, he would take it to an excellent market. Where is he?"

"Hiding, I suspect, sir."

"Well, we shall put the sea between you: so now all's safe."

Caleb stood by the porch of his house as the bride and bridegroom entered their humble vehicle. Though then November, the day was exquisitely mild and calm, the sky without a cloud, and even the leafless trees seemed to smile beneath the cheerful sun. And the young bride wept no more: she was with him she loved—she was his for ever. She forgot the rest. The hope—the heart of sixteen—spoke brightly out through the blushes that mantled over her fair cheeks. The bridegroom's frank and manly countenance was radiant with joy. As he waved his hand to Caleb from the window, the postboy cracked his whip, the servant settled himself on the dickey, the horses started off in a brisk trot—the clergyman was left alone!

To be married is certainly an event in life; to marry other people is, for a priest, a very ordinary occurrence; and yet, from that day, a great change began to operate in the spirits and the habits of Caleb Price. Have you ever, my gentle reader, buried yourself for some time quietly in the lazy ease of a dull country life? Have you ever become gradually accustomed to its monotony and inured to its solitude; and, just at the time when you have half forgotten the great world—that mare magnum that frets and roars in the distance—have you ever received in your calm retreat some visiter, full of the busy and excited life which you imagined yourself contented to relinquish? If so, have you not perceived that, in proportion as his presence and communication either revived old memories, or brought before you new pictures of "the bright tumult" of that existence of which your guest made a part, you began to compare him curiously with yourself; you began to feel that what before was to rest is now to rot; that your years are gliding from you unenjoyed and wasted; that the contrast between the animal life of passionate civilisation and the vegetable torpor of motionless seclusion is one that, if you are still young, it tasks your philosophy to bear—feeling all the while that the torpor may be yours to your grave? And when your guest has left you, when you are again alone, is the solitude the same as it was before!

Our poor Caleb had for years rooted his thoughts to his village. His guest had been, like the bird in the fairy tale, settling upon the quiet branches, and singing so loudly and so gladly of the enchanted skies afar, that, when it flew away the tree pined, nipped and withering in the sober sun in which before it had basked contented. The guest was, indeed, one of those men whose animal spirits exercise upon such as come within their circle the influence and power usually ascribed only to intellectual qualities. During the month he had sojourned with Caleb, he had brought back to the poor parson all the gaiety of the brisk and noisy novitiate that preceded the solemn vow and the dull retreat: the social parties, the merry suppers, the open-handed, open-hearted fellowship of riotous, delightful extravagant, thoughtless youth. And Caleb was not a bookman—not a scholar; he had no resources in himself, no occupation but his indolent and ill-paid duties. The emotions, therefore, of the active man were easily aroused within him. But if this comparison between his past and present life rendered him restless and disturbed, how much more deeply and lastingly was he affected by a contrast between his own future and that of his friend! not in those points where he could never hope equality—wealth and station—the conventional distinctions to which, after all, a man of ordinary sense must sooner or later reconcile himself—but in that one respect wherein all, high and low, pretend to the same rights; rights which a man of moderate warmth of feeling can never willingly renounce, viz: a partner in a lot however obscure; a kind face by a hearth, no matter how mean it be! And his happier friend, like all men full of life, was full of himself—full of his love, of his future, of the blessings of home, and wife, and children. Then, too, the young bride seemed so fair, so confiding, and so tender; so formed to grace the noblest or to cheer the humblest home! And both were so happy, so all in all to each other, as they left that barren threshold! And the priest felt all this as, melancholy and envious, he turned from the door in that November day to find himself thoroughly alone. He now began seriously to muse upon those fancied blessings which men wearied with celibacy see springing heavenward behind the altar. A few weeks afterward a notable change was visible in the good man's exterior. He became more careful of his dress—he shaved every morning—he purchased a croppered Welsh cob—and it was soon known in the neighbourhood that the only journey the cob was condemned to take was to the house of a certain squire, who, amid a family of all ages, boasted two very pretty marriageable daughters. That was the second holyday-time of poor Caleb—the love romances of his life: it soon closed. On learning the amount of the pastor's stipend, the squire refused to receive his addresses; and, shortly after, the girl to whom he had attached himself made what the world calls a happy match. And perhaps it was one, for I never heard that she regretted the forsaken lover. Perhaps Caleb was not one of those whose place in a woman's heart is never to be supplied. The lady married, the world went round as before, the brook danced as merrily through the village, the poor worked the week-days, and the urchins gambolled round the gravestones on the Sabbath, and the curate's heart was broken. He languished gradually and silently away. The villagers observed that he had lost his old good-humoured smile—that he did not stop every Saturday evening at the carrier's gate, to ask if there were any news stirring in the town which the carrier weekly visited—that he did not come to borrow the stray newspapers that now and then found their way into the village—that, as he sauntered along the brook-side, his clothes hung loose on his limbs—and that he no longer "whistled as he went:" alas! he was no longer in want of thought. By degrees, the walks themselves were suspended; the parson was no longer visible: a stranger performed his duties.

One day—it might be some three years after the fatal visit I have commemorated—one very wild, rough day in early March, the postman who made the round of the district rung at the parson's bell. The single, female servant, her red hair loose in her neck, replied to the call.

"And how is the master?"

"Very bad;" and the girl wiped her eyes.

"He should leave you something handsome," remarked the postman, kindly, as he pocketed the money for the letter.

The pastor was in bed: the boisterous wind rattled down the chimney, and shook the ill-fitting casement in its rotting frame. The clothes he had last worn were thrown carelessly about, unsmoothed, unbrushed; the scanty articles of furniture were out of their proper places: slovenly discomfort marked the death-chamber. And by the bedside stood a neighbouring clergyman, a stout, rustic, homely, thoroughly Welsh priest, who might have sat for the portrait of Parson Adams.

"Here's a letter for you," said the visitor.

"For me!" echoed Caleb, feebly. "Ah! well; is it not very dark, or are my eyes failing?" The clergyman and the servant drew aside the curtains and propped the sick man up: he read as follows, slowly and with difficulty:

"Dear Caleb,—At last I can do something for you. A friend of mine, has a living in his gift just vacant, worth, I understand, from three to four hundred a year; pleasant neighbourhood—small parish. And my friend keeps the hounds!—just the thing for you. He is, however, a very particular sort of person—wants a companion, and has a horror of anything evangelical—wishes, therefore, to see you before he decides. If you can meet me in London some day next month, I'll present you to him, and I have no doubt it will be settled. You must think it strange I never wrote to you since we parted, but you know I never was a very good correspondent; and as I had nothing to communicate advantageous to you, I thought it a sort of insult to enlarge on my own happiness, and so forth. All I shall say on that score is, that I've sown my wild oats; and that you may take my word for it, there's nothing that can make a man know how large the heart is, and how little the world, till he comes home (perhaps after a hard day's hunting), and sees his own fireside, and hears one dear welcome; and—oh, by the way, Caleb, if you could but see my boy, the sturdiest little rogue! But enough of this. All that vexes me is, that I've never yet been able to declare my marriage; my uncle, however, suspects nothing: my wife bears up against all, like an angel as she is; still, in the case of any accident, it occurs to me, now I'm writing to you, especially if you leave the place, that it may be as well to send me an examined copy of the register. In those remote places registers are often lost or mislaid; and it may be useful hereafter, when I proclaim the marriage, to clear up all doubt as to the fact.

"Good-bye, old fellow,

"Yours most truly," &c. &c.

"It comes too late," sighed Caleb, heavily, and the letter fell from his hands. There was a long pause. "Close the shutters," said the sick man at last; I think I could sleep: and—and—pick up that letter."

With a trembling but eager gripe, he seized the paper as a miser would seize the deeds of an estate on which he has a mortgage. He smoothed the folds, looked complacently at the well-known hand, smiled—a ghastly smile!—and then placed the letter under his pillow and sank down: they left him alone. He did not wake for some hours, and that good clergyman, poor as himself, was again at his post. The only friendships that are really with us in the hour of need are those which are cemented by equality of circumstance. In the depths of home, in the hour of tribulation, by the bed of death, the rich and the poor are seldom found side by side. Caleb was evidently much feebler, but his sense seemed clearer than it had been, and the instincts of his native kindness were the last that left him. "There is something he wants me to do for him," he muttered. "Ah! I remember: Jones, will you send for the parish register? It is somewhere in the vestry-room, I think—but nothing's kept properly. Better go yourself—its important."

Mr. Jones nodded, and sallied forth. The register was not in the vestry; the churchwardens knew nothing about it; the clerk, a new clerk who also was the sexton, and rather a wild fellow, had gone ten miles off to a wedding; every place was searched; till, at last, the book was found, amid a heap of old magazines and dusty papers, in the parlour of Caleb himself. By the time it was brought to him, the sufferer was fast declining; with some difficulty his dim eye discovered the place where, amid the pothooks of the parishioners, the large, clear hand of his old friend, and the trembling characters of the bride, looked forth distinguished.

"Extract this for me, will you?" said Caleb. Mr. Jones obeyed.

"Now just write above the extract:

"Sir,—By Mr. Price's desire I send you the enclosed. He is too ill to write himself. But he bids me say that he has never been quite the same man since you left him; and that, if he should not get well again, still your kind letter has made him easier in his mind."

Caleb stopped.

"Go on."

"That is all I have to say: sign your name, and put the address—here it is. "Ah, the letter," he muttered, "must not lie about! If any thing happen to me, it may get him into trouble."

And as Mr. Jones sealed his communication, Caleb feebly stretched his wan hand, and held the letter which had "come too late" over the flame of the candle. As the paper dropped on the carpetless floor, Mr. Jones prudently set thereon the broad sole of his top-boot, and the maid-servant brushed it into the grate.

"Ah, trample it out; hurry it among the ashes. The last as the rest," said Caleb, hoarsely. "Friendship, fortune, hope, love, life—a little flame, and then—and then—"

"Don't be uneasy—it's quite out!" said Mr. Jones.

Caleb turned his face to the wall. He lingered till the next day, when he passed insensibly from sleep to death. As soon as the breath was out of his body, Mr. Jones felt that his duty was discharged—that other duties called him home. He promised to return to read the burial service over the deceased, gave some hasty orders about the plain funeral, and was turning from the room, when he saw the letter he had written by Caleb's wish still on the table. "I pass the postoffice—I'll put it in," said he to the weeping servant; "and just give me that scrap of paper." So he wrote on the scrap, "P. S. He died this morning at half past twelve, without pain.—R. J.;" and, without the trouble of breaking the seal, thrust the final bulletin into the folds of the letter, which he then carefully placed in his vast pocket and safely transferred to the post. And that was all that the jovial and happy man to whom the letter was addressed ever heard of the last days of his college friend.

The living vacant by the death of Caleb Price was not so valuable as to plague the patron with many applications. It continued vacant nearly the whole of the six months prescribed by law. And the desolate parsonage was committed to the charge of one of the villagers, who had occasionally assisted Caleb in the care of his little garden. The villager, his wife, and half a dozen noisy, ragged children, took possession of the quiet bachelor's abode. The furniture had been sold to pay the expenses of the funeral and a few trifling bills; and, save the kitchen and the two attics, the empty house, uninhabited, was surrendered to the sportive mischief of the idle urchins, who prowled about the silent chambers in fear of the silence and in ecstasy at the space. The bedroom in which Caleb had died was, indeed, long held sacred by infantine superstition. But, one day, the eldest boy having ventured across the threshold, two cupboards, the doors standing ajar, attracted the child's curiosity. He opened one, and his exclamation soon brought the rest of the children round him. Have you ever, reader, when a boy, suddenly stumbled on that El Dorado, called by the grown-up folks a lumber-room? Lumber, indeed! what Virtù double locks in cabinets is the real lumber to the boy! Lumber, reader, to thee it was a treasury! Now this cupboard had been the lumber-room in Caleb's household. In an instant the whole troop had thrown themselves on the motley contents. Stray joints of clumsy fishing-rods—artificial baits—a pair of worn-out top-boots, in which one of the urchins, whooping and shouting buried himself up to the middle—moth-eaten, stained, and ragged, the collegian's gown: relic of the dead man's palmy time—a bag of carpenter's tools, chiefly broken—a cricket-bat—an odd boxing-glove—a fencing foil, snapped in the middle—and more than all, some half-finished attempts at rude toys: a boat, a cart, a doll's house, in which the good natured Caleb had busied himself for the younger ones of that family in which he had found the fatal ideal of his trite life. One by one were these lugged forth from their dusty slumber—profane hands struggling for the first right of appropriation. And now, revealed against the wall, glared upon the startled violators of the sanctuary, with glassy eyes and horrent visage, a grim monster. They huddled back one upon the other, pale and breathless, till the eldest, seeing that the creature moved not, took heart—approached on tiptoe—twice receded, and twice again advanced, and finally drew out, daubed, painted, and tricked forth in the semblance of a griffin, a gigantic kite?

The children, alas! were not old and wise enough to know all the dormant value of that imprisoned aeronaut, which had cost poor Caleb many a dull evening's labour—the intended gift to the false one's favourite brother. But they guessed that it was a thing or spirit appertaining of right to them; and they resolved, after mature consultation, to impart the secret of their discovery to an old wooden legged villager who had served in the army, who was the idol of all the children of the place; and who, they firmly believed, knew every thing under the sun except the mystical arts of reading and writing. Accordingly, having seen that the coast was clear—for they considered their parents (as the children of the hard working often do) the natural foes to amusement—they carried the monster into an old outhouse, and ran to the veteran to beg him to come up slyly and inspect its properties.

Three months after this memorable event arrived the new pastor: a slim, prim, orderly, and starch young man, framed by nature and trained by practice to bear a great deal of solitude and starving. Two loving couples had waited to be married till His Reverence should arrive. The ceremony performed, where was the registry book? The vestry was searched, the churchwardens interrogated; the gay clerk, who, on the demise of his deaf predecessor, had come into office a little before Caleb's last illness, had a dim recollection of having taken the registry up to Mr. Price at the time the vestry room was whitewashed. The house was searched; the cupboard, the mysterious cupboard, was explored. "Here it is, sir!" cried the clerk; and he pounced upon a pale parchment volume. The thin clergyman opened it, and recoiled in dismay: more than three fourths of the leaves had been torn out.

"It is the moths, sir," said the gardener's wife, who had not yet removed from the house.

The clergyman looked round: one of the children was trembling. "What have you done to this book, little one?"

"That book?—the—hi!—hi!—"

"Speak the truth, and you sha'n't be punished."

"I did not know it was any harm—hi!—hi!—"

"Well, and—"

"And old Ben helped us."

"Well!"

"And—and—and—hi!—hi!—The tail of the kite, sir!—"

"Where is the kite?"

Alas! the kite and its tail were long ago gone to that undiscovered limbo, where all things lost, broken, vanished, and destroyed—things that lose themselves, for servants are too honest to steal: things that break themselves, for servants are too careful to break—find an everlasting and impenetrable refuge.

"It does not signify a pin's head," said the clerk; "the parish must find a new 'un!"

"It is no fault of mine," said the pastor. "Are my chops ready?"

CHAPTER II.

"And soothed with idle dreams the Frowning fate."—CRASSÉ.

"Why does not my father come back? What a time he has been away!"

"My dear Philip, business detains him: but he will be here in a few days—perhaps to-day!"

"I should like him to see how much I am improved."

"Improved in what, Philip?" said the mother, with a smile. "Not Latin, I am sure; for I have not seen you open a book since you insisted on poor Todd's dismissal."

"Todd! Oh, he was such a scrub, and spoke through his nose: what could he know of Latin?"

"More than you ever will, I fear, unless—" and here there was a certain hesitation in the mother's voice, "unless your father consents to your going to school."

"Well, I should like to go to Eton! That's the only school for a gentleman. I've heard my father say so."

"Philip, you are too proud."

"Proud! You often call me proud, but then you kiss me when you do so. Kiss me now, mother."

The lady drew her son to her breast, put aside the clustering hair from his forehead, and kissed him; but the kiss was sad, and a moment after she pushed him away gently, and muttered, unconscious that she was overheard.

"If, after all, my devotion to the father should wrong the children!"

The boy started, and a cloud passed over his brow; but he said nothing. A light step entered the room through the French casements that opened on the lawn, and the mother turned to her youngest-born, and her eye brightened.

"Mamma! mamma! here is a letter for you. I snatched it from John: it is papa's handwriting."

The lady uttered a joyous exclamation, and seized the letter. The younger child nestled himself on a stool at her feet, looking up while she read it; the elder stood apart, leaning on his gun, and with something of thought, even of gloom upon his countenance.

There was a strong contrast in the two children. The elder, who was about fifteen, seemed older than he was, not only from his height, but from the darkness of his complexion, and a certain proud, nay, imperious expression upon features that, without having the soft and fluent graces of childhood, were yet regular and striking. His dark green shooting-dress, with the belt and pouch; the cap, with its gold tassel set upon his luxuriant curls, which had the purple gloss of the raven's plume, blended, perhaps, something prematurely manly in his own tastes with the love of the fantastic, and the picturesque which bespeaks the presiding genius of the proud mother. The younger son had scarcely told his ninth year; and the soft auburn ringlets, descending half way down the shoulders; the rich and delicate bloom that exhibits at once the hardy health and the gentle fostering; the large, deep blue eyes; the flexile and almost effeminate contour of the harmonious features, altogether made such an ideal of childlike beauty as Lawrence had loved to paint or Chantrey model.

And the daintiest cares of a mother, who, as yet, has her darling all to herself—her toy, her plaything—were visible in the large falling collar of finest cambric, and the blue velvet dress, with its filigree buttons and embroidered sash. Both the boys had about them the air of those whom Fate ushers blandly into life: the air of wealth, and birth, and luxury, spoiled and pampered as if earth had no thorn for their feet, and heaven not a wind to visit their young cheeks too roughly. The mother had been extremely handsome, and though the first bloom of youth was now gone, she had still the beauty that might captivate new love: an easier task than to retain the old. Both her sons, though differing from each other, resembled her. She had the features of the younger; and probably any one who had seen her in her own earlier youth, would have recognised in that child's gay, yet gentle countenance, the mirror of the mother when a girl. Now, however, especially when silent or thoughtful, the expression of her face was rather that of the elder boy; the cheek, once so rosy, was now pale, though clear, with something which time had given, of pride and thought, in the curved lip and the high forehead. They who could have looked on her in her more lonely hours, might have seen that the pride had known shame, and the thought was the shadow of the passions of fear and sorrow.

But now, as she read those hasty, brief, but well-remembered characters—read as one whose heart was in her eyes—joy and triumph alone were visible in that eloquent countenance. Her eyes flashed, her breast heaved; and at length, clasping the letter to her lips, she kissed it again and again with passionate transport. Then, as her eyes met the dark, inquiring, earnest gaze of her eldest born, she flung her arms round him and wept vehemently.

"What is the matter, mamma, dear mamma?" said the youngest, pushing himself between Philip and his mother.

"Your father is coming back this day—this very hour; and you—you—child—you, Philip—" Here sobs broke in upon her words, and left her speechless.

The letter that had produced this effect ran as follows:

"To MRS. MORTON, Fernside Cottage.

"Dearest Kate,—My last letter prepared you for the news I have now to relate—my poor uncle is no more. Though I have seen so little of him, especially of late years, his death sensibly affected me: but I have at least the consolation of thinking that there is nothing now to prevent my doing justice to you. I am the sole heir to his fortune. I have it in my power, dearest

Kate, to offer you a tardy recompense for all you have put up with for my sake; a sacred testimony to your long forbearance, your unapproachable love, your wrongs, and your devotion. Our children, too—my noble Philip—kiss them, Kate—kiss them for me a thousand times.

"I write in great haste; the burial is just over, and my letter will only serve to announce my return. My darling Catharine, I shall be with you almost as soon as these lines meet your eyes—those dear eyes, that, for all the tears they have shed for my faults and follies, have never looked the less kind.

"Yours, ever as ever, PHILIP BEAUFORT."

This letter has told its tale, and little remains to explain. Philip Beaufort was one of those men of whom there are many in his peculiar class of society—easy, thoughtless, good-humoured, generous, with feelings infinitely better than his principles.

Inheriting himself but a moderate fortune, which was three parts in the hands of the Jews before he was twenty-five, he had the most brilliant expectations from his uncle; an old bachelor, who, from a courtier, had turned a misanthrope; cold, shrewd, penetrating, worldly, sarcastic, and imperious; and from this relation he received, meanwhile, a handsome, and, indeed, munificent allowance. About sixteen years before the date at which this narrative opens, Philip Beaufort had "run off," as the saying is, with Catharine Morton, then little more than a child—a motherless child—educated at a boarding-school to notions and desires far beyond her station; for she was the daughter of a provincial tradesman. And Philip Beaufort, in the prime of life, was possessed of most of the qualities that dazzle the eyes, and many of the arts that betray the affections. It was suspected by some that they were privately married: if so, the secret had been closely kept, and baffled all the inquiries of the stern old uncle. Still there was much, not only in the manner, at once modest and dignified, but in the character of Catharine, which was proud and high-spirited, to give colour to the suspicion. Beaufort, a man naturally careless of forms, paid her a marked and punctilious respect; and his attachment was evidently one, not only of passion, but of confidence and esteem. Time developed in her mental qualities far superior to those of Beaufort; and for these she had ample leisure of cultivation. To the influence derived from her mind and person she added that of a frank, affectionate, and winning disposition; their children cemented the bond between them. Mr. Beaufort was passionately attached to field-sports. He lived the greater part of the year with Catharine at the beautiful cottage, to which he had built hunting-stables that were the admiration of the county; and, though the cottage was near to London, the pleasures of the metropolis seldom allured him for more than a few days—generally but a few hours—at a time; and he always hurried back with renewed relish to what he considered his home.

Whatever the connection between Catharine and himself (and of the true nature of that connection, the introductory chapter has made the reader more enlightened than the world), her influence had at least weaned from all excesses, and many follies, a man who, before he knew her, had seemed likely, from the extreme joviality and carelessness of his nature, and a very imperfect education, to contract whatever vices were most in fashion as preservatives against ennui. And if their union had been openly hallowed by the church, Philip Beaufort had been universally esteemed the model of a tender husband and a fond father. Ever, as he became more and more acquainted with Catharine's natural good qualities, and more and more attached to his home, had Mr. Beaufort, with the generosity of true affection, desired to remove from her the pain of an equivocal condition by a public marriage. But Mr. Beaufort, though generous, was not free from the worldliness which had met him everywhere amid the society in which his youth had been spent. His uncle, the head of one of those families which yearly vanish from the commonality into the peerage, but which once formed a distinguished peculiarity in the aristocracy of England—families of ancient birth, immense possessions, at once noble and untitled—held his estates by no other tenure than his own caprice. Though he professed to like Philip, yet he saw but little of him. When the news of the illicit connection his nephew was reported to have formed reached him, he at first resolved to break it off; but, observing that Philip no longer gambled nor run in debt, and had retired from the turf to the safer and more economical pastimes of the field, he contented himself with inquiries which satisfied him that Philip was not married; and perhaps he thought it, on the whole, more prudent to wink at an error that was not attended by the bills which had heretofore characterised the human infirmities of his reckless nephew. He took care, however, incidentally, and in reference to some scandal of the day, to pronounce his opinion, not upon the fault, but upon the only mode of repairing it.

"If ever," said he, and he looked grimly at Philip while he spoke, "a gentleman were to disgrace his ancestry by introducing into his family one whom his own sister could not receive at her house, why, he ought to sink to her level, and wealth would but make his disgrace the more notorious. If I had an only son, and that son were booby enough to do any thing so discreditable as to marry beneath him, I would rather have my footman for my successor. You understand, Phil?"

Philip did understand, and looked round at the noble house and the stately park, and his generosity was not equal to the trial. Catharine—so great was her power over him—might, perhaps, have easily triumphed over his more selfish calculations; but her love was too delicate ever to breathe, of itself, the hope that lay deepest at her heart. And her children!—ah! for them she pined, but for them she also hoped. Before them was a long future; and she had all confidence in Philip. Of late, there had been considerable doubts how far the elder Beaufort would realise the expectations in which his nephew had been reared. Philip's younger brother had been much with the old gentleman, and appeared to be in high favour; this brother was a man in every respect the opposite to Philip: sober, supple, decorous, ambitious, with a face of smiles and a heart of ice.

But the old gentleman was taken dangerously ill, and Philip was summoned to his bed of death. Robert, the younger brother, was there also, with his wife (for he had married prudently) and his children—he had two, a son and daughter. Not a word did the uncle say as to the disposition of his property till an hour before he died. And then, turning in his bed, he looked first at one nephew, then at the other, and faltered out,

"Philip, you are a scapegrace, but a gentleman: Robert, you are a careful, sober, plausible man, and it is a great pity you were not in business: you would have made a fortune!—you won't inherit one, though you think it: I have marked you, sir. Philip, beware of your brother. Now let me see the parson."

The old man died, the will was read, and Philip succeeded to a rental of £20,000 a year; Robert to a diamond ring, a gold repeater, £5000, and a curious collection of bottled snakes.

CHAPTER III.

"Stay delightful Dream;
Let him within his pleasant garden walk;
Give him her arm—of blessings let them talk."

CHABRE.

"There, Robert, there! now you can see the new stables. By Jove, they are the completest thing in the three kingdoms!"

"Quite a pile! But is that the house? You lodge your horses more magnificently than yourself."

"But is it not a beautiful cottage?—to be sure, it owes every thing to Catharine's taste. Dear Catharine!"

Mr. Robert Beaufort—for this colloquy took place between the brothers as their britska rapidly descended the hill, at the foot of which lay Fernside Cottage and its miniature demesnes—Mr. Robert Beaufort pulled his traveling cap over his brows, and his countenance fell, whether at the name of Catharine, or the tone in which the name was uttered; and there was a pause, broken by a third occupant of the britska, a youth of about seventeen, who sat opposite the brothers.

"And who are those boys on the lawn, uncle?"

"Who are those boys?" It was a simple question, but it grated on the ear of Mr. Robert Beaufort: it struck discord at his heart. "Who were those boys?" as they ran across the sward, eager to welcome their father home—the westering sun shining full on their joyous faces—their young forms so lithe and so graceful—their merry laughter ringing in the still air. "Those boys," thought Mr. Robert Beaufort, "the sons of shame, rob mine of his inheritance." The elder brother turned round at his nephew's question, and saw the expression on Robert's face. He bit his lip, and answered gravely,

"Arthur, they are my children."

"I did not know you were married," replied Arthur, bending forward to take a better view of his cousins.

Mr. Robert Beaufort smiled bitterly, and Philip's brow grew crimson.

The carriage stopped at the little lodge. Philip opened the door and jumped to the ground; the brother and his son followed. A moment more, and Philip was locked in Catharine's arms, her tears falling fast upon his breast, his children plucking at his coat, and the younger one crying, in his shrill, impatient treble, "Papa! papa! you don't see Sidney, papa!"

Mr. Robert Beaufort placed his hand on his son's shoulder and arrested his steps as they contemplated the group before them.

"Arthur," said he in a hollow whisper, "those children are our disgrace and your supplanters; they are bastards! bastards! and they are to be his heirs!"

Arthur made no answer, but the smile with which he had hitherto gazed on his new relations vanished.

"Kate," said Mr. Beaufort, as he turned from Mrs. Morton, and lifted his youngest born in his arms, "this is my brother and his son: they are welcome, are they not?"

Mr. Robert bowed low, and extended his hand, with stiff affability, to Mrs. Morton, muttering something equally complimentary and inaudible.

The party proceeded towards the house. Philip and Arthur brought up the rear.

"Do you shoot?" asked Arthur, observing the gun in his cousin's hand.

"Yes. I hope this season to bag as many head as my father: he is a famous shot. But this is only a single barrel, and an old-fashioned sort of detonator. My father must get me one of the new guns. I can't afford it myself."

"I should think not," said Arthur, smiling.

"Oh, as to that," resumed Philip, quickly, and with a heightened colour, "I could have managed it very well if I had not given thirty guineas for a brace of pointers the other day: they are the best dogs you ever saw."

"Thirty guineas!" echoed Arthur, looking with naïve surprise at the speaker; "why, how old are you?"

"Just fifteen last birthday. Holla, John! John Green!" cried the young gentleman, in an imperious voice, to one of the gardeners who was crossing the lawn, "see that the nets are taken down to the lake to-morrow, and that my tent is pitched properly, by the lime-trees, by nine o'clock. I hope you will understand me this time: Heaven knows you take a great deal of telling before you understand any thing!"

"Yes, Mr. Philip," said the man, bowing obsequiously; and then muttered as he went off, "Drat the nat'el! he speaks to a poor man as if he warn't flesh and blood."

"Does your father keep hunters?" asked Philip.

"No."

"Why?"

"Perhaps one reason may be that he is not rich enough."

"Oh! that's a pity. Never mind, we'll mount you whenever you like to pay us a visit."

Young Arthur drew himself up, and his air, naturally frank and gentle, became haughty and reserved. Philip gazed on him and felt offended; he scarce knew why, but from that moment he conceived a dislike to his cousin.

CHAPTER IV.

"For a man is helpless and vain, of a condition so exposed to calamity that a raisin is able to kill him: any trooper out of the Egyptian army—a fly can do it, when it goes on God's errand."

JEREMY TAYLOR.

The two brothers sat at their wine after dinner. Robert sipped claret, the sturdy Philip quaffed his more generous port. Catharine and the boys might be seen at a little distance, and by the light of a soft August moon, among the shrubs and bosquets of the lawn.

Philip Beaufort was about five-and-forty, tall, robust, nay, of great strength of frame and limb, with a countenance extremely winning, not only from the comeliness of its features, but its frankness, manliness, and good nature. His was the bronzed, rich complexion, the inclination towards embonpoint, the athletic girth of chest, which denote redundant health, and mirthful temper, and sanguine blood. Robert, who had lived the life of cities, was a year younger than his brother; nearly as tall, but pale, meager, stooping, and with a careworn, anxious, hungry look, which made the smile that hung upon his lips seem hollow and artificial. His dress, though plain, was neat and studied; his manner bland and plausible; his voice sweet and low: there was that about him which, if it did not win liking, tended to excite respect; a certain decorum, a nameless propriety of appearance and bearing, that approached a little to formality: his every movement, slow and measured, was that of one who paced in the circle that fences round the habits and usages of the world.

"Yes," said Philip, "I had always decided to take this step whenever my poor uncle's death should allow me to do so. You have seen Catharine, but you do not know half her good qualities; she would grace any station: and, besides, she nursed me so carefully last year, when I broke my collar-bone in that cursed steeple-chase. Egad, I am getting too heavy and growing too old for such schoolboy pranks."

"I have no doubt of Mrs. Morton's excellence, and I honour your motives; still, when you talk of her gracing any station, you must not forget, my dear brother, that she will be no more received as Mrs. Beaufort than she is now as Mrs. Morton."

"But I tell you, Robert, that I am really married to her already—that she would never have left her home but on that condition—that we were married the very day we met after her flight."

Robert's thin lips broke into a slight sneer of incredulity.

"My dear brother, you do right to say this: any man in your situation would. But I know that my uncle took every pains to ascertain if the report of a private marriage were true."

"And you helped him in the search. Eh, Bob?"

Bob slightly blushed. Philip went on:

"Ha, ha, to be sure you did; you knew that such a discovery would have done for me in the old gentleman's good opinion. But I blinded you both, ha, ha! The fact is, that we were married with the greatest privacy; that even now, I own, it would be difficult for Catharine herself to establish the fact unless I wished it. I am ashamed to think that I have never even told her where I keep the main proof of the marriage. I induced one witness to leave the country, the other must be long since dead: my poor friend, too, who officiated, is no more. Even the register, Bob, the register itself has been destroyed; and yet, notwithstanding, I will prove the ceremony and clear up poor Catharine's fame; for I have the attested copy of the register safe and sound. Catharine not married! Why, look at her, man!"

Mr. Robert Beaufort glanced at the window for a moment, but his countenance was still that of one unconvinced.

"Well, brother," said he, dipping his fingers in the water-glass, "it is not for me to contradict you. It is a very curious tale—parson dead—witnesses missing. But still, as I said before, if you are resolved on a public marriage, you are wise to insist that there has been a previous private one. Yet, believe me, Philip," continued Robert, with solemn earnestness, "the world—"

"D—the world! What do I care for the world? We don't want to go to routs and balls, and give dinners to fine people. I shall live much the same as I have always done; only I shall now keep the hounds—they are very indifferently kept at present—and have a yacht, and engage the best masters for the boys. Phil wants to go to Eton; but I know what Eton is. Poor fellow! his feelings might be hurt there, if others are as sceptical as yourself. I suppose my old friends will not be less civil now I have £20,000 a year. And as for the society of women, between you and me, I don't care a rush for any woman but Catharine: poor Katty!"

"Well, you are the best judge of your own affairs: you don't misinterpret my motives!"

"My dear Bob, no. I am quite sensible how kind it is in you—a man of your starch habits and strict views—coming here to pay a mark of respect to Kate (Mr. Robert turned uneasily in his chair) even before you knew of the private marriage; and I am sure I don't blame you for never having done it before. You did quite right to try your chance with my uncle."

Mr. Robert turned in his chair again, still more uneasily, and cleared his voice as if to speak. But Philip tossed off his wine, and proceeded without heeding his brother.

"And though the poor old man does not seem to have liked you the better for consulting his scruples, yet we must make up for the partiality of his will. Let me see—what, with your wife's fortune, you must £2000 a year?"

"Only £1500," Philip, and Arthur's education is growing expensive. Next year he goes to college. He is certainly very clever, and I have great hopes—"

"That he will do honour to us all—so have I. He is a noble young fellow; and I think my Philip may find a great deal to learn from him. Phil is a sad, idle dog, but with a devil of a spirit, and sharp as a needle. I wish you could see him ride. Well, to return to Arthur. Don't trouble yourself about his education: that shall be my care. He shall go to Christ Church—a gentleman commoner, of course—and when he's of age we'll get him into Parliament. Now for yourself, Bob. I shall sell the town-house in Berkeley Square, and whatever it brings you shall have. Besides that, I'll add £1500 a year to your £1500: so that's said and done. Pshaw! brothers should be brothers. Let's come out and play with the boys!"

The two Beauforts stepped through the open casement into the lawn.

"You look pale, Bob—all you London fellows do. As for me, I feel as strong as a horse; much better than when I was one of your gav dogs, straying loose about the town! 'Gad! I have never had a moment's ill health, except a fall now and then: I feel as if I should live for ever, and that's the reason why I could never make a will."

"Have you never, then, made your will?"

"Never as yet. Faith, till now, I had little enough to leave. But, now that all this great Beaufort property is at my own disposal, I must think of Kate's jointure. By Jove! now I speak of it, I will ride to  to-morrow, and consult the lawyer there both about the will and the marriage. You will stay for the wedding?"

"Why, I must go into—shire to-morrow evening, to place Arthur with his tutor. But I'll return for the wedding, if you particularly wish it: only Mrs. Beaufort is a woman of very strict—"

"I do particularly wish it," interrupted Philip, gravely; "for I desire, for Catharine's sake, that you, my sole surviving relation, may not seem to withhold your countenance from an act of justice to her. And as for your wife, I fancy £1500 a year would reconcile her to my marrying out of the Penitentiary."

Mr. Robert bowed his head, coughed huskily, and said, "I appreciate your generous affection, Philip."

The next morning, while the elder parties were still over the breakfast-table, the young people were in the grounds: It was a lovely day, one of the last of the luxuriant August; and Arthur, as he looked round, thought he had never seen a more beautiful place. It was, indeed, just the spot to captivate a youthful and susceptible fancy. The village of Fernside, though in one of the counties adjoining Middlesex, and as near to London as the owner's passionate pursuits of the field would permit, was yet as rural and sequestered as if a hundred miles distant from the smoke of the huge city. Though the dwelling was called a cottage, Philip had enlarged the original modest building into a villa of some pretensions. On either side a graceful and well proportioned portico stretched verandahs, covered with roses and clematis: to the right extended a range of costly conservatories, terminating in vistas of trellis-work, which formed those elegant alleys called roseries, and served to screen the more useful gardens from view. The lawn, smooth and even, was studded with American plants and shrubs in flower, and bounded on one side by a small lake, on the opposite bank of which limes and cedars threw their shadows over the clear waves. On the other side, a light fence separated the grounds from a large paddock, in which three or four hunters grazed in indolent enjoyment. It was one of those cottages which bespeak the ease and luxury not often found in more ostentatious mansions: an abode which the visitor of sixteen contemplates with vague notions of poetry and love—which at forty he might think dull and d—d expensive—which at sixty he would pronounce to be damp in winter, and full of earwigs in the summer. Master Philip was leaning on his favourite gun; Master Sidney was chasing a peacock butterfly; Arthur was silently gazing on the shining lake and the still foliage that drooped over its surface. In the countenance of this young man there was something that excited a certain interest. He was less handsome than Philip, but the expression of his face was more prepossessing. There was something of pride in the forehead; but of good-nature, not unmixed with irresolution and weakness, in the curves of the mouth. He was more delicate of frame than Philip, and the colour of his complexion was not that of a robust constitution. His movements were graceful and self-possessed, and he had his father's sweetness of voice.

"This is really beautiful! I envy you, cousin Philip."

"Has not your father got a country-house?"

"No: we live either in London or at some hot, crowded watering-place."

"Yes; this is very nice during the shooting and hunting season. But my old nurse says we shall have a much finer place now. I liked this very well till I saw Lord Belville's place. But it is very unpleasant not to have the finest house in the country: aut Cesar aut nihil—that's my motto. Ah! do you see that swallow? I'll bet you a guinea I hit it."

"No, poor thing! don't hurt it." But, ere the remonstrance was uttered, the bird lay quivering on the ground.

"It is just September, and one must keep one's hand in," said Philip, as he reloaded his gun.

To Arthur this action seemed a wanton cruelty; it was rather the wanton recklessness which belongs to a wild boy accustomed to gratify the impulse of the moment; the recklessness which is not cruelty in the boy, but which prosperity may pamper into cruelty in the man. And scarce had he reloaded his gun before the neigh of a young colt came from a neighbouring paddock, and Philip bounded to the fence. "He calls me, poor fellow; you shall see him feed from my hand. Run in for a piece of bread—a large piece, Sidney." The boy and the animal seemed to understand each other. "I see you don't like horses," he said to Arthur. "As for me, I love dogs, horses—every dumb creature."

"Except swallows!" said Arthur, with a half smile, and a little surprised at the inconsistency of the boast.

"Oh! that is sport—all fair: it is not to hurt the swallow—it is to obtain skill," said Philip, colouring; and then, as if not quite easy with his own definition, he turned away abruptly.

"This is dull work: suppose we fish. By Jove! (he had caught his father's expletive,) that blockhead has put the tent on the wrong side of the lake, after all. Holla, you, sir!" and the unhappy gardener looked up from his flower-beds; "what ails you? I have a great mind to tell my father of you: you grow stupider every day. I told you to put the tent under the lime-trees."

"We could not manage it, sir; the boughs were in the way."

"And why did not you cut the boughs, block-head?"

"I did not dare do so, sir, without master's orders," said the man, doggedly.

"My orders are sufficient, I should think: so none of your impertinence," cried Philip, with a raised colour; and lifting his hand, in which he held his ramrod, he shook it menacingly over the gardener's head: I've a great mind to—"

"What's the matter, Philip?" cried the good-humoured voice of his father: "fy!"

"This fellow does not mind what I say, sir."

"I did not like to cut the boughs of the lime-trees without your orders, sir," said the gardener.

"No, it would be a pity to cut them. You should consult me there, Master Philip;" and the father shook him by the collar with a good-natured and affectionate, but rough sort of caress.

"Be quiet, father!" said the boy, petulantly and proudly, "or," he added, in a lower voice, but one which showed emotion, "my cousin may think you mean less kindly than you always do, sir."

The father was touched. "Go and cut the lime-boughs, John; and always do as Mr. Philip tells you."

The mother was behind, and she sighed audibly, "Ah! dearest, I fear you will spoil him."

"Is he not your son—and do we not owe him the more respect for having hitherto allowed others to—"

He stopped, and the mother could say no more. And thus it was that this boy of powerful character and strong passions had, from motives the most amiable, been pampered from the darling into the despot.

"And now, Kate, I will, as I told you last night, riddle over to — and fix the earliest day for our marriage. I will ask the lawyer to dine here, to talk about the proper steps for proving the private one."

"Will that be difficult?" asked Catharine, with natural anxiety.

"No; for, if you remember, I had the precaution to get an examined copy of the register; otherwise, I own to you, I should have been alarmed. I don't know what has become of Smith. I heard some time since from his father that he had left the colony; and (I never told you before—it would have made you uneasy) once, a few years ago, when my uncle again got it into his head that we might be married, I was afraid poor Caleb's successor might, by chance, betray us. So I went over to A— myself, being near it when I was staying with Lord C—, in order to see how far it might be necessary to secure the parson; and, only think! I found an accident had happened to the register: so, as the clergyman could know nothing, I kept my own council. How lucky I have the copy! No doubt the lawyer will set all to rights; and, while I am making settlements, I may as well make my will. I have plenty for both boys, but the dark one must be the heir. Does he not look born to be an eldest son?"

"Ah, Philip!"

"Pshaw! one don't die the sooner for making a will. Have I the air of a man in a consumption?" and the sturdy sportsman glanced complacently at the strength and symmetry of his manly limbs. "Come, Phil, let's go to the stables. Now, Robert, I will show you what is better worth seeing than those miserable flower-beds." So saying, Mr. Beaufort led the way to the courtyard at the bank of the cottage. Catharine and Sidney remained on the lawn, the rest followed the host. The grooms, of whom Beaufort was the idol, hastened to show how well the horses had thriven in his absence.

"Do see how Brown Bess has come on, sir; but, to be sure, Master Philip keeps her in exercise. Ah, sir, he will be as good a rider as your honour one of these days."

"He ought to be, Tom, for I think he'll never have my weight to carry. Well, saddle Brown Bess for Mr. Philip. What horse shall I take? Ah! here's my old friend Puppet!"

"I don't know what's come to Puppet, sir; he's off his feed and turned sulky. I tried him over the bar yesterday, but he was quite restif like."

"The devil he was! So, so, old boy, you shall go over the six-barred gate to-day, or we'll know why." And Mr. Beaufort patted the sleek neck of his favourite hunter. "Put the saddle on him, Tom."

"Yes, your honour. I sometimes think he is hurt in the loins somehow: he don't take to his leaps kindly, and he always tries to bite when we bridles him. Be quiet, sir!"

"Only his airs," said Philip. "I did not know this, or I would have taken him over the gate. Why did not you tell me, Tom?"

"Lord love you, sir! because you have such a spurret; and if anything had come to you—"

"Quite right; you are not weight enough for Puppet, my boy; and he never did like any one to back him but myself. What say you, brother; will you ride with us?"

"No, I must go to — to-day with Arthur. I have engaged the posthorses at two o'clock; but I shall be with you to-morrow or the day after. You see his tutor expects him; and as he is backward in his mathematics, he has no time to lose."

"Well, then, good-bye, nephew!" and Beaufort slipped a pocket-book into the boy's hand. "Tush! whenever you want money, don't trouble your father—write to me; we shall be always glad to see you; and you must teach Philip to like his book a little better—eh, Phil!"

"No, father, I shall be rich enough to do without books," said Philip, rather coarsely; but then, observing the heightened colour of his cousin, he went up to him, and with a generous impulse said, "Arthur, you admired this gun: pray accept it. Nay, don't be shy; I can have as many as I like for the asking: you're not so well off, you know."

The intention was kind, but the manner was so patronising that Arthur felt offended. He put back the gun, and said dryly, "I shall have no occasion for a gun, thank you."

If Arthur was offended by the offer, Philip was much more offended by the refusal. "As you like: I hate pride," said he; and he gave the gun to the groom as he vaulted into his saddle with the lightness of a young Mercury. "Come, father!"

Mr. Beaufort had now mounted his favourite hunter: a large, powerful horse, well known for its prowess in the field. The rider trotted him once or twice through the spacious yard.

"Nonsense, Tom: no more hurt in the loins than I am. Open that gate; we will go across the paddock, and take the gate yonder—the old six-bar—eh, Phil?"

"Capital! to be sure!"

The gate was opened; the grooms stood watchful to see the leap; and a kindred curiosity arrested Robert Beaufort and his son.

How well they looked, those two horsemen; the ease, lightness, spirit of the one, with the finelimbbed and fiery steed that literally "bounded beneath him as a barb," seemingly as gay, as ardent, and as haughty as the boy-rider. And the manly and almost Herculean form of the elder Beaufort, which, from the buoyancy of its movements, and the supple grace belonging to the perfect mastership of any athletic art, possessed an elegance and dignity, especially on horseback, which rarely accompanies proportions equally sturdy and robust. There was, indeed, something knightly and chivalrous in the bearing of the elder Beaufort; in his handsome aquiline features, the erectness of his mien, the very wave of his hand, as he spurred from the yard.

"What a fine-looking fellow my uncle is!" said Arthur, with involuntary admiration.

"Ay, an excellent life—amazingly strong!" returned the pale father, with a slight sigh.

"Philip," said Mr. Beaufort, as they cantered across the paddock, "I think the gate is too much for you. I will just take Puppet over, and then we will open it for you."

"Pooh, my dear father! you don't know how I'm improved!" And slackening the rein, and touching the side of his horse, the young rider darted forward and cleared the gate, which was of no common height, with an ease that extorted a loud bravo from the proud father.

"Now, Puppet," said Mr. Beaufort, spurring his own horse. The animal cantered towards the gate, and then suddenly turned round with an impatient and angry snort. "For shame, Puppet! for shame, old boy!" said the sportsman, wheeling him again to the barrier. The horse shook his head as if in remonstrance: but the spur, vigorously applied, showed him that his master would not listen to his mute reasonings. He bounded forward—made at the gate—struck his hoofs against the top bar—fell forward, and threw his rider head foremost on the road beyond. The horse rose instantly—not so the master. The son dismounted, alarmed and terrified. His father was speechless! and blood gushed from the mouth and nostrils as the head drooped heavily on the boy's breast. The bystanders had witnessed the fall—they crowded to the spot—they took the fallen man from the weak arms of the son—the head groom examined him with the eye of one who had picked up science from his experience in such casualties.

"Speak, brother! where are you hurt?" exclaimed Robert Beaufort.

"He will never speak more!" said the groom, bursting into tears. "His neck is broken!"

"Send for the nearest surgeon," cried Mr. Robert. "Good God! boy! don't mount that devilish horse!"

But Arthur had already leaped on the unhappy steed which had been the cause of this appalling affliction. "Which way?"

"Straight on to , only two miles; every one knows Mr. Powis's house. God bless you!" said the groom.

Arthur vanished.

"Lift him carefully, and take him to the house," said Mr. Robert. "My poor brother! my dear brother!"

He was interrupted by a cry—a single, shrill, heart-breaking cry—and Philip fell senseless to the ground.

No one heeded him at that hour; no one heeded the fatherless BASTARD. "Gently, gently," said Mr. Robert, as he followed the servants and their load. And he then muttered to himself, and his sallow cheek grew bright, and his breath came short: "He has made no will! he never made a will!"

CHAPTER V.

"Constance. Oh, boy, then where are art thou?
... What becomes of me?"

King John.

It was three days after the death of Philip Beaufort—for the surgeon arrived only to confirm the judgment of the groom; in the drawing-room of the cottage, the windows closed, lay the body in its coffin, the lid not yet nailed down. There, prostrate on the floor, tearless, speechless, was the miserable Catharine; poor Sidney, too young to comprehend all his loss, sobbing at her side; while Philip, apart, seated beside the coffin, gazed abstractedly on that cold, rigid face, which had never known one frown for his boyish follies.

In another room, that had been appropriated to the late owner, called his study, sat Robert Beaufort. Every thing in this room spoke of the deceased. Partially separated from the rest of the house, it communicated by a winding staircase with a chamber above, to which Philip had been wont to betake himself whenever he returned late and over-exhilarated from some rural feast crowning a hard day's hunt. Above a quaint, old-fashioned bureau of Dutch workmanship (which Philip had picked up at a sale in the earlier years of his marriage,) was a portrait of Catharine, taken in the bloom of her youth. On a peg on the door that led to the staircase still hung his rough driving-coat. The window commanded the view of the paddock, in which the worn-out hunter or the unbroken colt grazed at will. Around the walls of the "study" (a strange misnomer!) hung prints of celebrated fox-hunts and renowned steeple-chases. Guns, fishing-rods, and foxes' brushes, ranged with a sportsman's neatness, supplied the place of books. On the mantelpiece lay a cigar-case, a well-worn volume on the veterinary art, and the last number of The Sporting Magazine. And in that room—thus witnessing of the hardy, masculine, and rural life that had passed away—sallow, stooping, town-worn, sat, I say, Robert Beaufort, the heir-at-law—alone: for the very day of his death he had remanded his son home with the letter that announced to his wife the change in their fortunes, and directed her to send his lawyer post-haste to the house of death. The bureau, and the drawers, and the boxes which contained the papers of the deceased, were open; their contents had been ransacked; no certificate of the private marriage, no hint of such an event; not a paper found to signify the last wishes of the rich dead man. He had died and made no sign. Mr. Robert Beaufort's countenance was still and composed.

A knock at the door was heard: the lawyer entered.

"Sir, the undertakers are here, and Mr. Greaves has ordered the bells to be rung; at three o'clock he will read the service."

"I am obliged to you, Blackwell, for taking these melancholy offices on yourself. My poor brother! It is so sudden! But the funeral, you say, ought to take place to-day?"

"The weather is so warm!" said the lawyer, wiping his forehead. As he spoke, the death-bell was heard.

There was a pause.

"It would have been a terrible shock to Mrs. Morton if she had been his wife," observed Mr. Blackwell. "But I suppose persons of that kind have very little feeling. I must say it was very fortunate for the family that the event happened before Mr. Beaufort was wheedled into so improper a marriage."

"It was fortunate, Blackwell. Have you ordered the post-horses? I shall start immediately after the funeral."

"What is to be done with the cottage, sir,"

"You may advertise it for sale."

"And Mrs. Morton and the boys?"

"Hum—we will consider. She was a tradesman's daughter. I think I ought to provide for her suitably, eh?"

"It is more than the world could expect from you, sir: it is very different from a wife."

"Oh, very! very much so, indeed! Just ring for a lighted candle; we will seal up these boxes. And—I think I could take a sandwich. Poor Philip!"

The funeral was over—the dead shoveled away. What a strange thing it does seem, that the very form which we prized so charily, for which we prayed the winds to be gentle, which we lapped from the cold in our arms, from whose footstep we would have removed a stone, should be suddenly thrust out of sight—an abomination that the earth must not look upon—a despicable loathsomeness, to be concealed and to be forgotten! And this same composition of bone and muscle, that was yesterday so strong—which men respected and women loved, and children clung to—to-day so lamentably powerless, unable to defend or protect those who lay nearest to its heart; its riches wrested from it, its wishes spat upon, its influence expiring with its last sigh! A breath from its lips making all that mighty difference between what it was and what it is!

The post-horses were at the door as the funeral procession returned to the house.

Mr. Robert Beaufort bowed slightly to Mrs. Morton, and said, with his pocket-handkerchief still before his eyes,

"I will write to you in a few days, ma'am; you will find that I shall not forget you. The cottage will be sold; but we sha'n't hurry you.

Good-bye, ma'am; good-bye, my boys;" and he patted his nephews on the head.

Philip winced aside, and scowled haughtily at his uncle, who muttered to himself, "That boy will come to no good!" Little Sydney put his hand into the rich man's, and looked up pleadingly into his face: "Can't you say something pleasant to poor mamma, uncle Robert?"

Mr. Beaufort hemmed huskily and entered the britska—it had been his brother's: the lawyer followed, and they drove away.

A week after the funeral, Philip stole from the house into the conservatory, to gather some fruit for his mother: she had scarcely touched food since Beaufort's death. She was worn to a shadow: her hair had turned gray. Now she had at last found tears, and she wept noiselessly but unceasingly.

The boy had plucked some grapes, and placed them carefully in his basket: he was about to select a nectarine that seemed riper than the rest, when his hand was roughly seized, and the gruff voice of John Green, the gardener, exclaimed,

"What are you about, Master Philip! You must not touch them 'ere fruit!"

"How dare you, fellow!" cried the young gentleman, in a tone of equal astonishment and wrath.

"None of your airs, Master Philip! What I means is, that some great folks are coming to look at the place to-morrow, and I won't have my show of fruit spoiled by being pawed about by the like of you; so, that's plain, Master Philip!"

The boy grew very pale, but remained silent. The gardener, delighted to retaliate the insolence he had received, continued,

"You need not go for to look so spiteful, master; you are not the great man you thought you were; you are nobody now, and so you will find ere long. So, march out, if you please: I wants to lock up the glass."

As he spoke, he took the lad roughly by the arm; but Philip, the most irascible of mortals, was strong for his years, and fearless as a young lion. He caught up a watering-pot, which the gardener had deposited while he expostulated with his late tyrant, and struck the man across the face with it so violently and so suddenly that he fell back over the beds, and the glass crackled and shattered under him. Philip did not wait for the foe to recover his equilibrium; but, taking up his grapes, and possessing himself quietly of the disputed nectarine, quitted the spot; and the gardener did not think it prudent to pursue him.

To boys under ordinary circumstances—boys who have buffeted their way through a scolding nursery, a wrangling family, or a public school—there would have been nothing in this squabble to dwell on the memory or vibrate on the nerves after the first burst of passion; but to Philip Beaufort it was an era in life; it was the first insult he had ever received; it was his initiation into that changed, rough, and terrible career, to which the spoiled darling of vanity and love was henceforth condemned. His pride and his self-esteem had incurred a fearful shock. He entered the house, and a sickness came over him; his limbs trembled; he sat down in the hall, and, placing the fruit beside him, covered his face with his hands and wept. Those were not the tears of a boy, drawn from a shallow source; they were the burning, agonising, reluctant tears that men shed, wrung from the heart as if it were its blood. He had never been sent to school lest he should meet with mortification. He had had various tutors, trained to show rather than to exact respect; one succeeding another at his own whim and caprice. His natural quickness, and a very strong, hard, inquisitive turn of mind, had enabled him, however, to pick up more knowledge, though of a desultory and miscellaneous nature, than boys of his age generally possess; and his roving, independent, out-of-door existence had served to ripen his understanding. He had certainly, in spite of every precaution, arrived at some, though not very distinct, notions of his peculiar position; but none of its inconveniences had visited him till that day. He began now to turn his eyes to the future; and vague and dark forebodings—a consciousness of the shelter, the protector, the station he had lost in his father's death—crept coldly over him. While thus musing, a ring was heard at the bell—he lifted his head—it was the postman with a letter. Philip hastily rose, and averting his face, on which the tears were not yet dried, took the letter; and then snatching up his little basket of fruit, repaired to his mother's room.

The shutters were half closed on the bright day—oh, what a mockery is there in the smile of the happy sun when it shines on the wretched! Mrs. Morton sat, or rather crouched, in a distant corner, her streaming eyes fixed on vacancy—listless, drooping—a very image of desolate woe: and Sidney was weaving flower-chains at her feet.

"Mamma! mother!" whispered Philip, as he threw his arms round her neck; "look up! look up! My heart breaks to see you. Do taste this fruit: you will die too if you go on thus; and what will become of us—of Sidney?"

Mrs. Morton did look up vaguely into his face, and strove to smile.

"See, too, I have brought you a letter: perhaps good news: shall I break the seal?"

Mrs. Morton shook her head gently, and took the letter—alas! how different from that one which Sidney had placed in her hands not two short weeks since: it was Mr. Robert Beaufort's handwriting. She shuddered and laid it down. And then there suddenly, and for the first time, flashed across her the sense of her strange position—the dread of the future. What were her sons to be henceforth? What herself? Whatever the sanctity of her marriage, the law might fail her. At the disposition of Mr. Robert Beaufort the fate of three lives might depend. She gasped for breath, again took up the letter, and hurried over the contents: they ran thus:

"Dear Madam,—Knowing that you must naturally be anxious as to the future prospects of your children and yourself, left by my poor brother destitute of all provision, I take the earliest opportunity which it seems to me that propriety and decorum allow, to apprise you of my intentions. I need not say that, properly speaking, you can have no kind of claim upon the relations of my late brother; nor will I hurt your feelings by those moral reflections which at this season of sorrow cannot, I hope, fail involuntarily to force themselves upon you. Without more than this mere allusion to your peculiar connection with my brother, I may, however, be permitted to add, that that connection tended very materially to separate him from the legitimate branches of his family; and in consulting with them as to a provision for you and your children, I find that, besides scruples that are to be respected, some natural degree of soreness exists upon their minds. Out of regard, however, to my poor brother (though I saw very little of him of late years), I am willing to waive those feelings which, as a father and a husband, you may conceive that I share with the rest of my family. You will probably now decide on living with some of your own relations; and that you may not be entirely a burden to them, I beg to say that I shall allow you a hundred a year, paid, if you prefer it, quarterly. You may also select certain articles of linen and plate, of which I enclose a list. With regard to your sons, I have no objection to place them at a grammar-school, and, at a proper age, to apprentice them to any trade suitable to their future station, in the choice of which your own family can give you the best advice. If they conduct themselves properly, they may always depend on my protection. I do not wish to hurry your movements; but it will probably be painful to you to remain longer than you can help in a place crowded with unpleasant recollections; and as the cottage is to be sold—indeed, my brother-in-law, Lord Lilburne, thinks it would suit him—you will be liable to, the interruption of strangers to see it; and, indeed, your prolonged residence at Fernside, you must be sensible, is rather an obstacle to the sale. I beg to enclose you a draft for £100 to pay any present expenses; and to request, when you are settled, to know where the first quarter shall be paid.

"I shall write to Mr. Jackson (who, I think, is the bailiff) to detail my instructions as to selling the crops, &c., and discharging the servants, so that you may have no farther trouble.

"I am, madam,

"Your obedient servant,

"ROBERT BEAUFORT.

"Berkeley square, Sept. 12, 18—"

The letter fell from Catharine's hands. Her grief was changed to indignation and scorn.

"The insolent!" she exclaimed, with flashing eyes. "This to me! to me! the wife, the lawful wife of his brother! the wedded mother of his brother's children!"

"Say that again, mother! again—again!" cried Philip, in a loud voice. "His wife! wedded!"

"I swear it," said Catharine, solemnly. "I kept the secret for your father's sake. Now, for yours, the truth must be proclaimed."

"Thank God!" thank God!" murmured Philip, in a quivering voice, throwing his arms round his brother. "We have no brand on our names, Sidney."

At those accents, so full of suppressed joy and pride, the mother felt at once all that her son had suspected and concealed. She felt that beneath his haughty and wayward character there had lurked delicate and generous forbearance for her; that from his equivocal position his very faults might have arisen; and a pang of remorse for her long sacrifice of the children to the father shot through her heart. It was followed by a fear, an appalling fear, more painful than the remorse. The proofs that were to clear herself and them! The words of her husband that last awful morning rang in her ear. The minister dead—the witness absent—the register lost! But the copy of that register! the copy! Might not that suffice? She groaned, and closed her eyes as if to shut out the future: then starting up, she hurried from the room, and went straight to Beaufort's study. As she laid her hand on the latch of the door, she trembled and drew back. But care for the living was stronger at that moment than even anguish for the dead: she entered the apartment; she passed with a firm step to the bureau. It was locked; Robert Beaufort's seal upon the lock: on every cupboard, every box, every drawer, the same seal, that spoke of rights more valued than her own. But Catharine was not daunted: she turned and saw Philip by her side; she pointed to the bureau in silence; the boy understood the appeal. He left the room, and returned in a few moments with a chisel. The lock was broken: tremblingly and eagerly Catharine ransacked the contents; opened paper after paper, letter after letter, in vain: no certificate—no will—no memorial. Could the brother have abstracted the fatal proof? A word sufficed to explain to Philip what she sought for, and his search was more minute than hers. Every possible receptacle for papers in that room, in the whole house, was explored, and still the search was fruitless..

Three hours afterward they were in the same room into which Philip had brought Robert Beaufort's letter to his mother. Catharine was seated, tearless, but deadly pale with heart-sickness and dismay.

"Mother," said Philip, "may I now read the letter?"

"Yes, boy, and decide for us all." She paused, and examined his face as he read. He felt her eye was upon him, and restrained his emotions as he proceeded. When he had done, he lifted his dark gaze upon Catharine's watchful countenance.

"Mother, whether or not we obtain our rights, you will still refuse this man's charity. I am young—a boy; but I am strong and active. I will work for you day and night. I have it in me—I feel it; any thing rather than eating his bread."

"Philip! Philip! you are indeed my son—your father's son! And have you no reproach for your mother, who so weakly, so criminally concealed your birthright, till, alas! discovery may be too late? Oh! reproach me, reproach me! it will be kindness. No! do not kiss me! I cannot bear it. Boy! boy! if, as my heart tells me, we fail in proof, do you understand what, in the world's eye, I am—what you are?"

"I do!" said Philip, firmly; and he fell on his knees at her feet. "Whatever others call you, you are a mother, and I your son. You are, in the judgment of Heaven, my father's wife, and I his heir."

Catharine bowed her head, and, with a gush of tears, fell into his arms. Sidney crept up to her, and forced his lips to her cold cheek. "Mamma! what vexes you? Mamma, mamma!"

"Oh, Sidney! Sidney! How like his father! Look at him, Philip! Shall we do right to refuse even this pittance? Must he be a beggar too?"

"Never a beggar!" said Philip, with a pride that showed what hard lessons he had yet to learn. "The lawful sons of a Beaufort were not born to beg their bread!"

CHAPTER VI.

"The storm above, and frozen world below.

The olive bough
Faded and cast upon the common wind,
And earth a doveless ark."—LAMAN BLANCHARD.

Mr. Robert Beaufort was generally considered by the world a very worthy man. He had never committed any excess—never gambled or incurred debt—or fallen into the warm errors most common with his sex. He was a good husband—a careful father—an agreeable neighbour—rather charitable than otherwise to the poor. He was honest and methodical in his dealings, and had been known to behave handsomely in different relations of life. Mr. Robert Beaufort, indeed, always meant to do what was right—in the eyes of the world! He had no other rule of action but that which the world supplied: his religion was decorum—his sense of honour was regard to opinion. His heart was a dial to which the world was the sun: when the great eye of the public fell on it, it answered every purpose that a heart could answer; but, when that eye was invisible, the dial was mute—a piece of brass, and nothing more.

It is just to Robert Beaufort to assure the reader that he wholly disbelieved his brother's story of a private marriage. He considered that tale, when heard for the first time, as a mere invention (and a shallow one) of a man wishing to make the imprudent step he was about to take as respectable as he could. The careless tone of his brother when speaking upon the subject—his confession that of such a marriage there was no distinct proofs, except a copy of a register (which copy Robert had not found)—made his incredulity natural. He therefore deemed himself under no obligation of delicacy or respect to a woman through whose means he had very nearly lost a noble succession—a woman who had not even borne his brother's name—a woman whom nobody knew. Had Mrs. Morton been Mrs. Beaufort, and the natural sons legitimate children, Robert Beaufort, supposing their situation of relative power and dependence to have been the same, would have behaved with careful and scrupulous generosity. The world would have said, "Nothing could be handsomer than Mr. Robert Beaufort's conduct!" Nay, if Mrs. Morton had been some divorced wife of birth and connections, he would have made very different dispositions in her favour: he would not have allowed the connections to have called him shabby. But here he felt that, all circumstances considered, the world, if it spoke at all (which it would scarcely think it worth while to do,) would be on his side. An artful woman—low-born, and, of course, low-bred—who wanted to inveigle the rich and careless paramour into marriage: what could be expected from the man she had sought to injure—the rightful heir? Was it not very good in him to do anything for her; and, if he provided for the children suitably to the original station of the mother, did he not go to the very utmost of reasonable expectation? He certainly thought in his conscience, such as it was, that he had acted well; not extravagantly, not foolishly, but well. He was sure the world would say so if it knew all: he was not bound to do anything. He was not, therefore, prepared for Catharine's short, haughty, but temperate reply to his letter; a reply which conveyed a decided refusal of his offers—asserted positively her own marriage, and the claims of her children—intimated legal proceedings—and was signed in the name of Catharine Beaufort! Mr. Beaufort put the letter in his bureau, labelled "Impertinent answer from Mrs. Morton, Sept. 14," and was quite contented to forget the existence of the writer, until his lawyer, Mr. Blackwell, informed him that a suit had been instituted by Catharine. Mr. Robert turned pale, but Blackwell composed him.

"Pooh, sir! you have nothing to fear. It is but an attempt to extort money: the attorney is a low practitioner, accustomed to get up bad cases: they can make nothing of it."

This was true: whatever the rights of the case, poor Catharine had no proofs—no evidence—which could justify a respectable lawyer to advise her proceeding to a suit. She named two witnesses of her marriage: one dead, the other could not be heard of. She selected for the alleged place in which the ceremony was performed a very remote village, in which it appeared that the register had been destroyed. No attested copy thereof was to be found; and Catharine was stunned on hearing that, even if found, it was doubtful whether it could be received as evidence, unless to corroborate actual personal testimony. It so happened that when Philip, many years ago, had received the copy, he had not shown it to Catharine, nor mentioned Mr. Jones's name as the copyist. In fact, then only three years married to Catharine, his worldly caution had not yet been conquered by confident experience of her generosity. As for the mere moral evidence dependent on the publication of her bans in London, that amounted to no proof whatever; nor, on inquiry at A—, did the Welsh villagers remember anything farther than that, some fifteen years ago, a handsome gentleman had visited Mr. Price, and one or two rather thought that Mr. Price had married him to a lady from London; evidence quite inadmissible against the deadly, damning fact, that for fifteen years Catharine had openly borne another name, and lived with Mr. Beaufort ostensibly as his mistress. Her generosity in this destroyed her case. Nevertheless, she found a low practitioner, who took her money and neglected her cause; so her suit was heard and dismissed with contempt. Henceforth, then, indeed, in the eyes of the law and the public, Catharine was an impudent adventurer, and her sons were nameless outcasts.

And now, relieved from all fear, Mr. Robert Beaufort entered upon the full enjoyment of his splendid fortune. The house in Berkeley Square was furnished anew. Great dinners and gay routs were given in the ensuing spring. Mr. and Mrs. Beaufort became persons of considerable importance. The rich man had, even when poor, been ambitious; his ambition now centred in his only son. Arthur had always been considered a boy of talents and promise: to what might he not now aspire? The term of his probation with the tutor was abridged, and Arthur Beaufort was sent at once to Oxford.

Before he went to the University, during a short preparatory visit to his father, Arthur spoke to him of the Mortons.

"What has become of them, sir? and what have you done for them?"

"Done for them!" said Mr. Beaufort, opening his eyes, "What should I do for persons who have just been harassing me with the most unprincipled litigation? My conduct to them has been too generous—that is, all things considered. But when you are my age you will find there is very little gratitude in the world, Arthur."

"Still, sir," said Arthur, with the goodness that belonged to him, "still, my uncle was greatly attached to them; and the boys, at least, are guiltless."

"Well, well!" replied Mr. Beaufort, a little impatiently, "I believe they want for nothing; I fancy they are with the mother's relations. Whenever they address me in a proper manner, they shall not find me revengeful or hard-hearted; but, since we are on this topic," continued the father, smoothing his shirt-frill with a care that showed his decorum even in trifles, "I hope you see the results of that kind of connection, and that you will take warning by your poor uncle's example. And now let us change the subject: it is not a very pleasant one, and, at your age, the less your thoughts turn on such matters the better."

Arthur Beaufort, with the careless generosity of youth, that gauges other men's conduct by its own sentiments, believed that his father, who had never been niggardly to himself, had really acted as his words implied; and, engrossed by the pursuits of the new and brilliant career opened, whether to his pleasures or his studies, suffered the objects of his inquiries to pass from his thoughts.

Meanwhile Mrs. Morton, for by that name we must still call her, and her children were settled in a small lodging in an humble suburb, situated on the high road between Fernside and the metropolis. She saved from her hopeless lawsuit, after the sale of her jewels and ornaments, a sufficient sum to enable her, with economy, to live respectably for a year or two at least, during which time she might arrange her plans for the future. She reckoned, as a sure resource, upon the assistance of her relations; but it was one to which she applied with natural shame and reluctance. She had kept up a correspondence with her father during his life. To him she never revealed the secret of her marriage, though she did not write like a person conscious of error. Perhaps, as she always said to her son, she had made to her husband a solemn promise never to divulge or even hint that secret until he himself should authorise its disclosure. For neither he nor Catharine ever contemplated separation or death. Alas! how all of us, when happy, sleep secure in the dark shadows which ought to warn us of the sorrows that are to come! Still Catharine's father, a man of coarse mind and not rigid principles, did not take much to heart that connection which he assumed to be illicit. She was provided for, that was some comfort: doubtless Mr. Beaufort would act like a gentleman—perhaps, at last, make her an honest woman and a lady. Meanwhile, she had a fine house, and a fine carriage, and fine servants; and, so far from applying to him for money, was constantly sending him little presents. But Catharine only saw, in his permission of her correspondence, kind, forgiving, and trustful affection, and she loved him tenderly: when he died, the link that bound her to her family was broken. Her brother succeeded to the trade: a man of probity and honour, but somewhat hard and unamiable. In the only letter she had received from him—the one announcing her father's death—he told her plainly and very properly that he could not countenance the life she led—that he had children growing up—that all intercourse between them was at an end, unless she left Mr. Beaufort; when, if she sincerely repented, he would still prove her affectionate brother.

Though Catharine had at the time resented this letter as unfeeling, now, humbled and sorrow-stricken, she recognised the propriety of principle from which it emanated. Her brother was well off for his station; she would explain to him her real situation, and he would believe her story. She would write to him, and beg him, at least, to give aid to her poor children.

But this step she did not take till a considerable portion of her pittance was consumed—till nearly three parts of a year since Beaufort's death had expired—and till sundry warnings, not to be lightly heeded, had made her forebode the probability of an early death for herself. From the age of sixteen, when she had been placed by Mr. Beaufort at the head of his household, she had been cradled, not in extravagance, but in an easy luxury, which had not brought with it habits of economy and thrift. She could grudge anything to herself, but to her children—his children, whose every whim had been anticipated, she had not the heart to be saving. She could have starved in a garret had she been alone, but she could not see them wanting a comfort while she possessed a guinea. Philip, to do him justice, evinced a consideration not to have been expected from his early and arrogant recklessness. But Sidney—who could expect consideration from such a child? What could he know of the change of circumstances—of the value of money? Did he seem dejected, Catharine would steal out and spend a week's income on the lapful of toys which she brought home. Did he seem a shade more pale—did he complain of the slightest ailment, a doctor must be sent for. Alas! her own ailments, neglected and unheeded, were growing beyond the reach of medicine. Anxious—fearful—gnawed by regret for the past, the thought of famine in the future, she daily fretted and wore herself away. She had cultivated her mind during her secluded residence with Mr. Beaufort, but she had learned none of the arts by which decayed gentlewomen keep the wolf from the door; no little holiday accomplishments, which in the day of need turn to useful trade; no water-colour drawings, no paintings on velvet, no fabrication of pretty gewgaws, no embroidery and fine needlework. She was helpless—utterly helpless—not strong enough even for a servant; and, even in that capacity, could she have got a character? A great change at this time was apparent in Philip. Had he fallen then into kind hands and guiding eyes, his passions and energies might have ripened into rare qualities and great virtues. But perhaps, as Goethe has somewhere said, "Experience, after all, is the best teacher." He kept a constant guard on his vehement temper—his wayward will; he would not have vexed his mother for the world. But, strange to say (it was a great mystery in the woman's heart,) in proportion as he became more amiable, it seemed that his mother loved him less. Perhaps she did not, in that change, recognise so closely the darling of the old time; perhaps the very weaknesses and importunities of Sidney, the hourly sacrifices the child entailed upon her, endeared him more to her from that natural sense of dependence and protection which forms the great bond between mother and child; perhaps, too, as Philip had been one to inspire as much pride as affection, so the pride faded away with the expectations that had fed it, and carried off in its decay some of the affection that was intertwined with it. However this be, Philip had formerly appeared the more spoiled and favoured of the two, and now Sidney seemed all in all. Thus, beneath the younger son's caressing gentleness, there grew up a certain regard for self; it was latent—it took amiable colours—it had even a certain charm and grace in so sweet a child, but selfishness it was not the less: in this he differed from his brother. Philip was self-willed, Sidney self-loving. A certain timidity of character, endearing, perhaps, to the anxious heart of a mother, made this fault in the younger boy more likely to take root; for in bold natures there is a lavish and uncalculating recklessness, which scorns self unconsciously: and what is fear, but, when physical, the regard for one's own person; when moral, the anxiety for one's own interests?

It was in a small room in a lodging-house in the suburb of H—that Mrs. Morton was seated by the window, anxiously awaiting the knock of the postman, who was expected to bring her brother's reply to her letter. It was, therefore, between ten and eleven o'clock—a morning in the merry month of June. It was hot and sultry, which is rare in an English June. A flytrap, red, white, and yellow, suspended from the ceiling, swarmed with flies; flies were on the ceiling, flies buzzed at the windows; the sofa and chairs of horsehair seemed stuffed with flies. There was an air of heated discomfort in the gaudy paper, in the bright-staring carpet, in the very looking-glass over the chimney-piece, where a strip of mirror lay in an embrace of frame covered with yellow muslin. We may talk of the dreariness of winter—and winter, no doubt, is desolate—but what in the world is more dreary to eyes inured to the verdure and bloom of nature—"the pomp of groves and garniture of fields"—than a close room in a suburban lodging-house; the sun piercing every corner; nothing fresh, nothing cool, nothing fragrant to be seen, felt, or inhaled; all dust, glare, noise, with a chandler's shop, perhaps, next door? Sidney, armed with a pair of scissors, was cutting the pictures out of a story-book which his mother had bought him the day before. Philip, who, of late, had taken much to rambling about the streets—it may be, in hopes of meeting one of those benevolent, eccentric elderly gentlemen he had read of in old novels, who suddenly come to the relief of distressed virtue; or, more probably, from the restlessness that belonged to his adventurous temperament—Philip had left the house since breakfast.

"Oh! how hot this nasty room is! exclaimed Sidney, abruptly looking up from his employment. "Shan't we ever go into the country again, mamma?"

"Not at present, my love."

"I wish I could have my pony: why can't I have my pony, mamma?"

"Because—because—the pony is sold, Sidney."

"Who sold it?"

"Your uncle."

"He is a very naughty man, my uncle: is not he? But can't I have another pony? It would be so nice this fine weather!"

"Ah! my dear, I wish I could afford it: but you shall have a ride this week! Yes," continued the mother, as if reasoning with herself in excuse of the extravagance, "he does not look well: poor child! he must have exercise."

"A ride! Oh! that is my own kind mamma!" exclaimed Sidney, clapping his hands. "Not on a donkey, you know!—a pony. The man down the street, there, lets ponies. I must have the white pony with the long tail. But, I say, mamma, don't tell Philip—pray don't—he would be jealous."

"No, not jealous, my dear: why do you think so?"

"Because he is always angry when I ask you for anything. It is very unkind in him, for I don't care if he has a pony too—only not the white one."

Here the postman's knock, loud and sudden, startled Mrs. Morton from her seat. She pressed her hands tightly to her heart as if to still its beating, and went nervously to the door, thence to the stairs, to anticipate the lumbering step of the slipshod maid-servant.

"Give it me, Jane! give it me."

"One shilling and eightpence—charged double—if you please, ma'am! 'Thank you.'"

"Mamma, may I tell Jane to engage the pony?"

"Not now, my love: sit down—be quiet: I—I am not well."

Sidney, who was affectionate and obedient, crept back peaceably to the window, and, after a short, impatient sigh, resumed the scissors and the story book. I do not apologise to the reader for the various letters I am obliged to lay before him, for character often betrays itself more in letters than in speech. Mr. Roger Morton's reply was couched in these terms:

"DEAR CATHARINE,—I have received your letter of the 14th inst., and write per return. I am very much grieved to hear of your afflictions; but, whatever you say, I cannot think the late Mr. Beaufort acted like a conscientious man in forgetting to make his will, and leaving his little ones destitute. It is all very well to talk of his intentions; but the proof of the pudding is in the eating. And it is hard upon me, who have a large family of my own, and get my living by honest industry, to have a rich gentleman's children to maintain. As for your story about the private marriage, it may or may not be. Perhaps you were taken in by that worthless man, for a real marriage it could not be. And as you say the law has decided that point, therefore the less you say on the matter the better. It all comes to the same thing. People are not bound to believe what can't be proved. And even if what you say is true, you are more to be blamed than pitied for holding your tongue so many years, and discrediting an honest family, as ours has always been considered. I am sure my wife would not have thought of such a thing for the finest gentleman that ever wore shoe leather. However, I don't want to hurt your feelings; and I am sure I am ready to do whatever is right and proper. You cannot expect that I should ask you to my house. My wife, you know, is a very religious woman—what is called evangelical; but that's neither here nor there: I deal with all people, churchmen and dissenters—even Jews—and don't trouble my head much about differences in opinion. I dare say there are many ways to heaven, as I said the other day to Mr. Thwaites, our member. But it is right to say my wife will not hear of your coming here; and, indeed, it might do harm to my business; for there are several elderly single gentlewomen who buy flannel for the poor at my shop, and they are very particular—as they ought to be, indeed; for morals are very strict in this county, and particularly in this town, where we certainly do pay very high church rates. Not that I grumble; for, though I am as liberal as any man, I am for an Established Church—as I ought to be, since the dean is my best customer. With regard to yourself, I will enclose you £10, and you will let me know when it is gone, and I will see what more I can do. You say you are very poorly, which I am sorry to hear; but you must pluck up your spirits, and take in plain work; and I really think you ought to apply to Mr. Robert Beaufort. He bears a high character; and, notwithstanding your lawsuit, which I cannot approve of, I dare say he might allow you £40 or £50 a year, if you apply properly, which would be the right thing in him. So much for you. As for the boys—poor, fatherless creatures!—it is very hard that they should be so punished for no fault of their own; and my wife, who, though strict, is a good hearted woman, is ready and willing to do what I wish about them. You say the eldest is near sixteen, and well come on in his studies. I can get him a very good thing in a light, genteel way. My wife's brother, Mr. Christopher Plaskwith, is a bookseller and stationer, with pretty practice, in R—. He is a clever man, and has a newspaper, which he kindly sends me every week; and, though it is not my county, it has some very sensible views, and is often noticed in the London papers as 'our provincial cotemporary.' Mr. Plaskwith owes me some money, which I advanced him when he set up the paper, and he has several times most honestly offered to pay me in shares in the said paper. But, as the thing might break, and I don't like concerns I don't understand, I have not taken advantage of his very handsome proposals. Now Plaskwith wrote me word, two days ago that he wanted a genteel, smart lad as assistant and 'prentice, and offered to take my eldest boy; but we can't spare him. I write to Christopher by this post; and if your youth will run down on the top of the coach, and inquire for Mr. Plaskwith—the fare is trifling—I have no doubt he will be engaged at once. But you will say, 'There's the premium to consider!' No such thing; Kit will set off the premium against his debt to me, so you will have nothing to pay. 'Tis a very pretty business, and the lad's education will get him on; so that's off your mind. As to the little chap, I'll take him at once. You say he is a pretty boy, and a pretty boy is always a help in a linen draper's shop. He shall share and share with my own young folks, and Mrs. Morton will take care of his washing and morals. I conclude (this is Mrs. M.'s suggestion) that he has had the measles, cowpock, and whooping-cough, which please let me know. If he behave well, which, at his age, we can easily break him into, he is settled for life. So now you have got rid of two mouths to feed, and have nobody to think of but yourself, which must be a great comfort. Don't forget to write to Mr. Beaufort; and if he don't do something for you, he's not the gentleman I take him for: but you are my own flesh and blood, and sha'n't starve; for, though I don't think it right in a man in business to encourage what's wrong, yet, when a person's down in the world, I think an ounce of help is better than a pound of preaching. My wife thinks otherwise, and wants to send you some tracts; but every body can't be as correct as some folks. However, as I said before, that's neither here nor there. Let me know when your boy comes down, and also about the measles, cowpock, and whooping-cough; also if all's right with Mr. Plaskwith. So now I hope you will feel more comfortable; and remain,

"Dear Catharine,

"Your forgiving and affectionate brother,

"ROGER MORTON.

"High-street, N—, June 13.

"P. S.—Mrs. M. says that she will be a mother to your little boy, and that you had better mend up all his linen before you send him."

As Catharine finished this epistle, she lifted up her eyes and beheld Philip. He had entered noiselessly, and he remained silent, leaning against the wall, and watching the face of his mother, which crimsoned with painful humiliation while she read. Philip was not now the trim and dainty stripling first introduced to the reader. He had outgrown his faded suit of funeral mourning; his long, neglected hair hung elf-like and matted down his cheeks; there was a gloomy look in his bright dark eyes. Poverty never betrays itself more than in the features and form of pride. It was evident that his spirit endured rather than accommodated itself to his fallen state; and, notwithstanding his soiled and thread-bare garments, and a haggardness that ill becomes the years of palmy youth, there was about his whole mien and person a wild and savage grandeur, more impressive than his former ruffling arrogance of manner.

"Well, mother," said he, with a strong mixture of sternness in his countenance and pity in his voice, "well, mother, and what says your brother?"

"You decided for us once before, decide again. But I need not ask you; you would never—"

"I don't know," interrupted Philip, vaguely; "let me see what we are to decide on."

Mrs. Morton was naturally a woman of high courage and spirit, but sickness and grief had worn down both; and, though Philip was but sixteen, there is something in the very nature of woman, especially in trouble, which makes her seek to lean on some other will than her own. She gave Philip the letter, and went quietly to sit down by Sidney.

"Your brother means well," said Philip, when he had concluded the epistle.

"Yes, but nothing is to be done: I cannot, cannot send poor Sidney to—to—" and Mrs. Morton sobbed.

"No, my dear, dear mother, no; it would be terrible, indeed, to part you and him. But this bookseller—Plaskwith—perhaps I shall be able to support you both."

"Why you do not think, Philip, of being an apprentice! you, who have been so brought up! you, who are so proud!"

"Mother, I would sweep the crossings for your sake! Mother, for your sake, I would go to my uncle Beaufort with my hat in my hand, for halfpence. Mother, I am not proud; I would be honest if I can; but when I see you pining away, and so changed, the devil comes into me, and I often shudder lest I should commit some crime—what, I don't know!"

"Come here, Philip—my own Philip—my son—my hope—my firstborn!" and the mother's heart gushed forth in all the fondness of early days. "Don't speak so terribly; you frighten me!"

She threw her arms round his neck, and kissed him soothingly. He laid his burning temples on her bosom, and nestled himself to her, as he had been wont to do after some stormy paroxysm of his passionate and wayward infancy. So there they remained, their lips silent, their hearts speaking to each other—each from each taking strange succour and holy strength—till Philip rose, calm, and with a quiet smile, "Good-by, mother; I will go at once to Mr. Plaskwith."

"But you have no money for the coach-fare; here, Philip;" and she placed her purse in his hand, from which he reluctantly selected a few shillings. "And, mind, if the man is rude, and you dislike him—mind, you must not subject yourself to insolence and mortification."

"Oh, all will go well, don't fear," said Philip, cheerfully; and he left the house.

Towards evening he had reached his destination. The shop was of goodly exterior, with a private entrance; over the shop was written, had so used them, in a great chamber at Sir Henry Willoughby's, he asked the young gentlewoman, what she did with such baffled fellows in her company? Incredible things to be suffered by flesh and blood, but that England is the land of peace."

The world laughed at the poet, and the ill-natured were delighted at his discomfiture. At an entertainment given shortly afterwards by Lady Moray, he was taxed by his mistress, Lady Dorset, with having run away, and, we are told, "some other ladies had their flirts." His hostess perceiving his discomposure, kindly drew towards him: "Well," she said, "I am a merry wench, and will never forsake an old friend in disgrace, so come and sit down by me, Sir John." He of course obeyed her. His spirits rose, and he again became the delight of the company, and his wit and good humour sparkled as before.

What man is there of so little taste or imagination, with whom the romance of the past has not at times predominated over the reality of the present. Who is there that has not dreamed himself into the society of former days! There is in the retrospect of every age a kind of literary oasis, a particular knot of gifted beings, to whose eloquence it would have been rapture to listen, or in whose social mirth it would have been delight to join. To have drunk sack with Shakspeare and his brother actors; to have made a third with Ben Jonson and Drummond of Hawthornden; to have listened to the wild wit of Charles, Buckingham, Rochester, and Killgrew; to have dived into Will's and Button's; to have been with Pope, Swift, Bolingbroke, and Atterbury, or in later times with Johnson, Burke, Reynolds and Garrick; who is there that has not imagined some such intellectual treat, and perhaps improved himself by the contemplation?

There are some who will consider it an affront to such names as the above, to speak of Suckling, D'Avenant, Lovelace and Carew. But wit will always have its charms; and at a period when there was a more universal religious as well as political gloom than perhaps ever pervaded a country, when the people were sad because it was the fashion, and the court because it was in danger; the gay meetings, the wild humour and jollity of the cavalier poets, must have been in strong contrast to the moroseness of the age.

Considering that his literary productions consist of the scattered and careless verses of a fine gentleman, Suckling has great merit as a poet. With the exception of the beautiful love-verses of Sedley, and the general and undoubted claims of Waller, there are none of his school that can compete with him. He has as much wit and poetry as either Rochester, Carew, Dorset, or Lansdowne, and he has more nature than any one of them. Though much of his Session of the Poets has lost its point with modern readers, it is still rich in wit and humour. His verses on Lady Carlisle are as smoothly versified, and have as much real beauty as any thing in the language; and his ballad on a wedding, supposed to be Lord Orrery's, has great merit:

I tell thee, Dick, where I have been,
Where I the rarest things have seen, &c.

But what can exceed the description of the bride, as she is supposed to be represented by a gaping rustic to his friend?—

The maid, and thereby hangs a tale,
For such a maid no Whiston-ale
Could ever yet produce;
No grape that's kindly ripe could be

So round, so plump, so soft as she,
Nor half so full of juice.

Her finger was so small, the ring
Would not stay on which they did bring,
It was too wide a peck.
And, to say truth, for out it must,
It looked like the great collar, just
About our young colt's neck.

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they feared the light.
But oh! she dances such a way
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

He would have kissed her once or twice,
But she would not, she was so nice,
She would not do it in sight;
And then she looked as who would say,
I will do what I list to-day,
And you shall do it at night.

Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison,
Who sees them is undone;
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Katherine pear,
The side that's next the sun.

Her lips were red and one was thin;
Compared to that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly;
But, Dick, her eyes so guard her face,
I durst no more upon them gaze,
Than on the sun in July.

Her mouth so small when she does speak,
Thoud'st swear her teeth her words did break,
That they might passage get;
But she so handled still the matter,
They came as good as ours or better,
And are not spent a whit.

His "Dream," besides possessing considerable merit as a poem, is perhaps the origin of a conceit which has since become extremely popular. The song, "Why so pale and wan, fond lover?" is still a universal favourite. Of Suckling's prose, his "Account of Religion by Reason," addressed to Lord Dorset, is an extraordinary production. It will prove to the philosopher, that the most dissipated have their moments of reflection, and that the gamester, the drunkard, and the debauchee, have at least their conceptions of right and wrong. The letters, published as Suckling's, are without merit. The wit is over-strained, and the sentiment frequently unnatural.

At the expedition against the rebellious Scots, Suckling raised a splendid troop, at the expense of twelve thousand pounds, for the service of the king. We are told that it was one of the most gallant sights of the period. Their dress is described as "white doublets and scarlet breeches, scarlet coats, hats and feathers." They were well armed and horsed. But, alas! in an encounter with the enemy on the English border, in 1639, it was not their lace alone that was tarnished. Poor Sir John! the darling of the wits and the ladies—at whose departure from London easements had been thrown open and white handkerchiefs had waved,—the hour of danger no sooner came, than he and his glittering troopers took to their heels. His former friend, Sir John Mennes, (the poetical admiral,) wrote his once celebrated ballad on this occasion. It was adapted to a gay tune; and not only became popular with the republicans, but for many years afterwards was sung by those, who had, perhaps, never so much as heard of Suckling or his disaster. The following is another song on the same subject. It is less known, but is not without its merit:

Sir John got on a bonny brown beast,
To Scotland for to ride-a;
A brave buff coat upon his back,
A short sword by his side-a:
Alas, young man, we Sucklings can Pull down the Scottish pride-a.

He danced and pranced and pranked about,
Till people him espied-a;
With pye-ball'd apparel, he did so quarrel,
As none durst come him nigh-a.
But soft, Sir John, e'er you come home,
You will not look so high-a.

Both wife and maid and widow prayed,
To the Scots he would be kind-a;
He stormed the more, and deeply swore
They should no favour find-a.
But if you had been at Berwick and seen,
He was in another mind-a.

His men and he, in their jollity,
Did quarrel, drink, and quaff-a;
Till away he went like a Jack of Lent;
But it would have made you laugh-a,
How away they did creep like so many sheep,
And he like an Essex calf-a.

When he came to the camp he was in a damp,
To see the Scots in sight-a,
And all his brave troops, like so many droops,
They had no heart to fight-a;
And when the alarm called all to arm,
Sir John * * * *

They prayed him to mount and ride in the front,
To try his courage good-a;
He told them the Scots had dangerous plots,
As he well understood-a;
Which they denied, but he replied,
It's shame for to shed blood-a.

He did repent the money he spent,
Got by unlawful game-a;
His curled locks could endure no knocks,
Then let none go again-a;
Such a carpet knight as durst not fight,
For fear he should be slain-a.

The lampoon of Sir John Mennes commences,

Sir John he got on an ambling nag,
To Scotland for to go,
With a hundred horse, without remorse,
To keep ye from the foe.
No carpet knight ever went to fight
With half so much bravado:
Had you seen but his look you would swear on a book
He'd conquered a whole armado.

About two years from this event, we find Suckling taking a very active part in Lord Strafford's projected escape from the Tower. The plot reached the ears of the commons, who, after an investigation of the circumstances, voted him guilty of treason. Suckling fled into France, and survived his escape but a few days. According to Spence, who quotes Pope as his authority, his death was attended by some singular circumstances:—"Sir John Suckling died about the beginning of the civil war. He entered warmly into the king's interests, and was sent over to the continent by him with some letters of great importance to the queen. He arrived late at Calais, and in the night his servant ran away with his portmanteau, in which were his money and papers. When he was told of this in the morning, he immediately inquired which way his servant had taken; ordered his horses to be got ready instantly; and, in putting on his boots, found one of them extremely uneasy to him; but as the horses were at the door, he leaped into the saddle, and forgot his pain. He pursued his servant so eagerly, that he overtook him two or three posts off; recovered his portmanteau, and soon after complained of a vast pain in one of his feet, and fainted away with it. When they came to pull off his boots, to fling him into bed, they found one of them full of blood. It seems his servant, who knew his master's temper well, and was sure he would pursue him as soon as his villany should be discovered, had driven a nail up into one of his boots, in hopes of disabling him from pursuing him. Sir John's impetuosity made him regard the pain only just at first, and his pursuit hurried him from the thoughts of it for some time after: however, the wound was so bad, and so much inflamed, that it flung him into a violent fever, which ended his life in a very few days. 'This incident, strange as it may seem, might be proved from some original letters in Lord Oxford's collection.'

Oldys had the same story from Lord Oxford himself. In his MS. notes on Langbaine, in the British Museum, there is the following insertion: "Recollect where I have got down the story my lord told me he had from Dean Chetwood, who had it from Lord Roscommon, of Sir John's being robbed of a casket of gold and jewels, when he was going to France, by his valet, who, I think, poisoned him, and so stuck the blade of a penknife in Sir John's boot to prevent his pursuit of him, as wounded him incurably in the heel besides. 'Tis in one of my pocket-books; white vellum cover, I think; the white journal that is not gilt." Aubrey's account differs materially from those both of Pope and Oldys. He says that Suckling went into France, and being in the most destitute condition, destroyed himself by taking poison. He adds, that he died "miserably with vomiting," and that he was buried in the Protestant churchyard at Paris. In how deep a mine is truth concealed! From these conflicting accounts we can glean little more than that the once brilliant Suckling died under peculiar circumstances of distress in a foreign land. His death is generally placed on the 7th of May, 1641, only two days after his flight from England. There is a portrait of him by Vandyke.

LACONICS.—Colton.

Those orators who give us much noise and many words, but little argument and less wit, and who are most loud when they are the least lucid, should take a lesson from the great volume of nature; she often gives us the lightning, even without the thunder, but never the thunder without the lightning.

No improvement that takes place in either of the sexes can possibly be confined to itself; each is a universal mirror to each; and the respective refinement of the one, will always be in reciprocal proportion to the polish of the other.

Pedantry crams our heads with learned lumber, and takes out our brains to make room for it.

An ambassador from Naples, once said of the young ladies of Paris, that they loved with their heads, and thought with their hearts; and could the same ambassador now see a certain class of young gentlemen in London, he might as truly say of them, that they did neither, with either.

So idle are dull readers, and so industrious are dull authors, that puffed nonsense bids fair to blow unpuffed sense wholly out of the field.

If you cannot inspire a woman with love of you, fill her above the brim with love of herself;—all that runs over will be yours.

Every fool knows how often he has been a rogue, but every rogue does not know how often he has been a fool.

Oratory is the puffing and blustering spoilt-child of a semi-barbarous age. The Press is the foe of Rhetoric, but the friend of Reason: and the art of declamation has been sinking in value, from the moment that speakers were foolish enough to publish, and hearers wise enough to read.

We seek the society of the ladies with a view to be pleased, rather than to be instructed, and are more gratified by those who will talk, than by those that are silent; for if they talk well, we are doubly delighted to receive information from so pleasant a source, and if they are at times a little out in their conclusions, it is flattering to our vanity to set them right. Therefore, I would have the ladies indulge with somewhat less of reserve in the freedom of conversation, notwithstanding the remark of him who said with more of point than of politeness, that they were the very reverse of their own mirrors; for the one reflected without talking, but the other talked without reflecting.

It is curious that some learned dunces, because they can write nonsense in languages that are dead, should despise those that can talk sense, in languages that are living; to acquire a few tongues, says a French writer, is the task of a few years, but to be eloquent in one, is the labour of a whole life.

Ladies of fashion starve their happiness to find their vanity, and their love to feed their pride.

There is this of good in real wills, they deliver us while they last, from the petty despotism of all that were imaginary.

Great wits, who pervert their talents to sap the foundations of morality, have to answer for all the evil that lesser wits may accomplish through their means, even to the end of time. A heavy load of responsibility, where the mind is still alive to do mischief, when the hand it animated is dust. Men of talent may make a breach in morality, at which men of none may enter, as a citadel may be carried by muskets, after a road has been battered out for them by cannon.

He that knowingly defends the wrong side of a question, pays a very bad compliment to all his hearers; it is in plain English this, falsehood supported by my talents, is stronger than truth supported by yours.

The upright, if he suffer calumny to move him, fears the tongue of man, more than the eye of God.

Philosophy is a bully that talks very loud, when the danger is at a distance, but the moment she is hard pressed by the enemy, she is not to be found at her post, but leaves the brunt of the battle to be borne by her humbler but steadier comrade Religion, whom on all other occasions she affects to despise.

There are many who despise half of the world, but if there be any that despise the whole of it, it is because the other half despises them.

WINTER AMUSEMENTS IN CHINA.

The amusements of the Emperor of China's Court on the ice, during the severe winters of Pekin, are thus given by Van Braam, who was one of the Dutch mission which proceeded from Canton, soon after Lord Macartney's embassy;—"The Emperor made his appearance on a sort of sledge, supported by the figures of four dragons. This machine was moved about by several mandarins, some dragging before and others pushing behind! The four principal Ministers of State were also drawn upon the ice, in the sledges, by inferior mandarins. Whole troops of civil and military officers soon appeared, some on sledges, some on skates, and others playing at football on the ice; and he that kicked up the ball was rewarded by the Emperor. The ball was then hung up in a kind of arch, and several mandarins shot at it, in passing on skates, with their bows and arrows. Their skates were cut off short under the heel, and the fore part was turned up at right angles." These diversions are more in the spirit of the Tartars than of the Chinese, whose original habits were more effeminate and quiet.

MOURN NOT THE DEAD.

Mourn not the dead—shed not a tear
Above the moss stained sculptured stone
But weep for those whose living woes
Still yield the bitter, rending groan.

Grieve not to see the eyelids close
In rest that has no fevered start,
Wish not to break the deep repose
That curtains round the pulseless heart.

But keep thy pity for the eyes
That pray for night, yet fear to sleep,
Lest wilder, sadder visions rise
Than those o'er which they waking weep.

Mourn not the dead—'tis they alone
Who are the peaceful and the free;
The purest olive branch is known
To twine about the cypress tree.

Crime, pride, and passion hold no more
The willing or the struggling slave;
The throbbing pangs of love are o'er,
And hatred dwells not in the grave.

The world may pour its venom'd blame,
And fiercely spurn the shroud-wrapped bier,
Some few may call upon the name,
And sigh to meet a "dull, cold ear."

But vain the scorn that would offend,
In vain the lips that would beguile;
The coldest foe, the warmest friend,
Are mocked by Death's unchanging smile.

The only watchword that can tell
Of peace and freedom won by all,
Is echoed by the tolling bell,
And traced upon the sable pall. ELIZA COOK.

PART I.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 1841.

No. 11.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY ADAM WALDIE & CO. No. 48 CARPENTER STREET, PHILADELPHIA. $3 for 60 numbers, payable in advance.

A writer who enjoyed much celebrity in the beginning of the seventeenth century was Owen Felltham. His book called "Resolves" passed through a dozen of editions in as many years. His style is highly figurative and sententious, and has the rare merit of inducing one to think as well as read. Some of his chapters are excellent readings for a Sunday morning; for example the following.

ON THE WORSHIP OF ADMIRATION.

Whatsoever is rare and passionate, carries the soul to the thought of eternity, and by contemplation gives it some glimpses of more absolute perfection, than here it is capable of. When I see the royalty of a state-show at some unwonted solemnity, my thoughts present me something more royal than this. When I see the most enchanting beauties that earth can show me, I yet think there is something far more glorious; methinks I see a kind of higher perfection peeping through the frailty of a face. When I hear the ravishing strains of a sweet-tuned voice, married to the warbles of the artful instrument, I apprehend by this a higher diapason, and do almost believe I hear a little deity whispering through the pory substance of the tongue. But this I can but grope after; I can neither find nor say what it is. When I read a rarely sententious man, I admire him to my own impatiency. I cannot read some parts of Seneca, above two leaves together. He raises my soul to a contemplation, which sets me a thinking on more than I can imagine. So I am forced to cast him by and subside to an admiration. Such effects works poetry, when it looks to towering virtues. It gives up a man to raptures, and irradiates the soul with such high apprehensions, that all the glories which this world hath, hereby appear contemptible; of which the soft-souled Ovid gives a touch, when he complains the want.

"Impetus ille sacer, qui vatam pectora nutrit, Qui prius in nobis esse solebat, abest."
Ex Ponto, iv. 2.

"That sacred vigour, which had wont alone,
Th' enflame the poet's noblest breast, is gone."

But this is when these excellencies incline to gravity and seriousness. For otherwise light airs turn us into sprightly actions, which breathe away in a loose laughter, not leaving half that impression behind them which serious considerations do; as if mirth were the excellency for the body, and meditation for the soul; as if one were for the contentment of this life and the other eyeing to that of the life to come. All endeavours aspire to eminency; all eminencies do beget an admiration; and this makes me believe, that contemplative admiration is a large part of the worship of the Deity. It is an adoration purely of the spirit, a more sublime bowing of the soul to the Godhead. And this is it which that Homer of philosophers avowed could bring a man to perfect happiness, if to his contemplation he joined a constant imitation of God, in justice, wisdom, holiness. Nothing can carry us so near to God and heaven as this. The mind can walk beyond the sight of the eye, and, though in a cloud, can lift us into heaven while we live. Meditation is the soul's perspective glass, whereby, in her long remove, she discerneth God as if he were nearer hand. I persuade no man to make it his whole life's business. We have bodies as well as souls. And even this world, while we are in it, ought somewhat to be cared for. As those states are likely to flourish, where execution follows sound advisements, so is man, when contemplation is seconded by action. Contemplation generates; action propagates. Without the first, the latter is defective. Without the last, the first is but abortive and embryous. Saint Bernard compares contemplation to Rachel, which was the more fair; but action to Leah, which was the more fruitful. I will neither always be busy and doing, nor ever shut up in nothing but thoughts. Yet that which some would call idleness, I will call the sweetest part of my life, and that is, my thinking. Surely God made so many varieties in his creatures as well for the inward soul as the outward senses; though he made them primarily for his own free will and glory. He was a monk of an honest age, that, being asked how he could endure that life without the pleasure of books, answered, the nature of the creatures was his library, wherein, when he pleased, he could muse upon God's deep oracles.

ON MORNING PRAYER.

There is no doubt but prayer is needful daily, ever profitable, and at all times commendable. If it be for ourselves alone, it is necessary; and it is charitable when it is for others. At night it is our covering; In the morning it is our armour. So at all times it defends us from the malice of Satan, our own subornations and betrayings, the unequal weather that the world assaults us with, and preserves us in the favour and esteem of Heaven. We are dependents upon the court while we are but petitioners there; so till we be denied and dismissed we have the protection thereof, which certainly is a privilege that a stranger cannot claim.

And albeit prayer should be the key of the day and the lock of the night, yet I hold it, of the two, more needful in the morning, than when in the evening we commit ourselves to repose. It is true we have enough to induce us to it then. The day could not but present us with something either worthy our thanks, or that needed our begging and pardon, for removing or continuing something; and though we be immured with walls and darkness, yet we are not exempted so from perils, but that, without our God's assistance, we are left a prey to all that is at enmity with man. Besides, sleep is the image or shadow of death; and when the shadow is so near, the substance cannot be far remote. The dying Gorgias being in a slumber, and asked by a friend how he did, he answered, "Pretty well; only sleep is recommending me up to his brother." Some, we know, in health have gone to rest eternal; and without thinking of the other world, have taken their leave of this, not knowing themselves that they were on their way, till they had fully despatched their journey.

But notwithstanding all this, a man at rest in his chamber, like a sheep penned in the fold, is subject only to unusual events, and such as rarely happen; to the emissions of the more immediate and unavoidable hand of God. Danger seems shut out of doors; we are secured from the injury of the elements, and guarded with a fence of iron against the force of such as would invade. We are removed from the world's bustle and the crowd of occasions that jostle against us as we walk abroad. He that is barred up in his house, is in his garrison with his guard about him, and not so soon attacked by his enemy, as he that roves in the open and unsheltered field. Who knows not the ship to be safer in the bay or harbour, than tossed and beaten in the boiling ocean? Retiredness is more safe than business. We are withdrawn when the veil of night and rest in-wraps us in their dark and silent cabinet.

But with the sun we do disclose and are discovered to our prying enemies. We go abroad to meet what at home does not look after us. He that walks through a fair of beasts, is in hazard to be gored, or kicked, or bruised, or beaten. We pass through briars and thorns and nettles, that will prick and scratch and sting. We are in the day as travelling through a wilderness, where wild and savage creatures are, as well as tamer animals. All the world is Africa, where heat and drought, venom, or something new, does still disturb us. The air, the fire, the earth, and water, are apter all to wound us. The frays, the trains, the incitements, the opportunity, the occasions of offence, the lures and temptings from abroad, and the businesses and accidents of life, deny us any safety but what we have from the favour of protective Providence.

Besides, prayer does sacre all our actions. It is the priming of the soul, that, laying us in the oil of grace, preserves us from the worm and weather. When the mind in the morning opens to God, as the eye to the sun's clear light, by the radiance of the divine beams we become enlightened inwardly all the day. He is lifted in God's service and protection, that makes it his first work to be enrolled by prayer under the standard of the Almighty. It was from hence, sure, that devotion sprung of Christians crossing themselves at their entering upon business. All thriving states have ever sought the gods in their first infancy. The morning in the day is as youth to the life of a man. If that be well seasoned, it is likely that his age may answer it, and be progressive in the path of virtue. To live well every day is the greatest and most important business of man; and being unable for it of himself alone, he needs the more to gain divine assistance. In works of moment, even heathen never ventured without their seeking first such deities as they believed might help them.

"Nothing's well done
But what at first is with the gods begun."

He carries an assistant angel with him for his help that begs his benediction from above; and without it he is lame and unarmed. We do not find that Saul's devotion ever was superlative; yet he was troubled for fear the Philistines should catch him before he had said his prayers. (1 Sam. xiii. 12.) And because he had neglected this he stumbled up an offering, thinking that way to supply it. He that commences with heaven, goes out in all a cataphract. But if any thing happen ill, he walks upon his own's hearts check, if God were not taken along.—Felltham.

ON GRACE IN COMPOSITION.

June 26, 1785.

To your book, sir, I am much obliged on many accounts, particularly for having recalled my mind to subjects of delight, to which it was grown dulled by age and indolence. In consequence of your reclaiming it, I asked myself whence you feel so much disregard for certain authors whose fame is established. You have assigned good reasons for withholding your approbation from some, on the plea of their being imitators—it was natural, then, to ask myself again, whence they had obtained so much celebrity? I think I have discovered a cause, which I do not remember to have seen noted; and that cause I suspect to have been, that certain of those authors possessed grace—do not take me for a disciple of Lord Chesterfield, nor imagine that I mean to erect grace into a capital ingredient of writing—but I do believe that it is a perfume that will preserve from putrefaction; and is distinct even from style, which regards expression; grace, I think, belongs to manner. It is from the charm of grace that I believe some authors, not in your favour, obtained part of their renown. Virgil in particular—and yet I am far from disagreeing with you on his subject in general. There is such a dearth of invention in the Æneid [and when he did invent, it was often so foolishly]: so little good sense, so little variety, and so little power over the passions, that I have frequently said, from contempt for his matter, and from the charm of his harmony, that I believe I should like his poem better, if I was to hear it repeated, and did not understand Latin. On the other hand, he has more than harmony; whatever he utters is said gracefully, and he ennobles his images, especially in the Georgics, or at least it is more sensible there from the humility of the subject. A Roman farmer might not understand his diction in agriculture—but he made a Roman courtier understand farming, the farming of that age; and could captivate a lord of Augustus's bed-chamber, and tempt him to listen to themes of rusticity. Statius and Claudian, though talking of war, would make a soldier despise them as bullies. That graceful manner of thinking in Virgil seems to me to be more than style, if I do not refine too much; and I admire, I confess, Mr. Addison's phrase, that Virgil tossed about his dung with an air of majesty. A style may be excellent without grace—for instance, Dr. Swift's. Eloquence may bestow an immortal style, and one of more dignity; yet eloquence may want that ease, that genteel air that flows from, or constitutes, grace. Addison himself was master of that grace, even in his pieces of humour, and which do not owe their merit to style; and from that combined secret he excels all men that ever lived, but Shakspeare, in humour, by never dropping into an approach towards burlesque and buffoonery, even when his humour descended to characters that, in any other hands, would have been vulgarly low. Is it not clear that Will Whimble was a gentleman, though he always lived at a distance from good company? Fielding had as much humour perhaps as Addison? but having no idea of grace, is perpetually disgusting. His innkeepers and parsons are the grossest of their profession; and his gentlemen are awkward when they should be at their ease.

The Grecians had grace in everything, in poetry, in oratory, in statuary, in architecture, and probably in music and painting. The Romans, it is true, were their imitators; but having grace, too, imparted it to their copies, which gave them a merit that almost raises them to the rank of originals. Horace's odes acquired their fame, no doubt, from the graces of his manner, and purity of his style; the chief praise of Tibullus and Propertius, who certainly cannot boast of more meaning than Horace's odes.

Waller, whom you proscribe, sir, owed his reputation to the graces of his manner, though he frequently stumbled, and even fell flat: but a few of his small pieces are as graceful as possible: one might say, that he excelled in painting ladies in enamel, but could not succeed in portraits in oil large as life. Milton had such superior merit, that I will only say, that if his angels, his Satan, and his Adam, have as much dignity as the Apollo Belvedere, his Eve has all the delicacy and graces of the Venus of Medici, as his descriptions of Eden has the colouring of Albano. Milton's tenderness imprints ideas as graceful as Guido's Madonnas; and the Allegro, Penseroso, and Comus, might be denoted from the three Graces; as the Italians give singular titles to two or three of Petrarch's best sonnets.

Cowley, I think, would have grace (for his mind was graceful) if he had had any ear, or if his taste had not been vitiated by the pursuit of wit; which, when it does not offer itself naturally, degenerates into tinsel or pertness. Pertness is the mistaken affectation of grace, as pedantry produces erroneous dignity; the familiarity of the one, and the clumsiness of the other, distort, or prevent grace. Nature, that furnishes samples of all qualities, and in the scale of gradation exhibits all possible shades, affords us types that are more apposite than words. The eagle is sublime, the lion majestic, the swan graceful, the monkey pert, the bear ridiculously awkward. I mention these as more expressive and comprehensive than I could make definitions of my meaning; but I will apply the swan only, under whose wings I will shelter an apology for Racine, whose pieces give me an idea of that bird. The colouring of the swan is pure, his attitudes are graceful, he never displeases you when sailing on his proper element. His feet may be ugly, his notes hissing, not musical, his walk not natural; he can soar, but it is with difficulty. Still the impression the swan leaves is that of grace—so does Racine.

Boileau may be compared to the dog, whose sagacity is remarkable, as well as its fawning on its master, and its snarling at those it dislikes. If Boileau was too austere to admit the pliability of grace, he compensates by sense and propriety. He is like (for I will drop animals) an upright magistrate whom you respect; but whose justice and severity leave an awe that discourages familiarity. His copies of the ancients may be too servile—but if a good translator deserve praise, Boileau deserves more: he certainly does not fall below his originals; and, considering at what period he wrote, has greater merit still. By his imitations he held out to his countrymen models of taste, and banished totally the bad taste of his predecessors. For his Lutrin, replete with excellent poetry, wit, humour, and satire, he certainly was not obliged to the ancients. Excepting Horace, how little idea had either Greeks or Romans of wit and humour! Aristophanes and Lucian, compared with moderns were, the one a blackguard, the other a buffoon. In my eyes, the Lutrin, the Dispensary, and the Rape of the Lock are standards of grace and elegance not to be paralleled by antiquity; and eternal reproaches to Voltaire, whose indelicacy in the Pucelle degraded him as much, when compared with the three authors I have named, as his Henriade leaves Virgil, and even Lucan, whom he more resembles, by far his superiors. The Dunciad is blemished by the offensive images of the games, but the poetry appears to me admirable; and, though the fourth book has obscurities, I prefer it to the three others. It has descriptions not surpassed by any poet that ever existed; and which surely a writer, merely ingenious, will never equal. The lines on Italy, on Venice, on Convents have all the grace for which I contend, as distinct from poetry, though united with the most beautiful; and the Rape of the Lock, besides the originality of great part of the invention, is a standard of graceful writing.

In general, I believe that what I call grace is denominated elegance; but by grace I mean something higher. I will explain myself by instances; Apollo is graceful, Mercury elegant.

Petrarch perhaps owed his whole merit to the harmony of his numbers and the graces of his style. They conceal his poverty of meaning, and want of variety. His complaints, too, may have added an interest which, had his passion been successful, and had expressed itself with equal sameness, would have made the number of his sonnets insupportable. Melancholy, in poetry, I am inclined to think, contributes to grace, when it is not disgraced by pitiful lamentations, such

"Christopher Plaskwith, Bookseller and Stationer;" on the private door a brass plate, inscribed with "R— and *— Mercury Office, Mr. Plaskwith." Philip applied at the private entrance, and was shown by a "neat-handed Phillis" into a small office-room. In a few minutes the door opened, and the bookseller entered.

Mr. Christopher Plaskwith was a short, stout man, in drab-coloured breeches, and gaiters to match—a black coat and waistcoat—a large watch-chain, with a prodigious bunch of seals, alternated by small keys and old fashioned mourning rings. His complexion was pale and sodden, and his hair short, dark, and sleek. The bookseller valued himself on a likeness to Bonaparte, and affected a short, brusque, peremptory manner, which he meant to be the indication of the vigorous and decisive character of his prototype.

"So you are the young gentleman Mr. Roger Morton recommends?" Here Mr. Plaskwith took out a huge pocket book, slowly unclasped it, staring hard at Philip, with what he designed for a piercing and penetrative survey.

"This is the letter—no! this is Sir Thomas Champerdown's order for fifty copies of the last Mercury, containing his speech at the county meeting. Your age, young man? Only sixteen! look older—that's not it—that's not it—and this is it! Sit down. Yes, Mr. Roger Morton recommends you—a relation—unfortunate circumstances—well educated—my benevolence—hum! Well, young man, what have you to say for yourself?"

"Sir?"

"Can you cast accounts—know bookkeeping?"

"I know something of algebra, sir."

"Algebra! Oh, what else?"

"French and Latin."

"Hum! may be useful. Why do you wear your hair so long? Look at mine. What's your name?"

"Philip Morton."

"Mr. Philip Morton, you have an intelligent countenance—I go a great deal by countenances. You know the terms?—most favourable to you. No premium—I settle that with Roger. I give board and bed—find your own washing. Habits regular—'prenticeship only five years; when over, must not set up in the same town. I will see to the indentures. When can you come?"

"When you please, sir."

"Day after to-morrow, by six o'clock coach."

"But, sir," said Philip, "will there be no salary? Something, ever so small, that I could send to my mother?"

"Salary at sixteen? Board and bed—no premium! Salary! what for? 'Prentices have no salary! You will have every comfort."

"Give me less comfort, that I may give my mother more; a little money, ever so little, and take it out of my board: I can do with one meal a day, sir."

The bookseller was moved; he took a huge pinchful of snuff out of his waistcoat pocket, and mused a moment. He then said as he re-examined Philip,

"Well, young man, I'll tell you what we will do. You shall come here first upon trial—see if we like each other before we sign the indentures—allow you, meanwhile, 5s. a week. If you show talent, will see if I and Roger can settle about some little allowance. That do, eh?"

"I thank you, sir, yes," said Philip, gratefully.

"Settled, then. Follow me—present you to Mrs. P."

Thus saying, Mr. Plaskwith returned the letter to the pocket-book, and the pocket-book to the pocket; and, putting his arms behind his coat tails, threw up his chin, and strode through the passage into a small parlour, that looked upon a small garden. Here, seated round the table, were a thin lady, with a squint, Mrs. Plaskwith; two little girls, the Misses Plaskwith, also with squints and pinafores; a young man of three or four and twenty, in nankeen trousers, a little the worse for washing, and a black velvet jacket and waistcoat. This young gentleman was very much freckled; wore his hair, which was dark and wiry, up at one side, down at the other; had a short, thick nose, full lips, and, when close to him, smelt of cigars. Such was Mr. Plimmins, Mr. Plaskwith's factotem, foreman in the shop, assistant editor to the Mercury. Mr. Plaskwith formally went the round of the introduction: Mrs. P. nodded her head; the Misses P. nudged each other and grinned; Mr. Plimmins passed his hand through his hair, glanced at the glass, and bowed very politely.

"Now, Mrs. P., my second cup, and give Mr. Morton his dish of tea. Must be tired, sir—hot day. Jemima, ring—no, go to the stairs, and call out, 'more buttered toast.' That's the shorter way—promptitude is my rule in life, Mr. Morton. Pray—hum, hum—have you ever, by chance, studied the biography of the great Napoleon Bonaparte?"

Mr. Plimmins gulped down his tea, and kicked Philip under the table. Philip looked fiercely at the foreman, and replied sullenly,

"No, sir."

"That's a pity. Napoleon Bonaparte was a very great man—very! You have seen his cast? There it is, on the dumb waiter! Look at it! See a likeness, eh?"

"Likeness, sir! I never saw Napoleon Bonaparte."

"Never saw him! No! just look round the room. Who does that bust put you in mind of? who does it resemble?"

Here Mr. Plaskwith rose and put himself into an attitude; his hand in his waistcoat, and his face pensively inclined towards the tea-table. "Now fancy me at St. Helena—this table is the ocean. Now, then, who is that cast like, Mr. Philip Morton?"

"I suppose, sir, it is like you!"

"Ah, that it is! Strikes every one! Does it not, Mrs. P., does it not? And, when you have known me longer, you will find a moral similitude—a moral, sir! Straightforward—short—to the point—bold—determined!"

"Bless me, Mr. P.!" said Mrs. Plaskwith, very querulously, "do make haste with your tea: the young gentleman, I suppose, wants to go home, and the coach passes in a quarter of an hour."

"Have you seen Kean in Richard the Third, Mr. Morton?" asked Mr. Plimmins.

"I have never seen a play."

"Never seen a play! How very odd!"

"Not at all odd, Mr. Plimmins," said the stationer. "Mr. Morton has known troubles—so hand him the hot toast."

Silent and morose, but rather disdainful than sad, Philip listened to the babble round him, and observed the ungenial characters with which he was to associate. He cared not to please (that, alas! had never been especially his study;) it was enough for him if he could see, stretching to his mind's eye beyond the walls of that dull room, the long vistas into fairer fortune. At sixteen, what sorrow can freeze the hope, or what prophetic fear whisper "fool" to the ambitious? He would bear back into ease and prosperity, if not into affluence and station, the dear ones left at home. From the eminence of five shillings a week he looked over the Promised Land.

At length, Mr. Plaskwith, pulling out his watch, said, "just in time to catch the coach—make your bow and be off—smart's the word!" Philip rose, took up his hat, made a stiff bow that included the whole group, and vanished with his host.

Mrs. Plaskwith breathed more easily when he was gone.

"I never seed a more odd, fierce ill-bred looking young man! I declare I am quite afraid of him. What an eye he has!"

"Uncommonly dark; what, I may say, gipsy-like," said Mr. Plimmins.

"He! he! You always do say such good things, Plimmins. Gipsy-like! he! he! So he is. I wonder if he can tell fortunes?"

"He'll be long before he has a fortune of his own to tell. Ha! ha!" said Plimmins.

"He! he! how very good! You are so pleasant, Plimmins."

While these strictures on his appearance were still going on, Philip had already ascended the roof of the coach; and waving his hand with the condescension of old times to his future master, was carried away by the "Express" in a whirlwind of dust.

"A very warm evening, sir," said a passenger seated at his right, puffing, while he spoke, from a short German pipe, a volume of smoke into Philip's face.

"Very warm. Be so good as to smoke into the face of the gentleman on the other side of you," returned Philip, petulantly.

"Ho! ho!" replied the passenger, with a loud, powerful laugh—the laugh of a strong man. "You don't take to the pipe yet; you will by and by, when you have known the cares and anxieties that I have gone through. A pipe! It is a great soother! a pleasant comforter! Blue-devils fly before its honest breath! It ripens the brain—it opens the heart; and the man who smokes, thinks like a sage and acts like a Samaritan!"

Roused from his reverie by this quaint and unexpected declamation, Philip turned his quick glance at his neighbour. He saw a man of great bulk and immense physical power—broad shouldered—deep chested—not corpulent, but taking the same girth from bone and muscle that a corpulent man does from flesh. He wore a blue coat—frogged, braided, and buttoned to the throat. A broad brimmed straw hat, set on one side, gave a jaunty appearance to a countenance which, notwithstanding its jovial complexion and smiling mouth, had, in repose, a bold and decided character. It was a face well suited to the frame, inasmuch as it betokened a mind capable of wielding and mastering the brute physical force of body. Light eyes of piercing intelligence; rough, but resolute and striking features, and a jaw of iron. There was thought, there was power, there was passion in the shaggy brow, the deep ploughed lines, the dilated nostril, and the restless play of the lips. Philip looked hard and gravely, and the man returned his look.

"What do you think of me, young gentleman?" asked the passenger, as he replaced the pipe in his mouth. "I am a fine looking man, am I not?"

"You seem a strange one."

"Strange! Ay, I puzzle you, as I have done, and shall do many. You cannot read me as easily as I can read you. Come, shall I guess at your character and circumstances? You are a gentleman, or something like it, by birth—that the tone of your voice tells me. You are poor, devilish poor—that the hole in your coat assures me. You are proud, fiery, discontented, and unhappy—all that I see in your face. It was because I saw those signs that I spoke to you. I volunteer no acquaintance with the happy."

"I dare say not; for, if you know all the unhappy, you must have a sufficiently large acquaintance," returned Philip.

"Your wit is beyond your years! What is your calling, if the question does not offend you?"

"I have none as yet," said Philip, with a slight sigh and a deep blush.

"More's the pity!" grunted the smoker, with a long, emphatic, nasal intonation. "I should have judged that you were a raw recruit in the camp of the enemy."

"Enemy! I don't understand you."

"In other words, a plant growing out of a lawyer's desk. I will explain. There is one class of spiders, industrious, hard working octopodes, who, out of the sweat of their brains (I take it, by the by, that a spider must have a fine cranio-logical development,) make their own webs and catch their own flies. There is another class of spiders who have no stuff in them wherewith to make webs; they, therefore, wander about, looking out for food provided by the toil of their neighbours. Whenever they come to the web of a smaller spider, whose larder seems well supplied, they rush upon his domain—pursue him to his hole—eat him up if they can—reject him if he is too tough for their maws—and quietly possess themselves of all the legs and wings they find dangling in his meshes: these spiders I call enemies—the world calls them lawyers!"

Philip laughed. "And who are the first class of spiders?"

"Honest creatures, who openly confess that they live upon flies. Lawyers fall foul upon them, under pretence of delivering flies from their clutches. They are wonderful bloodsuckers, these lawyers, in spite of all their hypocrisy! Ha! ha! Ho! ho!"

And with a loud, rough chuckle more expressive of malignity than mirth, the man turned himself round, applied himself vigorously to his pipe, and sank into a silence which, as mile after mile glided past the wheels, he did not seem disposed to break. Neither was Philip inclined to be communicative. Considerations for his own state and prospects swallowed up the curiosity he might otherwise have felt as to his singular neighbour. He had not touched food since the early morning. Anxiety had made him insensible to hunger till he arrived at Mr. Plaskwith's; and then, feverish, sore, and sick at heart, the sight of the luxuries gracing the tea-table only revolted him. He did not now feel hunger, but he was fatigued and faint. For several nights the sleep which youth can so ill dispense with had been broken and disturbed; and now, the rapid motion of the coach, and the free current of a fresher and more exhausting air than he had been accustomed to for many months, began to operate on his nerves like the intoxication of a narcotic. His eyes grew heavy; indistinct mists, through which there seemed to glare the various squints of the female Plaskwiths, succeeded the gliding road and the dancing trees. His head fell on his bosom; and thence instinctively seeking the strongest support at hand, inclined towards the stout smoker, and finally nestled itself composedly on that gentleman's shoulder. The passenger, feeling this unwelcome weight, took the pipe, which he had already thrice refilled, from his lips, and emitted an angry and impatient snort; finding that this produced no effect, and that the load grew heavier as the boy's sleep grew deeper, he cried, in a loud voice, "Holla! I did not pay my fare to be your bolster, young man!" and shook himself lustily. Philip started, and would have fallen sidelong from the coach if his neighbour had not gripped him hard with a hand that could have kept a young oak from falling.

"Rouse yourself! You might have had an ugly tumble."

Philip muttered something inaudible between sleeping and waking, and turned his dark eyes towards the man; in that glance there was so much unconscious but sad and deep reproach, that the passenger felt touched and ashamed. Before, however, he could say anything in apology or conciliation, Philip had again fallen asleep. But this time, as if he had felt and resented the rebuff he had received, he inclined his head away from his neighbour, against the edge of a box on the roof: a dangerous pillow, from which any sudden jolt might transfer him to the road below.

"Poor lad! he looks pale!" muttered the man; and he knocked the weed from his pipe, and placed it gently in his pocket. "Perhaps the smoke was too much for him? he seems ill and thin;" and he took the boy's long, lean fingers in his own. "His cheek is hollow! What do I know but it may be with fasting? Pooh! I was a brute. Hush, coachee, hush? Don't talk so loud, and he d—d to you—he will certainly be off;" and the man softly and creepingly encircled the boy's waist with his huge arm. "Now, then, to shift his head; so—so—that's right." Philip's sallow cheek and long hair were now tenderly lapped on the soliloquist's bosom. "Poor wretch! he smiles; perhaps he is thinking of home, and the butterflies he ran after when he was an urchin; they never come back, those days—never—never—never! I think the wind veers to the east; he may catch cold;" and with that, the man, gliding the head for a moment, and with the tenderness of a woman, from his breast to his shoulder, unbuttoned his coat (as he replaced the weight, no longer unwelcome, in its former part,) and drew the lappets closely round the slender frame of the sleeper, exposing his own sturdy breast—for he wore no waistcoat—to the sharpening air. Thus cradled on that stranger's bosom, wrapped from the present, and dreaming, perhaps—while a heart scorched by fierce and terrible struggles with life and sin made his pillow—of a fair and unsullied future, slept the fatherless and friendless boy.

CHAPTER VII.

"Constance. My life, my joy, my food, my all the world, My widow comfort."—King John.

Amid the glare of the lamps, the rattle of carriages, the lumbering of carts and wagons—the throng, the clamour, the reeking life and dissonant roar of London, Philip woke from his happy sleep. He woke, uncertain and confused, and saw strange eyes bent on him kindly and watchfully.

"You have slept well, my lad!" said the passenger, in the deep, ringing voice which made itself heard above all the noises round.

"And you have suffered me to incommode you thus?" said Philip, with more gratitude in his voice and look than, perhaps, he had shown to any one out of his own family since his birth.

"You have had but little kindness shown you, my poor boy, if you think so much of this?"

"No—all people were very kind to me once. I did not value it then." Here the coach rolled heavily down the dark arch of the inn yard.

"Take care of yourself, my boy! You look ill;" and in the dark the man slipped a sovereign into Philip's hand.

"I don't want money, though I thank you heartily all the same; it would be a shame at my age to be a beggar. But can you think of an employment where I can make something?—what they offer me is so trifling. I have a mother and a brother—a mere child, sir—at home."

"Employment!" repeated the man; and, as the coach now stopped at the tavern door, the light from the lamp fell full on his marked face. "Ay, I know of employment; but you should apply to some one else to obtain it for you! As for me, it is not likely that we shall meet again!"

"I am sorry for that! What and who are you?" asked Philip, with rude and blunt curiosity.

"Me!" returned the passenger, with his deep laugh; "oh! I know some people who call me an honest fellow. Take the employment offered you, no matter how trifling: keep out of harm's way. Good night to you!"

So saying, he quickly descended from the roof; and, as he was directing the coachman where to look for his carpet-bag, Philip saw three or four well-dressed-looking men make up to him, shake him heartily by the hand, and welcome him with great seeming cordiality.

Philip sighed. "He has friends," he muttered to himself; and, paying his fare, he turned from the bustling yard, and took his solitary way home.

A week after his visit to R—, Philip was settled on his probation at Mr. Plaskwith's, and Mrs. Morton's health was so decidedly worse, that she resolved to know her fate, and consult a physician. The oracle was at first ambiguous in its response. But when Mrs. Morton said firmly, "I have duties to perform: upon your candid answer rest my plans with respect to my children—left, if I die suddenly, destitute in the world," the doctor looked hard in her face, saw its calm resolution, and replied frankly.

"Lose no time, then, in arranging your plans: life is uncertain with all—with you especially; you may live some time yet, but your constitution is much shaken; I fear there is water on the chest." No, ma'am, no fee. I will see you again."

The physician turned to Sidney, who played with his watch-chain, and smiled up in his face.

"And that child, sir?" said the mother, wistfully, forgetting the dread fiat pronounced against herself; "he is so delicate!"

"Not at all, ma'am—a very fine little fellow;" and the doctor patted the boy's head and abruptly vanished.

"Ah! mamma, I wish you would ride—I wish you would take the white pony!"

"Poor boy! poor boy!" muttered the mother; "I must not be selfish." She covered her face with her hands, and began to think.

Could she, thus doomed, resolve on declining her brother's offer? Did it not, at least, secure bread and shelter to her child? When she was dead, might not a tie between the uncle and nephew be snapped asunder? Would he be as kind to the boy as now, when she could commend him with her own lips to his care—when she could place that precious charge into his hands? With these thoughts, she formed one of those resolutions which have all the strength of self-sacrificing love. She would put the boy from her, her last solace and comfort; she would die alone—alone!

CHAPTER VIII.

"Constance. When I shall meet him in the court of heaven, I shall not know him."—KING JOHN.

ONE evening, the shop closed and the business done, Mr. Roger Morton and his family sat in that snug and comfortable retreat which generally back the ware-rooms of an English tradesman. Happy often, and indeed happy, is that little sanctuary, near to, and yet remote from, the toil and care of the busy mart from which its homely ease and peaceful security are drawn. Glance down those rows of silenced shops in a town at night, and picture the glad and quiet groups gathered within, over that nightly and social meal which custom has banished from the more indolent tribes who neither toil nor spin. Placed between the two extremes of life, the tradesman who ventures not beyond his means, and sees clear books and sure gains, with enough of occupation to give healthful excitement, enough of fortune to greet each new-born child without a sigh, might be envied alike by those above and those below his state—if the restless heart of man ever envied content!

"And so the little boy is not to come?" said Mrs. Morton as she crossed her knife and fork, and pushed away her plate, in token that she had done supper.

"I don't know. Children, go to bed; there—there—that will do. Good-night! Catharine does not say either yes or no. She wants time to consider."

"It was a very handsome offer on our part: some folks never know when they are well off."

"That is very true, my dear, and you are a very sensible person. Kate herself might have been an honest woman, and, what is more, a very rich woman by this time. She might have married Spencer, the young brewer—an excellent man, and well to do!"

"Spencer! I don't remember him."

"No: after she went off, he retired from business and left the place. I don't know what's become of him. He was mightily taken with her, to be sure. She was uncommonly handsome, my sister Catharine."

"Handsome is as handsome does, Mr. Morton," said the wife, who was very much marked with the smallpox. "We all have our temptations and trials: this is a vale of tears, and without grace we are whited sepulchres."

Mr. Morton mixed his brandy and water, and moved his chair into its customary corner.

"You saw your brother's letter," said he, after a pause; "he gives young Philip a very good character."

"The human heart is very deceitful," replied Mrs. Morton, who, by-the-way, spoke through her nose. "Pray Heaven he may be what he seems; but what's bred in the bone comes out in the flesh."

"We must hope the best," said Mr. Morton, mildly; "and—put another lump into the grog, my dear."

"It is a mercy, I'm thinking, that we didn't have the other little boy. I dare say he has never even been taught his catechism; them people don't know what it is to be a mother. And, besides, it would have been very awkward, Mr. M.; we could never have said who he was; and I've no doubt Miss Pryinall would have been very curious."

"Miss Pryinall be ——!" Mr. Morton checked himself, took a large draught of the brandy and water, and added, "Miss Pryinall wants to have a finger in every-body's pie."

"But she buys a deal of flannel, and does great good to the town: it was she who found out that Mrs. Giles was no better than she should be."

"Poor Mrs. Giles? she came to the workhouse."

"Poor Mrs. Giles indeed! I wonder, Mr. Morton, that you, a married man, with a family, should say poor Mrs. Giles!"

"My dear, when people who have been well off come to the workhouse, they may be called poor: but that's neither here nor there; only, if the boy does come to us, we must look sharp upon Miss Pryinall."

"I hope he won't come; it will be very unpleasant. And when a man has a wife and family, the less he meddles with other folks and their little ones, the better. For, as the Scripture says, 'A man shall cleave to his wife, and—'"

Here a sharp, shrill ring at the bell was heard, and Mrs. Morton broke off into,

"Well! I declare! at this hour—who can that be? and all gone to bed! Do go and see, Mr. Morton."

Somewhat reluctantly and slowly, Mr. Morton rose, and, proceeding to the passage, unbarred the door. A brief and muttered conversation followed, to the great irritability of Mrs. Morton, who stood in the passage, the candle in her hand.

"What is the matter, Mr. M.?"

Mr. Morton turned back, looking agitated.

"Where's my hat? Oh, here. My sister is come at the inn."

"Gracious me! She does not go for to say she is your sister?"

"No, no—here's her note—calls herself a lady that's ill. I shall be back soon."

"She can't come here—she sha'n't come here, Mr. M. I'm an honest woman—she can't come here. You understand—"

Mr. Morton had naturally a stern countenance—stern to every one but his wife. The shrill tone to which he was so long accustomed jarred then on his heart as well as ear. He frowned:

"Pshaw! woman, you have no feeling!" said he, and walked out of the house, pulling his hat over his brows.

That was the only rude speech Mr. Morton had ever made to his better half. She treasured it up in her heart and memory; it was associated with the sister and the child; and she was not a woman who ever forgave.

Mr. Morton walked rapidly through the still, moon-lit streets till he reached the inn. A club was held that night in one of the rooms below; and, as he crossed the threshold, the sound of "hip—hip—hurrah!" mingled with the stamping of feet and the jingling of glasses, saluted his entrance. He was a stiff, sober, respectable man; a man who, except at elections—he was a great politician—mixed in none of the revels of his more boisterous townsmen. The sounds, the spot, were ungenial to him. He paused, and the colour of shame rose to his brow. He was ashamed to be there; ashamed to meet the desolate, and, as he believed, erring sister.

A pretty maid-servant, heated and flushed with orders and compliments, crossed his path with a tray full of glasses.

"There's a lady come by the Telegraph?"

"Yes, sir, up stairs, No. 2, Mr. Morton."

Mr. Morton! He shrunk at the sound of his own name. "My wife's right," he muttered. "After all, this is more unpleasant than I thought for."

The slight stairs shook under his hasty tread. He opened the door of No. 2, and that Catharine whom he had last seen at the age of gay sixteen, radiant with bloom, and, but for her air of pride, the model for a Hebe—that Catharine, old ere youth was gone, pale, faded, the dark hair silvered over, the cheeks hollow, and the eye dim—that Catharine fell upon his breast!

"God bless you, brother! How kind to come! How long since we have met!"

"Sit down, Catharine, my dear sister. You are faint—you are very much changed—very. I should not have known you."

"Brother, I have brought my boy: it is painful to part from him—very—very painful; but it is right, and God's will be done." She turned as she spoke towards a little, deformed, rickety dwarf of a sofa, that seemed to hide itself in the darkest corner of the low, gloomy room; and Morton followed her. With one hand she removed the shawl that she had thrown over the child, and, placing the fore finger of the other upon her lips—lips that smiled then—she whispered, "We will not wake him, he is so tired. But I would not put him to bed till you had seen him."

And there slept poor Sidney, his fair cheek pillowed on his arm; the soft, silky ringlets thrown from the delicate and unclouded brow; the natural bloom increased by warmth and travel; the lovely face so innocent and hushed; the breathing so gentle and regular as if never broken by a sigh.

Mr. Morton drew his hand across his eyes.

There was something very touching in the contrast between that wakeful, anxious, forlorn woman, and the slumber of the unconscious boy. And in that moment, what breast upon which the light of Christian pity—of natural affection, had ever dawned, would, even supposing the world's judgment were true, have recalled Catharine's reputed error? There is so divine a holiness in the love of a mother, that, no matter how the tie that binds her to the child was formed, she becomes, as it were, consecrated and sacred; and the past is forgotten, and the world and its harsh verdicts swept away when that love alone is visible; and the God who watches over the little one sheds his smile over the human deputy, in whose tenderness there breathes His own!

"You will be kind to him—will you not?" said Mrs. Morton; and the appeal was made with that trustful, almost cheerful, tone which implies, "Who would not be kind to a thing so fair and helpless?" "He is very sensitive and very docile; you will never have occasion to say a hard word to him—never! You have children of your own, brother!"

"He is a beautiful boy—beautiful. I will be a father to him!"

As he spoke, the recollection of his wife—sour, querulous, austere—came over him; but he said to himself, “She must take to such a child: women always take to beauty.”

He bent down, and gently pressed his lips to Sidney's forehead. Mrs. Morton replaced the shawl, and drew her brother to the other end of the room.

“And now,” she said, colouring as she spoke, “I must see your wife, brother: there is much to say about a child that only a woman will recollect! Is she very good-tempered and kind, your wife? You know I never saw her; you married after—after I left.”

“She is a very worthy woman,” said Mr. Morton, clearing his throat, “and brought me some money; she has a will of her own, as most women have—but that's neither here nor there; she is a good wife as wives go, and prudent and painstaking; I don't know what I should do without her.”

“Brother, I have one favour to request—a great favour.”

“Anything I can do in the way of money?”

“It has nothing to do with money. I can't live long—don't shake your head—I can't live long. I have no fear for Philip; he has so much spirit—such strength of character; but that child! I cannot bear to leave him altogether: let me stay in this town—I can lodge anywhere; but to see him sometimes—to know I shall be in reach if he is ill—let me stay here—let me die here!”

“You must not talk so sadly: you are young yet—younger than I am: I don't think of dying.”

“Heaven forbid! but—”

“Well, well!” interrupted Mr. Morton, who began to fear his feelings would hurry him into some promise which his wife would not suffer him to keep, “you shall talk to Margaret—that is, to Mrs. Morton; I will get her to see you—yes, I think I can contrive that; and if you can arrange with her to stay—but, you see, as she brought the money, and is a very particular woman—”

“I will see her—thank you, thank you—she cannot refuse me.”

“And, brother,” resumed Mrs. Morton, after a short pause, and speaking in a firm voice, “and is it possible that you disbelieve my story? that you, like all the rest, consider my children the sons of shame?”

There was an honest earnestness in Catharine's voice as she spoke that might have convinced many. But Mr. Morton was a man of facts—a practical man—a man who believed that law was always right, and that the improbable was never true.

He looked down as he answered, “I think you have been a very ill-used woman, Catharine, and that is all I can say on that matter: let us drop the subject.”

“No! I was not ill-used; my husband—yes, my husband—was noble and generous from first to last. It was for the sake of his children's prospects, for the expectations they, through him, might derive from his proud uncle, that he concealed our marriage. Do not blame Philip—do not condemn the dead.”

“I don't want to blame any one,” said Mr. Morton, rather angrily; “I am a plain man, a tradesman, and can only go by what in my class seems fair and honest, which I can't think Mr. Beaufort's conduct was, put it how you will; if he marries you as you think, he gets rid of a witness, he destroys a certificate, and he dies without a will. However, all that's neither here nor there. You do quite right not to take the name of Beaufort, since it is an uncommon name, and would always make the story public. Least said soonest mended. You must always consider that your children will be called natural children, and have their own way to make. No harm in that! Warm day for your journey.” Catharine sighed and wiped her eyes: she no longer reproached the world, since the son of her own mother disbelieved her.

The relations talked together for some minutes on the past—the present; but there was embarrassment and constraint on both sides—it was so difficult to avoid one subject; and, after sixteen years of absence, there is little left in common, even between those who once played together round their parents' knees. Mr. Morton was glad at last to find an excuse in Catharine's fatigue to leave her. “Cheer up, and take a glass of something warm before you go to bed. Good-night!” These were his parting words.

Long was the conference and sleepless the couch of Mr. and Mrs. Morton. At first, that estimable lady positively declared she would not and could not visit Catharine: as to receiving her, that was out of the question. But she secretly resolved to give up that point, in order to insist with greater strength upon another, viz., the impossibility of Catharine remaining in the town, such concession for the purpose of resistance being a very common and sagacious policy with married ladies. Accordingly, when suddenly, and with a good grace, Mrs. Morton appeared affected by her husband's eloquence, and said, “Well, poor thing! if she is so ill, and you wish it so much, I will call to-morrow,” Mr. Morton felt his heart softened towards the many excellent reasons which his wife urged against allowing Catharine to reside in the town. He was a political character; he had many enemies; the story of his seduced sister, now forgotten, would certainly be raked up; it would affect his comfort, perhaps his trade, certainly his eldest daughter, who was now thirteen; it would be impossible, then, to adopt the plan hitherto resolved upon—of passing off Sidney as the legitimate orphan of a distant relation; it would be made a great handle for gossip by Miss Pryinall. Added to all these relations, one not less strong occurred to Mr. Morton himself: the uncommon and merciless rigidity of his wife would render all the other women in the town very glad of any topic that would humble her own sense of immaculate propriety. Moreover, he saw that, if Catharine did remain, it would be a perpetual source of irritation in his own home; he was a man who liked an easy life, and avoided, as far as possible, all food for domestic worry. And thus, when at length the wedded pair turned back to back, and composed themselves to sleep, the conditions of peace were settled, and the weak party, as usual in diplomacy, sacrificed to the interests of the united powers.

After breakfast the next morning, Mrs. Morton sallied out on her husband's arm. Mr. Morton was rather a handsome man, with an air and look grave, composed, severe, that had tended much to raise his character in the town. Mrs. Morton was short, wiry, and bony. She had won her husband by making desperate love to him, to say nothing of a dower that enabled him to extend his business, new paint as well as new stock his shop, and rise into the very first rank of tradesmen in his native town. He still believed that she was excessively fond of him; a common delusion of husbands, especially when henpecked. Mrs. Morton was, perhaps, fond of him in her own way; for, though her heart was not warm, there may be a great deal of fondness with very little feeling. The worthy lady was now clothed in her best. She had a proper pride in showing the rewards that belong to female virtue. Flowers adorned her Leghorn bonnet, and her green silk gown boasted four flounces—such then was, I am told, the fashion. She wore, also, a very handsome black shawl, extremely heavy, though the day was oppressively hot, and with a deep border; a smart Sevigné brooch of yellow topazes glittered in her breast; a huge gilt serpent glared from her waistband; her hair, or, more properly speaking, her front, was tortured into very tight curls, and her feet into very tight half-laced boots, from which the fragrance of new leather had not yet departed. It was this last infliction, for il faut souffrir pour être belle, which somewhat yet more acerbated the ordinary acid of Mrs. Morton's temper. The sweetest disposition is ruffled when the shoe pinches; and it happened that Mrs. Roger Morton was one of those ladies who always have chilblains in the winter and corns in the summer.

“So you say your sister is a beauty?”

“Was a beauty, Mrs. M.—was a beauty. People alter.”

“A bad conscience, Mr. Morton, is—”

“My dear, can't you walk faster?”

“If you had my corns, Mr. Morton, you would not talk in that way!”

The happy pair sank into silence, only broken by sundry “How d'ye do's!” and “Good-mornings!” interchanged with their friends, till they arrived at the inn.

“Let us go up quickly,” said Mrs. Morton.

And quiet—quiet to gloom, did the inn, so noisy over-night, seem by morning. The shutters partially closed to keep out the sun; the tap-room deserted; the passage smelling of stale smoke; an elderly dog, lazily snapping at the flies, at the foot of the staircase—not a soul to be seen at the bar. The husband and wife, glad to be unobserved, crept on tiptoe up the stairs, and entered Catharine's apartment.

Catharine was seated on the sofa, and Sidney—dressed, like Mrs. Roger Morton, to look his prettiest, nor yet aware of the change that awaited his destiny, but pleased at the excitement of seeing new friends, as handsome children sure of praise and petting usually are—stood by her side.

“My wife—Catharine,” said Mr. Morton. Catharine rose eagerly, and gazed seawardly on her sister-in-law's hard face. She swallowed the convulsive rising at her heart as she gazed, and stretched out both her hands, not so much to welcome as to plead. Mrs. Roger Morton drew herself up, and then dropped a courtesy—it was an involuntary piece of good breeding—it was extorted by the noble countenance, the matronly mien of Catharine, different from what she had anticipated—she dropped the courtesy, and Catharine took her hand and pressed it.

“This is my son;” she turned away her head. Sidney advanced towards his protectress who was to be, and Mrs. Roger muttered,

“Come here, my dear! A fine little boy!”

“As fine a child as ever I saw!” said Mr. Morton, heartily, as he took Sidney on his lap, and stroked down his golden hair.

This displeased Mrs. Roger Morton, but she sat herself down, and said it was “Very warm.”

“Now go to that lady, my dear,” said Mr. Morton. “Is she not a very nice lady? Don't you think you shall like her very much?”

Sidney, the best-mannered child in the world, went boldly up to Mrs. Morton as he was bid. Mrs. Morton was embarrassed. Some folks are so with other folks' children: a child either removes all constraint from a party, or it increases the constraint tenfold. Mrs. Morton, however, forced a smile, and said, "I have a little boy at home about your age."

"Have you?" exclaimed Catharine, eagerly; and, as if that confession made them friends at once, she drew a chair close to her sister-in-law's: "My brother has told you all?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"And I shall stay here—in the town somewhere—and see him sometimes?"

Mrs. Roger Morton glanced at her husband, her husband glanced at the door, and Catharine's quick eye turned from one to the other.

"Mr. Morton will explain ma'am," said the wife.

"E-hem! Catharine, my dear, I am afraid that is out of the question," began Mr. Morton, who, when fairly put to it, could be business-like enough. "You see by-gones are by-gones, and it is no use raking them up. But many people in the town will recollect you."

"No one will see me—no one, but you and Sidney."

"It will be sure to creep out; won't it, Mrs. Morton?"

"Quite sure. Indeed, ma'am, it is impossible. Mr. Morton is so very respectable, and his neighbours pay so much attention to all he does; and then, if we have an election in the autumn—you see, ma'am, he has a great stake in the place, and is a public character."

"That's neither here nor there," said Mr. Morton. "But, I say, Catharine, can your little boy go into the other room for a moment? Margaret, suppose you take him and make friends."

Delighted to throw on her husband the burden of explanation, which she had originally meant to have all the importance of giving herself, in her most proper and patronising manner, Mrs. Morton twisted her fingers into the boy's hand, and, opening the door that communicated with the bedroom, left the brother and sister alone. And then Mr. Morton, with more tact and delicacy than might have been expected from him, began to soften to Catharine the hardship of the separation he urged. He dwelt principally on what was best for the child. Boys were so brutal in their intercourse with each other. He had even thought it better to represent Philip to Mr. Plaskwith as a more distant relation than he was; and he begged, by-the-by, that Catharine would tell Philip to take the hint. But as for Sidney, sooner or later, he would go to a day-school—have companions of his own age; if his birth were known, he would be exposed to many mortifications—so much better, and so very easy to bring him up as the lawful, that is, as the legal offspring of some distant relation.

"And," cried poor Catharine, clasping her hands, "when I am dead, is he never to know that I was his mother?"

The anguish of that question thrilled the heart of the listener. He was affected below all the surface that worldly thoughts and habits had laid, stratum by stratum, over the humanities within. He threw his arms round Catharine, and strained her to his breast:

"No, my sister, my poor sister, he shall know it when he is old enough to understand and to keep his own secret. He shall know, too, how we all loved and prized you once—how young you were—how flattered and tempted—how you were deceived; for I know that—on my soul I do—I know it was not your fault. He shall know, too, how fondly you loved your child, and how you sacrificed, for his sake, the very comfort of being near him. He shall know it all—all!"

"My brother, my brother, I resign him—I am content. God reward you. I will go—go quickly. I know you will take care of him now."

"And you see," resumed Mr. Morton, resetting himself and wiping his eyes, "it is best, between you and me, that Mrs. Morton should have her own way in this. She is a very good woman—very; but it is prudent not to vex her. You may come in now, Mrs. Morton."

Mrs. Morton and Sidney reappeared.

"We have settled it all," said the husband. "When can we have him?"

"Not to-day," said Mrs. Roger Morton; "you see, ma'am, we must get his bed ready, and his sheets well aired: I am very particular."

"Certainly, certainly. Will he sleep alone?—pardon me."

"He shall have a room to himself," said Mr. Morton. "Eh, my dear? Next to Martha's. Martha is our parlour-maid—very good-natured girl, and fond of children."

Mrs. Morton looked grave, thought a moment, and said, "Yes, he can have that room."

"Who can have that room?" asked Sidney, innocently.

"You, my dear," replied Mr. Morton.

"And where will mamma sleep? I must sleep near mamma."

"Mamma is going away," said Catharine, in a firm voice, in which the despair would only have been felt by the acute ear of sympathy; "going away for a little time; but this gentleman and lady will be very, very kind to you."

"We will do our best, ma'am," said Mrs. Morton.

And, as she spoke, a sudden light broke on the boy's mind; he uttered a loud cry, broke from his aunt, rushed to his mother's breast, and hid his face there, sobbing bitterly.

"I am afraid he has been very much spoiled," whispered Mrs. Roger Morton. "I don't think we need stay any longer—it will look suspicious. Good-morning, ma'am; we shall be ready to-morrow."

"Good-bye, Catharine," said Mr. Morton; and he added, as he kissed her, "Be of good heart; I will come up by myself and spend the evening with you."

It was the night after this interview. Sidney had gone to his new home; they had been all kind to him—Mr. Morton, the children, Martha the parlour-maid. Mrs. Roger herself had given him a large slice of bread and jam, but had looked gloomy all the rest of the evening, because, like a dog in a strange place, he refused to eat. His little heart was full, and his eyes, swimming with tears, were turned at every moment to the door. But he did not show the violent grief that might have been expected. He was naturally timid, and his very desolation, amid the unfamiliar faces, awed and chilled him. But when Martha took him to bed, and undressed him, and he knelt down to say his prayers, and came to the words, "Pray God bless dear mamma, and make me a good child," his heart could contain its load no longer, and he sobbed with a passion that alarmed the good-natured servant. She had been used, however, to children, and she soothed and caressed him, and told him of all the nice things he would do, and the nice toys he would have; and at last, silenced, if not convinced, his eyes closed, and, the tears yet wet on their lashes, fell asleep.

It had been arranged that Catharine should return home that night by a late coach, which left the town at twelve. It was already past eleven. Mrs. Morton had retired to bed; and her husband, who had, according to his wont, lingered behind to smoke a cigar over his last glass of brandy and water, had just thrown aside the stump and was winding up his watch, when he heard a low tap at his window. He stood mute and alarmed, for the window opened on a back lane, dark and solitary at night, and, from the heat of the weather, the iron-cased shutter was not yet closed; the sound was repeated, and he heard a faint voice. He glanced at the poker, and then cautiously moved to the window, and looked forth: "Who's there?"

"It is I—it is Catharine! I cannot go without seeing my boy. I must see him—I must once more!"

"My dear sister, the place is shut up—it is impossible. God bless me, if Mrs. Morton should hear you!"

"I have walked before this window for hours—I have waited till all is hushed in your house—till no one, not even a menial, need see the mother stealing to the bed of her child. Brother! by the memory of our own mother, I command you to let me look, for the last time, upon my boy's face!"

As Catharine said this, standing in that lone street—darkness and solitude below, God and the stars above—there was about her a majesty which awed the listener. Though she was so near, her features were not very clearly visible; but her attitude—her hand raised aloft, the outline of her wasted but still commanding form, were more impressive from the shadowy dimness of the air.

"Come round, Catharine," said Mr. Morton, after a pause; "I will admit you."

He shut the window, stole to the door, unbarred it gently, and admitted his visitor. He bade her follow him; and, shading the light with his hand, crept up the stairs. Catharine's step made no sound.

They passed, unmolested and unheard, the room in which the wife was drowsily reading, according to her custom, before she tied her night-cap and got into bed, a chapter in some pious book. They ascended to the chamber where Sidney lay; Morton opened the door cautiously, and stood at the threshold, so holding the candle that its light might not wake the child, though it sufficed to guide Catharine to the bed. The room was small, perhaps close, but scrupulously clean; for cleanliness was Mrs. Roger Morton's capital virtue. The mother, with a tremulous hand, drew aside the white curtains, and checked her sobs as she gazed on the young, quiet face that was turned towards her. She gazed some moments in passionate silence; who shall say, beneath that silence, what thoughts, what prayers moved and stirred? Then bending down, with pale, convulsive lips, she kissed the little hands thrown so listlessly on the coverlid of the pillow on which the head lay. After this, she turned her face to her brother, with a mute appeal in her glance, took a ring from her finger—a ring that had never till then left it—the ring which Philip Beaufort had placed there the day after that child was born. "Let him wear this round his neck," said she, and stopped, lest she should sob aloud and disturb the boy. In that gift she felt as if she invoked the father's spirit to watch over the friendless orphan; and then, pressing together her own hands firmly, as we do in some paroxysm of great pain, she turned from the room, descended the stairs, gained the street, and muttered to her brother, "I am happy now; peace be on these thresholds!" Before he could answer she was gone.

CHAPTER IX.

"Thus things are strangely wrought,
While joyful May doth last;
Take May in time, when May is gone
The pleasant time is past."

RICHARD EDWARDS: from the Paradise of Dainty Devices.

It was that period of the year when, to those who look on the surface of society, London wears its most radiant smile; when shops are gayest and trade most brisk; when down the thoroughfares roll and glitter the countless streams of indolent and voluptuous life; when the upper class spend and the middle class make: when the ball-room is the market of beauty, and the clubhouse the school for scandal: when the hells yawn for their prey, and the opera-singers and fiddlers—creatures hatched from gold, as the dung-flies from the dung—swarm, and buzz, and fatten round the hide of the gentle Public. In the cant phrase, it was "the London season." And happy, take it altogether, happy above the rest of the year, even for the hapless, is that period of ferment and fever. It is not the season for duns, and the debtor glides about with less anxious eye; and the weather is warm, and the vagrant sleeps, unfrozen, under the starlit portico: and the beggar thrives, and the thief rejoices—for the rankness of the civilisation has superfluities clutched by all. And out of the general corruption things sordid and things miserable crawl forth to bask in the common sunshine—things that perish when the first autumn-winds whistle along the melancholy city. It is the gay time for the heir and the beauty, and the statesman and the lawyer, the mother with her young daughters, and the artist with his fresh pictures, and the poet with his new book. It is the gay time, too, for the starved journeyman, and the ragged outcast, that, with long stride and patient eyes, follows, for pence, the equestrian, who bids him go and be d—d in vain. It is a gay time for the painted harlot in a crimson pelisse; and a gay time for the old hag that loiters round the thresholds of the gin-shop, to buy back, in a draught, the dreams of departed youth. It is gay, in fine, as the fulness of a vast city is ever gay—for Vice as for Innocence, for Poverty as for Wealth. And the wheels of every single destiny wheel on the merrier, no matter whether they are bound to Heaven or to Hell.

Arthur Beaufort, the young heir, was at his father's house. He was fresh from Oxford, where he had already discovered that learning is not better than house and land. Since the new prospects opened to him, Arthur Beaufort was greatly changed. Naturally studious and prudent, had his fortunes remained what they had been before his uncle's death, he would probably have become a laborious and distinguished man. But, though his abilities were good, he had not those restless impulses which belong to genius—often not only its glory, but its curse. The golden rod cast his energies asleep at once.

Good-natured to a fault, and vacillating in character, he adopted the manner and the code of the rich young idlers who were his equals at college. He became, like them, careless, extravagant, and fond of pleasure. This change, if it deteriorated his mind, improved his exterior. It was a change that could not but please women; and, of all women, his mother the most. Mrs. Beaufort was a lady of high birth, and, in marrying her, Robert had hoped much from the interest of her connections; but a change of ministry had thrown her relations out of power; and, beyond her dowry, he obtained no worldly advantage with the lady of his mercenary choice. Mrs. Beaufort was a woman whom a word or two will describe. She was thoroughly common-place; neither bad nor good, neither clever nor silly. She was what is called well-bred; that is, languid, silent, perfectly dressed, and insipid. Of her two children, Arthur was almost the exclusive favourite, especially after he became the heir to such brilliant fortunes. For she was so much the mechanical creature of the world, that even her affection was warm or cold in proportion as the world shone on it. Without being absolutely in love with her husband, she liked him: they suited each other; and (in spite of all the temptations that had beset her in their earlier years—for she had been esteemed a beauty, and lived, as worldly people must do, in circles where examples of unpunished gallantry are numerous and contagious) her conduct had ever been scrupulously correct. She had little or no feeling for misfortunes with which she had never come into contact; for those with which she had—such as the distresses of younger sons, or the errors of fashionable women, or the disappointments of "a proper ambition"—she had more sympathy than might have been supposed, and touched on them with all the tact of well-bred charity and lady-like forbearance. Thus, though she was regarded as a strict person in point of moral decorum, yet in society she was popular—as women at once pretty and inoffensive generally are.

To do Mrs. Beaufort justice, she had not been privy to the letter her husband wrote to Catharine, although not wholly innocent of it. The fact is, that Robert had never mentioned to her the peculiar circumstances that made Catharine an exception from ordinary rules—the generous propositions of his brother to him the night before his death; and, whatever his incredulity as to the alleged private marriage—the perfect loyalty and faith that Catharine had borne to the deceased—he had merely observed, "I must do something, I suppose, for that woman: she very nearly entrapped my poor brother into marrying her; and he would then, for what I know, have cut Arthur out of the estates. Still, I must do something for her—eh?"

"Yes, I think so. What was she—very low?"

"A tradesman's daughter."

"The children should be provided for according to the rank of the mother; that is the general rule in such cases: and the mother should have about the same provision she might have looked for if she had married a tradesman and been left a widow. I dare say she was a very artful kind of person, and don't deserve any thing; but it is always handsomer, in the eyes of the world, to go by the general rules people lay down as to money matters."

So spoke Mrs. Beaufort. She concluded her husband had settled the matter, and never again recurred to it. Indeed, she had never liked the late Mr. Beaufort, whom she considered marvais ton.

In the breakfast-room at Mr. Beaufort's, the mother and son were seated; the former at work, the latter lounging by the window: they were not alone. In a large elbow-chair sat a middle-aged man, listening, or appearing to listen, to the prattle of a beautiful little girl—Arthur Beaufort's sister. This man was not handsome, but there was a certain elegance in his air, and a certain intelligence in his countenance which made his appearance pleasing. He had that kind of eye which is often seen with red hair—an eye of a reddish hazel, with very long lashes; the eyebrows were dark and clearly defined; and the short hair showed to advantage the contour of a small, well-shaped head. His features were irregular; the complexion had been sanguine, but was now faded, and a yellow tinge mingled with the red. His face was more wrinkled, especially round the eyes—which, when he laughed, were scarcely visible—than is usual even in men ten years older. But his teeth were still of a dazzling whiteness; nor was there any trace of decayed health in his countenance. He seemed one who had lived hard, but who had much yet left in the lamp wherewith to feed the wick. At the first glance he appeared slight, as he lolled listlessly in his chair—almost fragile. But, at a nearer examination, you perceived that, in spite of the small extremities and delicate bones, his frame was constitutionally strong. Without being broad in the shoulders, he was exceedingly deep in the chest—deeper than men who seemed giants by his side; and his gestures had the ease of one accustomed to an active life. He had, indeed, been celebrated in his youth for his skill in athletic exercises; but a wound, received in a duel many years ago, had rendered him lame for life—a misfortune which interfered with his former habits, and was said to have soured his temper. This personage, whose position and character will be described hereafter, was Lord Lilburne, the brother of Mrs. Beaufort.

"So, Camilla," said Lord Lilburne to his niece, as carelessly, not fondly, he stroked down her glossy ringlets, "you don't like Berkeley Square as much as you did Gloucester Place?"

"Oh, no! not half as much! You see I never walk out in the fields,* nor make daisy-chains at Primrose Hill. I don't know what mamma means," added the child, in a whisper, "in saying we are better off here."

Lord Lilburne smiled, but the smile was a half sneer.

"You will know quite soon enough, Camilla; the understandings of young ladies grow up very quickly on this side of Oxford-street. Well, Arthur, and what are your plans to-day?"

"Why," said Arthur, suppressing a yawn, "I have promised to ride out with a friend of mine to see a horse that is for sale somewhere in the suburbs."

As he spoke, Arthur rose, stretched himself, looked in the glass, and then glanced impatiently at the window.

"He ought to be here by this time."

"He! who?" said Lord Lilburne; "the horse or the animal—I mean, the friend?"

"The friend," answered Arthur, smiling, but colouring while he smiled, for he half suspected the quiet sneer of his uncle.

"Who is your friend, Arthur?" asked Mrs. Beaufort, looking up from her work.

* Now the Regent's Park.

"Watson, an Oxford man. By the by, I must introduce him to you."

"Watson! What Watson? what family of Watson? Some Watsons are good and some are bad," said Mrs. Beaufort, musingly.

"Then they are very unlike the rest of mankind," observed Lord Lilburne, drily.

"Oh! my Watson is a very gentlemanlike person, I assure you," said Arthur, half laughing, "and you need not be ashamed of him." Then, rather desirous of turning the conversation, he continued, "So my father will be back from Beaufort Court to-day?"

"Yes; he writes in excellent spirits. He says the rents will bear raising at least ten per cent., and that the house will not require much repair."

Here Arthur threw open the window.

"Ah, Watson, how are you? How d'ye do, Marsden? Danvers too! that's capital! the more the merrier! I will be down in an instant. But would you not rather come in?"

"An agreeable inundation," murmured Lord Lilburne. "Three at a time: he takes your house for Trinity College."

A loud, clear voice, however, declined the invitation; the horses were heard pawing without. Arthur seized his hat and whip, and glanced to his mother and uncle smilingly "Good-bye! I shall be out till dinner. Kiss me, my pretty 'Milly!'" And as his sister, who had run to the window, sickening for the fresh air and exercise he was about to enjoy, now turned to him wistful and mournful eyes, the kind-hearted young man took her in his arms, and whispered while he kissed her,

"Get up early to-morrow, and we'll have such a nice walk together."

Arthur was gone; his mother's gaze had followed his young and graceful figure to the door.

"Own that he is handsome, Lilburne. May I not say more—has he not the proper air?"

"My dear sister, your son will be rich. As for his air, he has plenty of airs, but wants graces."

"Then who could polish him like yourself?"

"Probably no one. But had I a son—which Heaven forbid!—he should not have me for his Mentor. Place a young man (go and shut the door, Camilla!) between two vices—women and gambling—if you want to polish him into the fashionable smoothness. Between you and me, the varnish is a little expensive!"

Mrs. Beaufort sighed. Lord Lilburne smiled. He had a strange pleasure in hurting the feelings of others. Besides, he disliked youth: in his own youth he had enjoyed so much that he grew sour when he saw the young.

Meanwhile Arthur Beaufort and his friends, careless of the warmth of the day, were laughing merrily and talking gaily as they made for the suburb of H—.

"It is an out-of-the-way place for a horse, too," said Sir Harry Danvers.

"But I assure you," insisted Mr. Watson, earnestly, "that my groom, who is a capital judge, says it is the cleverest hack he ever mounted. It has won several trotting matches. It belonged to a sporting tradesman, now done up. The advertisement caught me."

"Well," said Arthur, gaily, "at all events, the ride is delightful. What weather! You must all dine with me at Richmond to-morrow—we will row back."

"And a little chicken hazard at the M— afterward," said Mr. Marsden, who was an elder, not a better man than the rest—a handsome saturnine man—who had just left Oxford, and was already known on the turf.

"Anything you please," said Arthur, making his horse curvet.

Oh, Mr. Robert Beaufort! Mr. Robert Beaufort! could you prudent, scheming, worldly heart but feel what devil's tricks your wealth was playing with a son who, if poor, had been the pride of the Beauforts! On one side of our pieces of gold we see the saint trampling down the dragon—false emblem! Reverse it on the coin! In the real use of the gold, it is the dragon who tramples down the saint! But on—on! the day is bright, and your companions merry; make the best of your green years, Arthur Beaufort!

The young men had just entered the suburb of H—, and were spurring on, four abreast, at a canter. At that time an old man, feeling his way before him with a stick—for, though not quite blind, he saw imperfectly—was crossing the road. Arthur and his friends, in loud converse, did not observe the poor passenger. He stopped abruptly, for his ear caught the sound of danger: it was too late: Mr. Marsden's horse, hard-mouthed and high-stepping, came full against him. Mr. Marsden looked down:

"Hang these old men! always in the way," said he, plaintively, and in the tone of a much injured person; and, with that, Mr. Marsden rode on. But the others, who were younger—who were not gamblers—who were not yet grinded down into stone by the world's wheels—the others halted. Arthur Beaufort leaped from his horse, and the old man was already in his arms; but he was severely hurt. The blood trickled from his forehead; he complained of pain in his side and limbs.

"Lean on me, my poor fellow! I will take you home. Do you live far off?"

"Not many yards. This would not have happened if I had had my dog. Never mind, sir, go your way. It is only an old man—what of that? I wish I had my dog."

"I will join you," said Arthur to his friends: "my groom has the direction. I will just take the poor old man home, and send for a surgeon. I shall not be long."

"So like you, Beaufort! the best fellow in the world!" said Mr. Watson, with some emotion. "And there's Marsden positively dismounted and looking at his horse's knees as if they could be hurt! Here's a sovereign for you, my man."

"And here's another," said Sir Harry; "so that's settled. Well, you will join us, Beaufort? You see the yard yonder. We'll wait twenty minutes for you. Come on, Watson."

The old man had not picked up the sovereigns thrown at his feet, neither had he thanked the donors. And on his countenance there was a sour, querulous, resentful expression.

"Must a man be a beggar because he is run over or because he is half blind?" said he, turning his dim, wandering eyes painfully towards Arthur. "Well, I wish I had my dog!"

"I will supply his place," said Arthur, soothingly. "Come, lean on me—heavier—that's right. You are not so bad, eh?"

"Um! the sovereigns! it is wicked to leave them in the kennel!"

Arthur smiled. "Here they are, sir."

The old man slid the coins into his pocket, and Arthur continued to talk, though he got but short answers, and those only in the way of direction, till at last the old man stopped at the door of a small house near the churchyard.

After twice ringing the bell, the door was opened by a middle aged woman, whose appearance was above that of a common menial; dressed, somewhat gaily for her years, in a cap seated very far back on a black toupee, and decorated with red ribands, an apron made out of an Indian silk handkerchief, a puce coloured saracen gown, black silk stockings, long gilt earrings, and a watch at her girdle.

"Bless us and save us, sir! what has happened?" exclaimed this worthy personage, holding up her hands.

"Pish! I am faint; let me in. I don't want your aid any more, sir. Thank you. Good-day!"

Not discouraged by this farewell, the churlish tone of which fell harmless on the invincibly sweet temper of Arthur, the young man continued to assist the sufferer along the narrow passage into a little old fashioned parlour; and no sooner was the owner deposited on his worm-eaten leather chair than he fainted away. On reaching the house, Arthur had sent his servant (who had followed him with the horses) for the nearest surgeon; and while the old lady was still employed, after taking off the sufferer's cravat, in burning feathers under his nose, there was heard a sharp rap and a shrill ring. Arthur opened the door, and admitted a smart little man in nankeen breeches and gaiters. He bustled into the room,

"What's this—bad accident—rode over? Sad thing—very sad. Open the window. A glass of water—a towel. So—so: I see—I see: no fracture—contusion. Help him off with his coat. Another chair, ma'am; put up his poor legs. What age is he, ma'am? Sixty-eight! Too old to bleed. Thank you. How is it, sir? Poorly, to be sure: will be comfortable presently—faintish still? Soon put all to rights."

"Tray! Tray! Where's Tray? Where's my dog, Mrs. Boxer?"

"Lord, sir! what do you want with your dog now? He is in the back yard."

"And what business has my dog in the back yard?" almost screamed the sufferer, in accents that denoted no diminution of vigour. "I thought, as soon as my back was turned, my dog would be ill used! Why did I go without my dog? Let in my dog directly, Mrs. Boxer!"

"All right, you see, sir," said the apothecary, turning to Beaufort; "no cause for alarm—very comforting, that little passion—does him good—sets one's mind easy. How did it happen? Ah, I understand! knocked down—might have been worse. Your groom (sharp fellow!) explained in a trice sir. Thought it was my old friend here by the description. Worthy man—settled here a many year—very odd—eccentric (this in a whisper.) Came off instantly—just at dinner—cold lamb and salad. 'Mrs. Perkins,' says I, 'if any one calls for me, I shall be at No. 4 Prospect Place.' Your servant observed the address, sir. Oh, very sharp fellow! See how the old gentleman takes to his dog—fine little dog—what a stump of a tail! Deal of practice—expect two accouchements every hour. Hot weather for childbirth. So says I to Mrs. Perkins, 'if Mrs. Plummer is taken, or Mrs. Everat, or if old Mr. Grub has another fit, send off at once to No. 4.' Medical men should be always in the way—that's my maxim. Now, sir, where do you feel the pain?"

"In my ears, sir."

"Bless me, that looks bad. How long have you felt it?"

"Ever since you have been in the room."

"Oh, I take. Ha! ha! very eccentric—very!" muttered the apothecary, a little disconcerted. "Well, let him lie down, ma'am. I'll send him a little quieting draught to be taken directly—pill at night, aperient in the morning. If wanted, send for me—always to be found. Bless me, that's my boy Bob's ring! Please to open the door, ma'am. Know his ring—very peculiar knack of his own. Lay ten to one it is Mrs. Plummer, or perhaps Mrs. Everat—her ninth child in eight years—in the grocery line. A woman in a thousand, sir!"

Here a thin boy, with very short coat sleeves and very large hands, burst into the room with his mouth open.

"Sir—Mr. Perkins—sir!"

"I know—I know—coming. Mrs. Plummer or Mrs. Everat?"

"No, sir, it be the poor lady at Mrs. Lacy's; she be taken desperate. s. Lacy's girl has just been over to the shop, and made me run here to you, sir."

"Mrs. Lacy's! Oh, I know. Poor Mrs. Morton! Bad case—very bad—must be off. Keep him quiet, ma'am. Good-day! Look in to-morrow—nine o'clock. Put a little lint with the lotion on the head, ma'am. Mrs. Morton! Ah! bad job that."

Here the apothecary had shuffled himself off to the street door, when Arthur laid his hand on his arm.

"Mrs. Morton! Did you say Morton, sir? What kind of a person—is she very ill?"

"Hopeless case, sir—general break-up. Nice woman—quite the lady—known better days, I'm sure."

"Has she any children—sons?"

"Two—both away now—fine lads—quite wrapped up in them—youngest especially."

"Good Heavens! it must be she—ill, and dying, and destitute, perhaps," exclaimed Arthur, with real and deep feeling; "I will go with you, sir. I fancy that I know this lady—that (he added, generously) I am related to her."

"Do you? Glad to hear it. Come along, then; she ought to have some one near her besides servants: not but what Jenny, the maid, is uncommonly kind. Dr. ———, who attends her sometimes, said to me, says he, 'it is the mind, Mr. Perkins; I wish we could get back her boys.'"

"And where are they?"

"Prenticed out, I fancy. Master Sidney—"

"Sidney!"

"Ah! that was his name—pretty name. D'ye know Sir Sidney Smith!—extraordinary man, sir! Master Sidney was a beautiful child—quite spoiled. She always fancied him ailing—always sending for me. 'Mr. Perkins,' said she, 'there's something the matter with my child; I'm sure there is, though he won't own it. He has lost his appetite—had a headache last night.' 'Nothing the matter, ma'am,' says I; 'wish you'd think more of yourself.' These mothers are silly, anxious, poor creatures. Nater, sir, nater—wonderful thing—nater! Here we are."

And the apothecary knocked at the private door of a milliner and hosier's shop.

CHAPTER X.

"Thy child shall live, and I will see it nourished."
Titus Andronicus.

As might be expected, the excitement and fatigue of Catharine's journey to N—— had considerably accelerated the progress of disease. And when she reached home, and looked round the cheerless rooms, all solitary, all hushed—Sidney gone, gone from her for ever—she felt, indeed, as if the last reed on which she had leaned was broken, and her business upon earth was done. Catharine was not condemned to absolute poverty: the poverty which grinds and gnaws, the poverty of rags and famine. She had still left nearly half of such portion of the little capital, realised by the sale of her trinkets, as had escaped the clutch of the law; and her brother had forced into her hands a note for 20*l.*, with an assurance that the same sum should be paid to her half yearly. Alas! there was little chance of her needing it again! She was not, then, in want of means to procure the common comforts of life. But now a new passion had entered into her breast—the passion of the miser; she wished to hoard every sixpence as some little provision for her children. What was the use of her feeding a lamp nearly extinguished, and which was fated to be soon broken up, and cast amid the vast lumber-house of death! She would willingly have removed into a more homely lodging, but the servant of the house had been so fond of Sidney, so kind to him. She clung to one familiar face on which there seemed to live the reflection of her child's. But she relinquished the first floor for the second; and there, day by day, she felt her eyes grow heavier and heavier beneath the clouds of the last sleep. Besides the aid of Mr. Perkins, a kind enough man in his way, the good physician whom she had before consulted still attended her, and—refused his fee. Shocked at perceiving that she rejected every little alleviation of her condition, and wishing, at least, to procure for her last hours the society of one of her sons, he had inquired the address of the elder; and on the day preceding the one in which Arthur discovered her abode, he despatched to Philip the following letter:

"Sir,—Being called in to attend your mother in a lingering illness, which I fear may prove fatal, I think it my duty to request you to come to her as soon as you receive this. Your presence cannot but be a great comfort to her. The nature of her illness is such that it is impossible to calculate exactly how long she may be spared to you; but I am sure that her fate might be prolonged, and her remaining days more happy, if she could be induced to remove into a better air and a more quiet neighbourhood, to take more generous sustenance, and, above all, if her mind could be set more at ease as to your and your brother's prospects. You must pardon me if I have seemed inquisitive; but I have sought to draw from your mother some particulars as to her family and connections, with a wish to represent to them her state of mind. She is, however, very reserved on these points. If, however, you have relations well to do in the world, I think some application to them should be made. I fear the state of her affairs weighs much upon your poor mother's mind; and I must leave you to judge how far it can be relieved by the good feeling of any persons upon whom she may have legitimate claims. At all events, I repeat my wish that you should come to her forthwith. I am, &c.,

After he had despatched this letter, a sudden and marked alteration for the worse took place in his patient's disorder; and in the visit he had paid that morning, he saw cause to fear that her hours on earth would be much fewer than he had before anticipated. He had left her, however, comparatively better; but, two hours after his departure, the symptoms of her disease had become very alarming, and the good natured servant girl, her sole nurse, and who had, moreover, the whole business of the other lodgers to attend to, had, as we have seen, thought it necessary to summon the apothecary in the interval that must elapse before she could reach the distant part of the metropolis in which Dr. ——— resided.

On entering the chamber, Arthur felt all the remorse, which of right belonged to his father, press heavily on his soul. What a contrast, that mean and solitary chamber, and its comfortless appurtenances, to the graceful and luxurious abode, where, full of health and hope, he had last beheld her, the mother of Philip Beaufort's children! He remained silent till Mr. Perkins, after a few questions, retired to send his drugs. He then approached the bed; Catharine, though very weak and suffering much pain, was still sensible. She turned her dim eyes on the young man, but she did not recognise his features.

"You do not remember me?" said he, in a voice struggling with tears: "I am Arthur—Arthur Beaufort."

Catharine made no answer.

"Good God! why do I see you here? I believed you with your friends—your children; provided for, as became my father to do. He assured me that you were so."

Still no answer.

And then the young man, overpowered with the feelings of a sympathising and generous nature, forgetting for a while Catharine's weakness, poured forth a torrent of inquiries, regrets, and self-upbraidings, which Catharine at first little heeded. But the name of her children, repeated again and again, struck upon that chord which, in a woman's heart, is the last to break; and she raised herself in her bed, and looked at her visitor wistfully.

"Your father," she said, then, "your father was unlike my Philip: but I see things differently now. For me, all bounty is too late; but my children—to-morrow they may have no mother. The law is with you, but not justice! You will be rich and powerful—will you befriend my children?"

"Through life, so help me Heaven!" exclaimed Arthur, falling on his knees beside the bed.

What then passed between them it is needless to detail; for it was little, save broken repetitions of the same prayer and the same response. But there was so much truth and earnestness in Arthur's voice and countenance, that Catharine felt as if an angel had come there to administer comfort. And when, late in the day, the physician entered, he found his patient leaning on the breast of her young visitor, and looking on his face with a happy smile.

The physician gathered enough from the appearance of Arthur and the gossip of Mr. Perkins to conjecture that one of the rich relations he had attributed to Catharine was arrived. Alas for her it was now too late!

CHAPTER XI.

"D'ye stand amazed? Look o'er thy head, Maximilian Look to the terror which overhangs thee."

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: The Prophetess.

Philip had been five weeks in his new home: in another week he was to enter on his articles of apprenticeship. With a stern, unbending gloom of manner, he had entered on the duties of his novitiate. He submitted to all that was enjoined him. He seemed to have lost for ever the wild and unruly waywardness that had stamped his boyhood; but he was never seen to smile—he scarcely ever opened his lips. His very soul seemed to have quitted him with its faults; and he performed all the functions of his situation with the quiet, listless regularity of a machine. Only when the work was done and the shop closed, instead of joining the family circle in the back parlour, he would stroll out in the dusk of evening, away from the town, and not return till the hour at which the family retired to rest. Punctual in all he did, he never exceeded that hour. He had heard once a week from his mother; and only on the mornings in which he expected a letter did he seem restless and agitated. Till the postman entered the shop he was pale as death; his hand trembling, his lips compressed. When he read the letter he became composed; for Catharine sedulously concealed from her son the state of her health; she wrote cheerfully, besought him to content himself with the state into which he had fallen, and expressed her joy that in his letters he intimated that content; for the poor boy's letters were not less considerate than her own. On her return from her brother, she had so far silenced or concealed her misgivings as to express satisfaction at the home she had provided for Sidney; and she even held out hopes of some future, when, their probation finished and their independence secured, she might reside with her sons alternately. These hopes redoubled Philip's assiduity, and he saved every shilling of his weekly stipend; and sighed as he thought that, in another week, his term of apprenticeship would commence, and the stipend cease.

Mr. Plaskwith could not but be pleased, on the whole, with the diligence of his assistant, but he was chafed and irritated by the sullenness of his manner. As for Mrs. Plaskwith, poor woman! she positively detested the taciturn and moody boy, who never mixed in the jokes of the circle, nor played with the children, nor complimented her, nor added, in short, anything to the sociability of the house. Mr. Plimmins, who had at first sought to condescend, next sought to bully; but the gaunt frame and savage eye of Philip awed the smirk youth in spite of himself; and he confessed to Mrs. Plaskwith that he should not like to meet "the gipsy" alone on a dark night; to which Mrs. Plaskwith replied, as usual, "that Mr. Plimmins always did say the best things in the world!"

One morning Philip was sent some miles into the country, to assist in cataloguing some books in the library of Sir Thomas Champerdown; that gentleman, who was a scholar, having requested that some one acquainted with the Greek character might be sent to him, and Philip being the only one in the shop who possessed such knowledge.

It was evening before he returned. Mr. and Mrs. Plaskwith were both in the shop as he entered; in fact, they had been employed in talking him over.

"I can't abide him!" cried Mrs. Plaskwith. "If you choose to take him for good, I sha'n't have an easy moment. I'm sure the 'prentice that cut his master's throat at Chatham last week was just like him."

"Pshaw, Mrs. P.!" said the bookseller, taking a huge pinch of snuff, as usual, from his waistcoat pocket. "I myself was reserved when I was young—all reflective people are. I may observe, by the by, that it was the case with Napoleon Bonaparte: still, however, I must own he is a disagreeable youth, though he attends to his business."

"And how fond of his money he is!" remarked Mrs. Plaskwith; "he won't buy himself a new pair of shoes! quite disgraceful! And did you see what a look he gave Plimmins, when he joked about his indifference to his sole? Plimmins always does say such good things!"

"He is shabby, certainly," said the bookseller; "but the value of a book does not always depend on the binding."

"I hope he is honest!" observed Mrs. Plaskwith; and here Philip entered.

"Hum!" said Mr. Plaskwith, "you have had a long day's work; but I suppose it will take a week to finish!"

"I am to go again to-morrow morning, sir: two days more will conclude the task."

"There's a letter for you," cried Mrs. Plaskwith; "you owes me for it."

"A letter!" It was not his mother's hand—it was a strange writing; he gasped for breath as he broke the seal. It was the letter of the physician.

His mother, then, was ill—dying—wanting, perhaps, the necessaries of life. She would have concealed from him her illness and her poverty. His quick alarm exaggerated the last into utter want; he uttered a cry that rang through the shop, and rushed to Mr. Plaskwith.

"Sir, sir! my mother is dying! She is poor, poor—perhaps starving; money, money!—lend me money!—ten pounds!—five! I will work for you all my life for nothing, but lend me the money!"

"Hoity-toity!" said Mrs. Plaskwith, nudging her husband; "I told you what would come of it; it will be 'money or life' next time."

Philip did not heed or hear this address, but stood immediately before the bookseller, his hands clasped, wild impatience in his eyes. Mr. Plaskwith, somewhat stupefied, remained silent.

"Do you hear me? Are you human?" exclaimed Philip, his emotion revealing at once all the fire of his character. "I tell you my mother is dying; I must go to her! Shall I go empty-handed? Give me money!"

Mr. Plaskwith was not a bad hearted man; but he was a formal man, and an irritable one. The tone his shopboy (for so he considered Philip) assumed to him, before his own wife too, (examples are very dangerous,) rather exasperated than moved him.

"That's not the way to speak to your master! You forget yourself, young man!"

"Forget! But, sir, if she has not necessaries—if she is starving!"

"Fudge!" said Mr. Plaskwith. "Mr. Morton writes me word that he has provided for your mother! Does not he, Hannah?"

"More fool he, I'm sure, with such a fine family of his own! Don't look at me in that way, young man; I won't take it—that I won't! I declare my blood friz to see you!"

"Will you advance me money? Five pounds—only five pounds, Mr. Plaskwith?"

"Not five shillings! Talk to me in this style!—not the man for it, sir!—highly improper. Come, shut up the shop, and recollect yourself; and perhaps, when Sir Thomas's library is done, I may let you go to town. You can't go to-morrow. All a sham, perhaps—eh, Hannah?"

"Very likely! Consult Plimmins. Better come away now, Mr. P. He looks like a young tiger."

Mrs. Plaskwith quitted the shop for the parlour. Her husband, putting his hands behind his back, and throwing back his chin, was about to follow her. Philip, who had remained for the last moment mute and white as stone, turned abruptly: and his grief taking rather the tone of rage than supplication, he threw himself before his master, and, laying his hand on his shoulder, said,

"I leave you—do not let it be with a curse. I conjure you, have mercy on me!"

Mr. Plaskwith stopped; and, had Philip then taken but a milder tone, all had been well. But, accustomed from childhood to command—all his fierce passions loose within him—despising the very man he thus implored, the boy ruined his own cause. Indignant at the silence of Mr. Plaskwith, and too blinded by his emotions to see that in that silence there was relenting, he suddenly shook the little man with a vehemence that almost overset him, and cried,

"You, who demand for five years my bones and blood—my body and soul—a slave to your vile trade—do you deny me bread for a mother's lips?"

Trembling with anger, and perhaps fear, Mr. Plaskwith extricated himself from the gripe of Philip, and hurrying from the shop, said, as he banged the door,

"Beg my pardon for this to-night, or out you go to-morrow, neck and crop! Zounds! a pretty pass the world's come to! I don't believe a word about your mother. Baugh!"

Left alone, Philip remained for some moments struggling with his wrath and agony. He then seized his hat, which he had thrown off on entering, pressed it over his brows, and turned to quit the shop, when his eye fell upon the till. Plaskwith had left it open, and the gleam of the coin struck his gaze—that deadly smile of the arch tempter. Intellect, reason, conscience—all, in that instant, were confusion and chaos. He cast a hurried glance round the solitary and darkening room; plunged his hand into the drawer; clutched—he knew not what—silver or gold, as it came uppermost, and burst into a loud and bitter laugh. That laugh itself startled him; it did not sound like his own. His cheek turned white, and his knees knocked together; his hair bristled; he felt as if the very fiend had uttered that yell of joy over a fallen soul.

"No, no, no!" he muttered; "no, my mother, not even for thee!" And, dashing the money to the ground, he fled like a maniac from the house.

At a later hour that same evening, Mr. Robert Beaufort returned from his country mansion to Berkeley Square. He found his wife very uneasy and nervous about the non-appearance of their only son. He had sent home his groom and horses about seven o'clock, with a hurried scroll, written in pencil on a blank page torn from his pocket-book, and containing only these words:

"Don't wait dinner for me—I may not be home for some hours. I have met with a melancholy adventure. You will approve what I have done when we meet."

This note a little perplexed Mr. Beaufort; but, as he was very hungry, he turned a deaf ear both to his wife's conjectures and his own surmises till he had refreshed himself; and then he sent for the groom, and learned that, after the accident to the blind man, Mr. Arthur had been left at a hosier's in H——. This seemed to him extremely mysterious; and, as hour after hour passed away, and still Arthur came not, he began to imbibe his wife's fears, which were now wound up almost to hysterics; and, just at midnight, he ordered his carriage, and, taking with him the groom as a guide, set off to the suburban region. Mrs. Beaufort had wished to accompany him; but the husband observing that young men would be young men, and that there might possibly be a lady in the case, Mrs. Beaufort, after a pause of thought, passively agreed that, all things considered, she had better remain at home. No lady of proper decorum likes to run the risk of finding herself in a false position. Mr. Beaufort accordingly set out alone. Easy was the carriage, swift were the steeds, and luxuriously the wealthy man was whirled along. Not a suspicion of the true cause of Arthur's detention crossed him; but he thought of the snares of London—of artful females in distress; "a melancholy adventure" generally implies love for the adventure, and money for the melancholy; and Arthur was young—generous—with a heart and a pocket equally open to imposition. Such scrapes, however, do not terrify a father when he is a man of the world, so much as they do an anxious mother; and, with more curiosity than alarm, Mr. Beaufort, after a short doze, found himself before the shop indicated.

Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, the door to the private entrance was ajar: a circumstance which seemed very suspicious to Mr. Beaufort. He pushed it open with caution and timidity; a candle, placed upon a chair in the narrow passage, threw a sickly light over the flight of stairs, till swallowed up by the deep shadow thrown from the sharp angle made by the ascent. Robert Beaufort stood a moment in some doubt whether to call, to knock, to recede, or to advance, when a step was heard upon the stairs above—it came nearer and nearer—a figure emerged from the shadow of the last landing place—and Mr. Beaufort, to his great joy, recognised his son.

Arthur did not, however, seem to perceive his father; and was about to pass him, when Mr. Beaufort laid his hand on his arm.

"What means all this, Arthur? What place are you in? How you have alarmed us!"

Arthur cast a look upon his father of sadness and reproach.

"Father," he said, in a tone that sounded stern—almost commanding, "I will show you where I have been: follow me—nay, I say, follow."

He turned, without another word reascended the stairs, and Mr. Beaufort, surprised and awed into mechanical obedience, did as his son desired. At the landing place of the second floor, another long-wicked, neglected, ghastly candle emitted its cheerless ray. It gleamed through the open door of a small bedroom to the left, through which Beaufort perceived the forms of two women. One (it was the kindly maid-servant) was seated on a chair, and weeping bitterly; the other (it was a hireling nurse, in the first and last day of her attendance) was unpinning her dingy shawl before she lay down to take a nap. She turned her vacant, listless face upon the two men, put on a doleful smile, and decently closed the door.

"Where are we, I say, Arthur?" repeated Mr. Beaufort.

Arthur took his father's hand, drew him into a room to the right, and taking up the candle, placed it on a small table beside a bed, and said, "Here, sir—in the presence of Death!"

Mr. Beaufort cast a hurried and fearful glance on the still, wan, serene face beneath his eyes, and recognised in that glance the features of the neglected and the once adored Catharine.

"Yes—she whom your brother so loved—the mother of his children—died in this squalid room, and far from her sons, in poverty, in sorrow!—died of a broken heart! Was that well, father? Have you in this nothing to repent?"

Conscience stricken and appalled, the worldly man sank down on a seat beside the bed, and covered his face with his hands.

"Ay," continued Arthur, almost bitterly, "ay, we, his nearest kin—we, who have inherited his lands and gold—we have been thus heedless of that great legacy your brother bequeathed to us: the things dearest to him—the woman he loved—the children his death cast, nameless and branded, on the world. Ay, weep, father: and while you weep, think of the future—of reparation. I have sworn to that clay to befriend her sons; join you, who have all the power, to fulfil the promise—join in that vow; and may Heaven not visit on us both the woes of this bed of death."

"I did not know—I—I—" faltered Mr. Beaufort.

"But we should have known," interrupted Arthur, mournfully. "Ah, my dear father! do not harden your heart by false excuses. The dead still speaks to you, and commends to your care her children. My task here is done: oh, sir! yours is to come. I leave you alone with the dead."

So saying, the young man, whom the tragedy of the scene had worked into a passion and a dignity above his usual character, unwilling to trust farther to his emotions, turned abruptly from the room, fled rapidly down the stairs, and left the house. As the carriage and liveries of his father met his eye, he groaned, for their evidences of comfort and wealth seemed a mockery to the deceased: he averted his face and walked on. Nor did he perceive or heed a form that at that instant rushed by him—pale, haggard, breathless—towards the house which he had quitted, and the door of which he left open, as he had found it—open, as the physician had left it when hurrying, ten minutes before the arrival of Mr. Beaufort, from the spot where his skill was impotent. Wrapped in gloomy thought, alone, and on foot—at that dreary hour, and in that remote suburb—the heir of the Beauforts sought his splendid home. Anxious, fearful, hoping, the outcast orphan flew on to the death-room of his mother.

Mr. Beaufort, who had but imperfectly heard Arthur's parting accents, lost and bewildered by the strangeness of his situation, did not at first perceive that he was left alone. Surprised, and chilled by the sudden silence of the chamber, he rose, withdrew his hands from his face, and again he saw that countenance so mute and solemn. He cast his gaze round the dismal room for Arthur; he called his name—no answer came; a superstitious tremour seized upon him; his limbs shook; he sunk once more on his seat, and closed his eyes, muttering, for the first time, perhaps, since his childhood, words of penitence and prayer. He was roused from the bitter selfabstraction by a deep groan. It seemed to come from the bed. Did his ears deceive him? Had the dead found a voice? He started up in an agony of dread, and saw opposite to him the livid countenance of Philip Morton: the Son of the Corpse had replaced the Son of the Living Man! The dim and solitary light fell upon that countenance. There, all the bloom and freshness natural to youth seemed blasted! There, on those wasted features, played all the terrible power and glare of precocious passions—rage, wo, scorn, despair. Terrible is it to see upon the face of a boy the storm and whirlwind that should visit only the strong heart of a man!

"She is dead! dead! and in your presence!" shouted Philip, with his wild eyes fixed upon the cowering uncle; "dead with care, perhaps with famine. And you have come to look upon your work!"

"Indeed," said Beaufort, deprecatingly, "I have but just arrived: I did not know she had been ill or in want, upon my honour. This is all a—a—mistake: I—I—came in search of—of—another—"

"You did not, then, come to relieve her!" said Philip, very calmly. "You had not learned her suffering and distress, and flown hither in the hope that there was yet time to save her! You did not do this? Ha! ha! why did I think it?"

"Did any one call, gentlemen?" said a whining voice at the door; and the nurse put in her head.

"Yes—yes—you may come in," said Beaufort, shaking with nameless and cowardly apprehension; but Philip had flown to the door, and, gazing on the nurse, said.

"She is a stranger! see, a stranger! The son now has assumed his post. Begone, woman!" And he pushed her away, and drew the bolt across the door.

And then there looked upon him, as there had looked upon his reluctant companion, calm and holy, the face of the peaceful corpse. He burst into tears, and fell on his knees so close to Beaufort that he touched him; he took up the heavy hand, and covered it with burning kisses.

"Mother! mother! do not leave me! Wake—smile once more on your son! I would have brought you money, but I could not have asked for your blessing then; mother, I ask it now!"

"If I had but known—if you had but written to me, my dear young gentleman—but my offers had been refused and—"

"Offers of a hireling's pittance to her—to her for whom my father would have coined his heart's blood into gold! My father's wife! his wife! offers—"

He rose suddenly, folded his arms, and, facing Beaufort with a fierce, determined brow, said,

"Mark me; you hold the wealth that I was trained from my cradle to consider my heritage. I have worked with these hands for bread, and never complained, except to my own heart and soul. I never hated and never cursed you—robber as you were—yes, robber! For, even were there no marriage save in the sight of God, neither my father, nor Nature, nor Heaven meant that you should seize all, and that there should be nothing due to the claims of affection and blood. He was not the less my father, even if the Church spoke not on my side. Despoiler of the orphan and derider of human love, you are not the less a robber, though the law fences you round, and men call you honest! But I did not hate you for this. Now, in the presence of my dead mother—dead far from both her sons—now I abhor and curse you. You may think yourself safe when you quit this room—safe, and from my hatred; you may be so; but do not deceive yourself; the curse of the widow and the orphan shall pursue—it shall cling to you and yours—it shall gnaw your heart in the midst of splendour—it shall cleave to the heritage of your son! There shall be a deathbed yet, beside which you shall see the spectre of her, now so calm, rising for retribution from the grave! These words—no, you never shall forget them—years hence they shall ring in your ears, and freeze the marrow of your bones! And now begone, my father's brother—begone from my mother's corpse to your luxurious home!"

He opened the door and pointed to the stairs. Beaufort, without a word, turned from the room and departed. He heard the door closed and locked as he descended the stairs; but he did not hear the deep groans and vehement sobs in which the desolate orphan gave vent to the anguish which succeeded to the less sacred paroxysm of revenge and wrath.

The time employed by Mr. Beaufort in reaching his home was haunted by gloomy and confused terrors. He felt inexplicably as if the denunciations of Philip were to visit less himself than his son. He trembled at the thought of Arthur meeting this strange, wild, exasperated scatterling—perhaps on the morrow—in the very height of his passions. And yet, after the scene between Arthur and himself, he saw cause to fear that he might not be able to exercise a sufficient authority over his son, however naturally facile and obedient, to prevent his return to the house of death. In this dilemma he resolved, as is usual with cleverer men, even when yoked to yet feebler helpmates, to hear if his wife had anything comforting or sensible to say upon the subject. Accordingly, on reaching Berkeley Square, he went straight to Mrs. Beaufort, and, having relieved her mind as to Arthur's safety, related the scene in which he had been so unwilling an actor. With that more lively susceptibility which belongs to most women, however comparatively unfeeling, Mrs. Beaufort made greater allowance than her husband for the excitement Philip had betrayed. Still Beaufort's description of the dark menaces, the fierce countenance, the brigand-like form of the bereaved son, gave her very considerable apprehensions for Arthur, should the young men meet: and she willingly coincided with her husband in the propriety of using all means of parental persuasion or command to guard against such an encounter. But, in the mean while, Arthur returned not, and new fears seized the anxious parents. He had gone forth alone, in a remote suburb of the metropolis, at a late hour, himself under strong excitement. He might have returned to the house, or have lost his way amid some dark haunts of violence and crime; they knew not where to send or what to suggest. Day already began to dawn, and still he came not. At length, towards five o'clock, a loud rap was heard at the door, and Mr. Beaufort, hearing some bustle in the hall, descended. He saw his son borne into the hall from a hackney-coach by two strangers, pale, bleeding, and apparently insensible. His first thought was that he had been murdered by Philip. He uttered a feeble cry, and sank down beside his son.

"Don't be darnted, sir," said one of the strangers, who seemed an artisan; "I don't think he be much hurt. You sees he was crossing the street, and the coach ran against him; but it did not go over his head; it be only the stones that make him bleed so; and that's a mercy."

"A providence, sir," said the other man; "but Providence watches over us all, night and day, sleep or wake. Hem! We were passing at the time from the meeting—the Odd Fellows, sir—and so we took him, and got him a coach; for we found his card in his pocket. He could not speak just then; but the rattling of the coach did him a deal of good, for he groaned—my eyes! how he groaned—did not he, Burrows?"

"It did one's heart good to hear him."

"Run for Astley Cooper—you—go to Brodie. Good God! he is dying. Be quick—quick!" cried Mr. Beaufort to his servants, while Mrs. Beaufort, who had now gained the spot, with greater presence of mind, had Arthur conveyed into his room.

"It is a judgment upon me!" groaned Beaufort, rooted to the stone of his hall, and left alone with the strangers.

"No, sir, it is not a judgment, it is a providence," said the more sanctimonious and better dressed of the two men: "for, put the question, if it had been a judgment, the wheel would have gone over him; and, whether he dies or not, I shall always say that if that's not a providence, I don't know what is. We have come a long way, sir; and Burrows is a poor man, though I'm well to do."

This hint for money restored Beaufort to his recollection; he put his purse into the nearest hand outstretched to clutch it, and muttered out something like thanks.

"Sir, may the Lord bless you! and I hope the young gentleman will do well. I am sure you have cause to be thankful that he was within an inch of the wheel; was not he, Burrows? Well, it's enough to convert a heathen. But the ways of Providence are mysterious, and that's the truth of it. Good-night, sir."

Certainly it did seem as if the curse of Philip was already at its work. An accident almost similar to that which, in the adventure of the blind man, had led Arthur to the clew of Catharine, within twenty-four hours stretched Arthur himself upon his bed. The sorrow Mr. Beaufort had not relieved was now at his own hearth. But there were parents and nurses, and great physicians and skilful surgeons, and all the army that combine against Death; and there were ease, and luxury, and kind eyes, and pitying looks, and all that can take the sting from pain. And thus, the very night on which Catharine had died, broken down and worn-out, upon a strange breast, with a feeble doctor, and by the ray of a single candle, the heir to the fortunes once destined to her son wrestled also with the grim tyrant, that seemed, however, scared from his prey by the arts and luxuries which the world of rich men raises up in defiance of the grave.

Arthur was, indeed, very seriously injured; one of his ribs broken, and two severe contusions on the head. To insensibility succeeded fever, followed by delirium. He was in imminent danger for several days. If anything could have consoled his parents for such an affliction, it was the thought that, at least, he was saved from the chance of meeting Philip. Mr. Beaufort, in the instinct of that capricious and fluctuating conscience which belongs to weak minds—which remains still, and drooping, and lifeless as a flag on a masthead during the calm of prosperity, but flutters, and flaps, and tosses when the wind blows and the wave heaves—thought very acutely and remorsefully of the condition of the Mortons during the danger of his own son. So far, indeed, from his anxiety for Arthur monopolising all his care, it only sharpened his charity towards the orphans; for many a man becomes devout and good when he fancies he has an immediate interest in appeasing Providence. The morning after Arthur's accident, he sent for Mr. Blackwell. He commissioned him to see that Catharine's funeral rites were performed with all due care and attention: he bade him obtain an interview with Philip, and assure the youth of Mr. Beaufort's good and friendly disposition towards him, and to offer to forward his views in any course of education he might prefer, or any profession he might adopt; and he earnestly counselled the lawyer to employ all his tact and delicacy in conferring with one of so proud and fiery a temper. Mr. Blackwell, however, had no tact or delicacy to employ: he went to the house of mourning, forced his way to Philip, and the very exordium of his harangue, which was devoted to praises of the extraordinary generosity and benevolence of his employer, mingled with condescending admonitions towards gratitude from Philip, so exasperated the boy, that Mr. Blackwell was extremely glad to get out of the house with a whole skin. He, however, did not neglect the more formal part of his mission; but communicated immediately with a fashionable undertaker, and gave orders for a very genteel funeral. He thought, after the funeral, that Philip would be in a less excited state of mind, and more likely to hear reason; he therefore deferred a second interview with the orphan till after that event; and, in the mean while, despatched a letter to Mr. Beaufort, stating that he had attended to his instructions; that the orders for the funeral were given; but that, at present, Mr. Philip Morton's mind was a little disordered, and that he could not calmly discuss, just at present, the plans for the future suggested by Mr. Beaufort. He did not doubt, however, that in another interview all would be arranged according to the wishes his client had so nobly conveyed to him. Mr. Beaufort's conscience on this point was therefore set at rest.

It was a dull, close, oppressive morning upon which the remains of Catharine Morton were consigned to the grave. With the preparations for the funeral Philip did not interfere; he did not inquire by whose orders all that solemnity of mutes, and coaches, and black plumes, and crapebands was appointed. If his vague and undeveloped conjecture ascribed this last and vain attention to Robert Beaufort, it neither lessened the sullen resentment he felt against his uncle, nor, on the other hand, did he conceive that he had a right to forbid respect to the dead, though he might reject service for the survivor. He had remained in a sort of apathy or torpor since Mr. Blackwell's visit, which seemed to the people of the house to partake rather of indifference than wo.

The funeral was over, and Philip had returned to the apartments occupied by the deceased; and now, for the first time, he set himself to examine what papers, &c. she had left behind. In an old escritoire he found, first, various packets of letters in his father's handwriting, the characters in many of them faded by time. He opened a few; they were the earliest love-letters. He did not dare to read above a few lines, so much did their living tenderness, and breathing, frank, hearty passion, contrast with the fate of the adored one. In these letters the very heart of the writer seemed to beat! Now both hearts alike were stilled! and GHOST called vainly unto GHOST!

He came, at length, to a letter in his mother's hand, and dated two days before her death. He went to the window, and gasped in the midst of the sultry air for breath. Below were heard the noises of London: the shrill cries of itinerant venders, the rolling carts, the whoop of boys returned for a while from school; amid all these rose one loud, merry peal of laughter, which drew his attention mechanically to the spot whence it came; it was at the threshold of a public house, before which stood the hearse that had conveyed his mother's coffin, and the gay undertakers, halting there to refresh themselves. He closed the window with a groan, retired to the farthest corner of the room, and read as follows:

"My dearest Philip,—When you read this I shall be no more. You and poor Sidney will have neither father nor mother, nor fortune nor name. Heaven is more just than man, and in Heaven is my hope for you. You, Philip, are a ready past childhood; your nature is one formed, I think, to wrestle successfully with the world. Guard against your own passions, and you may bid defiance to the obstacles that will beset your path in life. And lately, in our reverses, Philip, you have so subdued these passions, so schooled the pride and impetuosity of your childhood, that I have contemplated your prospects with less fear than I used to do, even when they seemed so brilliant. Forgive me, my dearchild, if I have concealed from you my state of health, and if death be a sudden and unlooked-for shock. Do not grieve for me too long. For myself, my release is indeed escape from the prison-house and the chain—from bodily pain and mental torture, which may, I fondly hope, prove some expiation for the errors of a happier time. For I did err when, even from the least selfish motives, I suffered my union with your father to remain concealed, and thus ruined the hopes of those who had rights upon me equal even to his. But oh! Philip, beware, too, of the passions, which do not betray their fruit till years and years after the leaves that look so green and the blossoms that seem so fair.

"I repeat my solemn injunction. Do not grieve for me, but strengthen your mind and heart to receive the charge that I now confide to you—my Sidney, my child, your brother! He is so soft, so gentle; he has been so dependant for very life upon me, and we are parted now for the first and last time. He is with strangers; and—and—oh Philip, Philip, watch over him for the love you bear, not only to him, but to me! Be to him a father as well as a brother. Put your stout heart against the world so that you may screen him, the weak child, from its malice. He has not your talents nor strength of character; without you he is nothing. Live, toil, rise for his sake not less than your own. If you knew how this heart beats as I write to you—if you could conceive what comfort I take for him from my confidence in you, you would feel a new spirit—my spirit—my mother-spirit of love, and forethought, and vigilance, enter into you while you read. See him when I am gone; comfort and soothe him. Happily, he is too young yet to know all his loss; and do not let him think unkindly of me in the days to come; for he is a child now, and they may poison his mind against me more easily than they can yours. Think, if he is unhappy hereafter, he may forget how I loved him—he may curse those who gave him birth. Forgive me all this, Philip, my son, and heed it well.

"And now, where you find this letter you will see a key; it opens a well in the bureau in which I have hoarded my little savings. You will see that I have not died in poverty. Take what there is; young as you are, you may want it more now than hereafter. But hold it in trust for your brother as well as yourself. If he is harshly treated (and you will go and see him, and you will remember that he would writhe under what you might scarcely feel), or if they overtask him, he is so young to work yet, it may find him a home near you. God watch over and guard you both. You are orphans now. But He has told even the orphans to call him "Father!"

When he had read this letter, Philip Morton fell upon his knees and prayed.

CHAPTER II.

"His Curse! Dost comprehend what that word means? Sho from a Father's angry breath."

JAMES SHIRLEY: The Brothers.

"This term is fatal, and affrights me."—Ibid.

"Those fond philosophers that magnify
Our human nature
Conversed but little with the world—they knew not
The fierce vexation of community."—Ibid.

After he had recovered his self-possession, Philip opened the well of the bureau, and was astonished and affected to find that Catharine had saved more than £100. Alas! how much must she have pinched herself to have hoarded this little treasure. After burning his father's love-letters, and some other papers which he deemed useless, he made up a little bundle of those trifling effects belonging to the deceased which he valued as memorials and relics of her, quitted the apartment, and descended to the parlour behind the shop. On the way he met with the kind servant, and, recalling the grief that she had manifested for his mother since he had been in the house, he placed two sovereigns in her hand, and bade her keep the scanty wardrobe poor Catharine had left behind. "And now," said he, as the servant wept while he spoke, "now I can bear to ask you what I have not before done. How did my poor mother die? Did she suffer much—or—"

"She went off like a lamb, sir," said the girl, drying her eyes. "You see the gentleman had been with her all the day, and she was much more easy and comfortable in her mind after he came."

"The gentleman! Not the gentleman I found here?"

"Oh dear, no! Not the pale, middle-aged gentleman nurse and I saw go down as the clock struck two. But the young, soft-spoken gentleman, who came in the morning, and said as how he was a relation. He stayed with her till she slept; and, when she woke, she smiled in his face—I shall never forget that smile—for I was standing on the other side, as it might be here, and the doctor was by the window, pouring out the doctor's stuff in the glass; and so she looked on the young gentleman, and then looked round at us all, and shook her head very gently, but did not speak. And the gentleman asked her how she felt, and she took both his hands and kissed them; and then he put his arms around and raised her up, to take the physic, like, and she said then, 'You will never forget them?' and he said, 'Never.' I don't know what that meant, sir!"

"Well, well—go on."

"And her head fell back on his buzzom, and she looked so happy; and, when the doctor came to the bedside, she was quite gone."

"And the stranger had my post! No matter—God bless him! God bless him! Who was he? What was his name?"

"I don't know, sir; he did not say. He stayed after the doctor went, and cried very bitterly; he took on more than you did, sir."

"Ay."

"And the other gentleman came just as he was a going, and they did not seem to like each other; for I heard him through the wall, as nurse and I were in the next room, speak as if he was scolding; but he did not stay long."

"And has never been since?"

"No sir! Perhaps missus can tell you more about him. But won't you take something, sir! Do—you look so pale."

Philip, without speaking, pushed her gently aside, and went slowly down the stairs. He entered the parlour, where two or three children were seated, playing at dominoes; he despatched one for their mother, the mistress of the shop, who came in, and dropped him a courtesy with a very grave, sad face, as was proper.

"I am going to leave your house, ma'am; and I wish to settle my little arrears of rent, &c."

"Oh! sir, don't mention it," said the landlady; and, as she spoke, she took a piece of paper from her bosom, very neatly folded, and laid it on the table. "And here, sir," she added, taking from the same depository a card, "here is the card left by the gentleman who saw to the funeral. He called half an hour ago, and bade say, with his compliments, that he would wait on you to-morrow at eleven o'clock. So I hope you won't go yet, for I think he means to settle everything for you; he said as much, sir."

Philip glanced over the card, and read, "Mr. George Blackwell, Lincoln's Inn." His brow grew dark; he let the card fall on the ground, put his foot on it with a quiet scorn, and muttered to himself, "The lawyer shall not bribe me out of my curse!" He turned to the total of the bill—not heavy, for poor Catharine had paid regularly for her scanty maintenance and humble lodging—paid the money, and, as the landlady wrote the receipt, he asked, "Who was the gentleman—the younger gentleman—who called in the morning of the day my mother died?"

"Oh, sir, I am sorry I did not get his name! Mr. Perkins said that he was some relation. Very odd he has never been since. But he'll be sure to call again, sir; you had better much stay here."

"No: it does not signify. All that he could do is done. But stay; give him this note if he should call."

as Ovid's and Cicero's in their banishments. We respect melancholy, because it imparts a similar affection, pity. A gay writer, who should only express satisfaction without variety, would soon be nauseous.

Madame de Sevigné shines both in grief and gaiety. There is too much of sorrow for her daughter's absence; yet it is always expressed by new turns, new images; and often by wit, whose tenderness has a melancholy air. When she forgets her concern, and returns to her natural disposition, gaiety, every paragraph has novelty: her allusions, her applications are the happiest possible. She has the art of making you acquainted with all her acquaintance; and attaches you even to the spots she inhabited. Her language is correct, though unstudied; and when her mind is full of any great event, she interests you with the warmth of a dramatic writer, not with the chilling impartiality of an historian. Pray read her accounts of the death of Turenne, and of the arrival of King James in France, and tell me whether you do not know their persons as if you had lived at the time. For my part, if you will allow me a word of digression, (not that I have written with any method,) I hate the cold impartiality recommended to historians; si vis me flesc, dolendum est primum ipsi tibi—but that I may not wander again, nor tire, nor contradict you any more, I will finish now; and shall be glad if you will dine at Strawberry Hill next Sunday, and take a bed there; when I will tell you how many more parts of your book have pleased me than have startled my opinions, or, perhaps, prejudices.

I am, sir, your obedient, humble servant,
HOR. WALPOLE.

P. S. Be so good as to let me know, by a line by the post to Strawberry Hill, whether I shall have the pleasure of seeing you on Sunday.

MR. JUSTICE TWISDEN.

The following anecdote of this learned Judge, is related by Roger North, in his Examen. North is speaking of the elevation of Lord Shaftesbury to the Woolsack. "His Lordship had an early fancy, or rather freak, the first day of term (when all the officers of the law, King's Counsel, and Judges, used to wait upon the Great Seal to Westminster Hall) to make this procession on horseback, as in old time the way was, when coaches were not so rife. And accordingly the Judges, &c. were spoken to, to get horses, as they and all the rest did, by borrowing and hiring, and so equipped themselves with black foot-cloths, in the best manner they could. And divers of the nobility, as usual, in compliment and honour to the new Lord Chancellor, attended also in their equipments. Upon notice in town of this cavalcade, all the show company took their places at windows and balconies, with the foot-guard in the streets, to partake of the fine sight, and being once settled for the march, it moved, as the design was, stately along. But when they came to straights and interceptions, for want of gravity in the beasts, and too much in the riders, there happened some curvetting which made no little disorder. Judge Twisden, to his great affright, and the consternation of his grave brethren, was laid along in the dust. But all at length arrived safe, without the loss of life or limb in the service. This accident was enough to divert the like frolic for the future, and the very next term after, they fell to their coaches, as before.

ANNE OF AUSTRIA.

Cardinal de Retz thus speaks of Anne of Austria:—"The Queen had more than any body whom I ever knew, of that sort of wit which was necessary for her not to appear a fool to those who did not know her. She had in her more of harshness than haughtiness; more of haughtiness than of greatness; more of outward appearance than reality; more regard to money than liberality; more of liberality than of self-interest; more of self-interest than disinterestedness; she was more tied to persons by habit than by affection; she had more of insensibility than of cruelty; she had a better memory of injuries than for benefits; her intention towards piety was greater than her piety; she had in her more of obstinacy than of firmness; and more incapacity than of all the rest which is mentioned before."—Memoirs, vol. i. p. 247.

FACE-PAINTING.

Lady Coventry, the celebrated beauty, killed herself with painting. She bedaubed herself with white, so as to stop the perspiration. Lady Wortley Montague was more prudent; she went often into the hot bath to scrape off the paint, which was almost as thick as plaster on a wall.—Walpole.

APPLAUSE, THE NURSE OF GENIUS.

One quality I may safely arrogate to myself; I am not afraid to praise. Many are such timid judges of composition that they hesitate and wait for the public opinion. Show them a manuscript, though they highly approve it in their hearts, they are afraid to commit themselves by speaking out. Several excellent works have perished from this cause; a writer of real talents being often a mere sensitive plant with regard to his own productions. Some cavils of Mason (how inferior a poet and judge!) had almost induced Grey to destroy his two beautiful and sublime odes. We should not only praise, but hasten to praise.—H. Walpole.

TWO MINISTERS.

"Mr. Pitt's plan, when he had the gout, was to have no fire in his room, but to load himself with clothes. At his house at Hayes he slept in a long room; at the one end of which was his bed, and his lady's at the other. His way was, when he thought the Duke of New-Castle had fallen into any mistake, to send for him and read him a lecture. The Duke was sent for once and came, when Mr. Pitt was confined to his bed with the gout. There was, as usual, no fire in the room; the day was very chilly, and the Duke, as usual, afraid of catching cold. The Duke first sat down on Mrs. Pitt's bed, as the warmest place; then drew up his legs into it, as he got colder. The lecture unluckily continuing a considerable time, the Duke at length fairly lodged himself under Mrs. Pitt's bed clothes. A person, from whom I had the story, suddenly going in saw the two ministers in bed, at the two ends of the room, while Pitt's long nose and black beard unshaved for some days, added to the grotesque of the scene.—H. Walpole.

SONG, WOO'D AND MARRIED AND A'.

BY MISS JOANNA BAILLIE.

The bride she is winsome and bonny,
Her hair it is snooded sae sleek;
And faithfu' and kind is her Johnny,
Yet fast fa' the tears on her cheek.
New pearlins are cause of her sorrow,
New pearlins and plenshing too:
The bride that has a' to borrow,
Has e'en right mickle ado.
Woo'd and married and a'!
Woo'd and married and a'!
Is na' she very weel aff
To be woo'd and married at a'?

Her mither then hastily spak,
"The lassie is glakit wi' pride;
In my pouch I had never a plack
On the day when I was a bride.
E'en tak' to your wheel, and be clever,
And draw out your thread in the sun;
The gear that is gifted it never
Will last like the gear that is won.
Woo'd and married and a'!
Wi' havins and tocher sae sma'!
I think ye are very weel aff,
To be woo'd and married at a'!"

"Toot, toot!" quo' her gray-headed faither,
"She's less o' a bride than a bairn.
She's ta'en like a coult frae the heather,
Wi' sense and discretion to learn.
Half husband, I trow, and half daddy,
As humour inconstantly leans,
The chiel maun be patient and steady
That yokes wi' a mate in her teens.
A kerchief sae douce and sae neat,
O'er her locks that the winds used to blaw!
I'm baith like to laugh and to greet,
When I think o' her married at a'!"

Then out spak' the wily bridegroom,
Weel waled were his wordies, I ween,
"I'm rich, though my coffer be toom,
Wi' the blinks o' your bonny blue een.
I'm prouder o' thee by my side,
Though thy ruffles or ribbons be few,
Than Kate o' the croft were my bride,
Wi' purfics and pearlins enow.
Dear, and dearest of ony!
Ye're woo'd and buikit and a'!
And do ye think scorn o' your Johnny,
And grieve to be married at a'!"

She turn'd, and she blush'd, and she smiled,
And she looket sae bashfully down;
The pride o' her heart was beguiled,
And she played wi' the sleeves o' her gown;
She twirled the tag o' her lace,
And she nippet her boddice sae blue,
Sine blinket sae sweet in his face,
And aff like a maukin she flew.
Woo'd and married and a'!
Wi' Johnny to roose her and a'!
She thinks hersel very weel aff,
To be woo'd and married at a'.

Coaches were first introduced into England in the year 1564. Taylor, the water-poet, says, "one William Boonen, a Dutchman, brought first the use of coaches hither; and the said Boonen was Queen Elizabeth's coachman; for, indeed, a coach was a strange monster in those days, and the sight of them put both horses and men into amazement." Dr. Percy observes, they were first drawn by two horses, and that it was the favourite Buckingham, who, about 1663, began to draw with six horses. About the same time he introduced the sedan.

The Duchess of Marlborough was pressing the Duke to take a medicine, and with his usual warmth said, "I'll be hanged if it do not prove serviceable." Dr. Garth, who was present, exclaimed. "Do take it then, my Lord Duke, it must be of service in one way or the other."—Walpole.

The Duke of Orleans, the Regent, had four daughters, distinguished by the names of the four cardinal sins. A wag wrote on their mother's tomb, "Ci-gît l'oisiveté," "Here lies idleness," which, you know, is termed the mother of all the vices.—Walpole.

Louis XIV. playing at tric-trac, disputed a throw with his opponent; the bystanders were appealed to, and could not decide the matter. It was referred to Grammont, who, from the farther end of the gallery, declared against the king. "But you have not heard the case," said Louis. "Ah! sire," replied the Count, "if your majesty had but a shadow of right, would these gentlemen have failed to decide in your favour."

Madame Royale, a worthy daughter of Henry Fourth, rendered her little court the most agreeable in the world. She inherited such of her father's virtues, as compose the proper ornament of her sex, and with regard to what are termed the foibles of great souls, her highness had in no wise degenerated.—De Grammont.

NEW BOOKS.

Heads of the People. Carey and Hart. Philadelphia, 1841.

Hogarth printed one picture for the express purpose of showing John Bull the difference between character and caricature. The artists and authors engaged in the production of the admirable series of portraits before us, appear to have had the same intention. The pictures are capitally drawn. Without being caricatures, they are characteristic heads so strongly marked as to designate the class in society to which they apply, without the possibility of mistake. The Stock-broker, for example, and the Debtor and Creditor are given with a graphic fidelity worthy of Hogarth himself.

Among the writers who have contributed sketches of the several characters, we recognise some of the ablest in England, each in his own department—William Howitt, for the country folks; Nimrod, for the sporting characters, and so on. Under such auspices it is not at all surprising that "Heads of the People" should come out, as it has, one of the most elegant and entertaining books of the season. We particularly commend the spirit of the publishers, who, aware that engravings on wood are almost always murdered in the printing in this country, have had all the embellishments done on steel plates. They were determined that the volume should be splendidly got up, and their success is every way worthy of their resolution and enterprise.

The Old Curiosity Shop. By Boz. Philad. Lea and Blanchard, 1841.

This is a splendid octavo volume, with all the embellishments of the English edition, faithfully copied by our best Philadelphia engravers. The story is undoubtedly one of Boz's best. The moral effect of such characters as those of Nell, Kit, and the poor schoolmaster, can never be too highly appreciated. They are incomparable in their way. Dickens has indulged in his peculiar vein of pathos more freely in this than in any of his previous efforts; and in the character of Quilp, we find the most original of all his delineations. How so amiable a person as Dickens appears to be, could imagine such a demon, it is difficult to conceive. In point and humour, as well as descriptive power and invention, "the Old Curiosity Shop" is first rate.

Charles O'Malley. Philadelphia, Carey and Hart, 1841.

The number for this week finishes the first volume of this excellent story. The description of the battle of Talavera, in the last number but one of the volume, is the best thing of the kind which we have read for many a day. Most accounts of battles are perfectly confused and unintelligible, a mere chaos, at least to any but a field marshal; but this conveys to the mind of the common reader so clear an idea of the thing, that a drawing or even a series of drawings would hardly increase the vividness of the impression. Commend us to Dr. Lover for battle scenes.

The Flying Dutchman. Philadelphia, Carey and Hart, 1841.

This is a very clever nautical novel, founded on the old legend which has already furnished a subject for Marryat. The author, Neal, handles it in a different style and more to our taste. There is more of nature and reality in this than in the wild story of the Phantom Ship. The description of a sea fight in the night is more than graphic—it is sublime. In point of interest, the story is not a whit behind Marryat's. The adventures of the hero and heroine on the island, form a picture perfectly Arcadian.

THE ROSE TO THE BUTTERFLY.

FROM VICTOR HUGO.

To the bright butterfly the rose, complaining,
Said, "Leave me not
To wander 'mid the heavens, while here remaining
I mourn my lot.

Are we not lovers, in our joys united?
Do they not say
That we are flowers alike, living delighted
Our summer day?

Alas! while I am chain'd to earth, thy fleetness
In the vast air
Bears thee so fast, not e'en my balmy sweetness
Can reach thee there.

Thy flight is still too distant—ever ranging Mid countless flowers;
I, sadly fixed, see the dull shadows changing
That mark the hours.

Now here, and now some happier spot adorning
Thy light appears;
Then wonder not to find me every morning
Bedew'd with tears.

So that our days may flow in tranquil seeming,
By storms unmoved,
Take root with me, or give me bright wings gleaming
Like thee, beloved!"

MRS. HOLME.

SONNET FROM PETRARCA.

TO A FRIEND, CONGRATULATING HIM ON HIS RETURN TO THE RIGHT PATH.

Love wept, and I with him mingled my tears
For thee from whom my thoughts were distant never:
After so many pains and doubts and fears,
At last to see thy soul unchained for ever.
Now to the throne of God lift up thy heart.
Since thou again hast turned to wisdom's way,
Thank him whose mercy could such grace impart,
Who turns not from his children's prayer away;
And if on turning to the high emprise
Some obstacle have checked thy onward course,
'Tis that thy soul may spread its wings and rise,
To meet the daring flight with all its force;
The path thou tread'st is thorny, dark, and steep,—
Then be thou strong, nor let thy valour sleep.

THE LADY'S BOOK.

Mr. Godey possesses and applies an energy really enviable in the management of his long established and favourite publication. It is truly gratifying to know that his exertions are sufficiently rewarded. The names of the ladies who superintend the editorial department, conjoined with his own, guarantee the fulfilment of all reasonable expectation. To the ladies it must be very acceptable.

The success of the Library is indeed exceedingly gratifying. We have met with a reception from our old friends that is flattering in the extreme. Amid the derangement of pecuniary matters, and consequent depression of our social relations, the retention of such patrons is gratefully acknowledged. We have printed but a limited edition, and therefore respectfully solicit those who are desirous for the work to apply as early as possible. To the terms we draw the attention of all.

NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

There is an exclamation in one of Gray's letters—"Be mine to read eternal new romances of Mari-vaux and Crebillon!" Without going quite so far as Gray, we must confess, that there are few works to which we oftener turn for profit or delight, than to the standard productions in this species of composition. With the exception of the violently satirical, and the violently sentimental specimens of the art, we find there the closest imitation of men and manners; and are admitted to examine the very web and texture of society, as it really exists, and as we meet with it when we come into the world. If the style of poetry has "something more divine in it," this savours more of humanity. We are brought acquainted with an infinite variety of characters—all a little more amusing, and, for the greater part, more true to general nature than those which we meet with in actual life—and have our moral impressions far more frequently called out, and our moral judgments exercised, than in the busiest career of existence. As a record of past manners and opinions, too, such writings afford both more minute and more abundant information than any other. To give one example only:—We should really be at a loss where to find, in any authentic documents of the same period, so satisfactory an account of the general state of society, and of moral, political and religious feeling, in the reign of George II., as we meet with in the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and his friend Mr. Abraham Adams. This work, indeed, we take to be a perfect piece of statistics in its kind; and do not know from what other quarter we could have acquired the solid information it contains, even as to this comparatively recent period. What a thing it would be to have such a work of the age of Pericles or Alexander! and how much more would it teach us as to the true character and condition of the people among whom it was produced, than all the tragedies and histories, and odes and orations, that have been preserved of their manufacture! In looking into such grave and ostentatious performances, we see little but the rigid skeleton of public transactions—exaggerations of party zeal, and vestiges of literary ambition; and if we wish really to know what was the state of manners and morals, and in what way, and into what forms, principles and institutions were actually moulded in practice, we cannot do better than refer to the works of those writers, who having no other object than to imitate nature, could only hope for success from the fidelity of their pictures; and were bound (in their own defence) to reduce the boasts of vague theorists, and the exaggerations of angry disputants, to the mortifying standard of reality.

The most moral writers, are indeed those who do not intend to inculcate any moral: the professed moralist almost unavoidably degenerates into the partisan of a system; and the philosopher warps the evidence to his own purpose. But the painter of manners gives the facts of human nature, and leaves us to draw the inference: if we are not able to do this, or do it ill, at least it is our own fault.—Ed. Review.

RICHARDSON.

It is not, in our opinion, a very difficult attempt to class Fielding or Smollett:—the one as an observer of the characters of human life; the other as a describer of its various eccentricities. But it is by no means so easy to dispose of Richardson, who was neither an observer of the one, nor a describer of the other; but who seemed to spin his materials entirely out of his own brain, as if there had been nothing existing in the world beyond the little shop in which he sat writing. There is an artificial reality about his works, which is nowhere to be met with. They have the romantic air of a pure fiction, with the literal minuteness of a common diary. The author had the strangest matter of fact imagination that ever existed, and wrote the oddest mixture of poetry and prose. He does not appear to have taken advantage of any thing in actual nature, from one end of his works to the other; and yet, throughout all his works (voluminous as they are—and this, to be sure, is one reason why they are so,) he sets about describing every object and transaction, as if the whole had been given in on evidence by an eye-witness. This kind of high finishing from imagination is an anomaly in the history of human genius; and certainly nothing so fine was ever produced, by the same accumulation of minute parts. There is not the least distraction, the least forgetfulness of the end: every circumstance is made to tell. We cannot agree that this exactness of detail produces heaviness; on the contrary, it gives an appearance of truth, and a positive interest to the story; and we listen with the same attention as we should to the particulars of a confidential communication. We at one time used to think some parts of Sir Charles Grandison rather trifling and tedious, especially the long description of Miss Harriet Byron's wedding clothes, till we met with two young ladies who had severally copied out the whole of that very description for their own private gratification. After this, we could not blame the author.

The effect of reading this work, is like an increase of kindred: you find yourself all of a sudden introduced into the midst of a large family, with aunts and cousins to the third and fourth generation, and grandmothers both by the father's and mother's side, —and a very odd set of people too, but people whose real existence and personal identity you can no more dispute than your own senses,—for you see and hear all that they do or say. What is still more extraordinary, all this extreme elaborateness in working out the story, seems to have cost the author nothing; for it is said that the published works are mere abridgments. We have heard (though this, we suppose, must be a pleasant exaggeration) that Sir Charles Grandison was originally written in eight and twenty volumes.

Pamela is the first of his productions, and the very child of his brain. Taking the general idea of the character of a modest and beautiful country girl, and of the situation in which she is placed, he makes out all the rest, even to the smallest circumstance, by the mere force of a reasoning imagination. It would seem as if a step lost would be as fatal here as in a mathematical demonstration. The development of the character is the most simple, and comes the nearest to nature that it can do, without being the same thing. The interest of the story increases with the dawn of understanding and reflection in the heroine. Her sentiments gradually expand themselves, like opening flowers. She writes better every time, and acquires a confidence in herself, just as a girl would do, writing such letters in such circumstances; and yet it is certain that no girl would write such letters in such circumstances. What we mean is this: Richardson's nature is always the nature of sentiment and reflection, not of impulse or situation. He furnishes his characters, on every occasion, with the presence of mind of the author. He makes them act, not as they would from the impulse of the moment, but as they might upon reflection, and upon a careful review of every motive and circumstance in their situation. They regularly sit down to write letters; and if the business of life consisted in letter writing, and was carried on by the post (like a Spanish game at chess,) human nature would be what Richardson represents it. All actual objects and feelings are blunted and deadened by being presented through the medium which may be true to reason, but is false in nature. He confounds his own point of view with that of the immediate actors in the scene; and hence presents you with a conventional and factitious nature, instead of that which is real. Dr. Johnson seems to have preferred this truth of reflection to the truth of nature, when he said that there was more knowledge of the human heart in a page of Richardson than in all Fielding. Fielding, however, saw more of the practical results, and understood the principles as well; but he had not the same power of speculating upon their possible results, and combining them in certain ideal forms of passion and imagination, which was Richardson's real excellence.

It must be observed, however, that it is this mutual good understanding, and comparing of notes between the author and the persons he describes; his infinite circumspection; his exact process of ratiocination and calculation, which gives such an appearance of coldness and formality to most of his characters,—which makes prudes of his women and coxcombs of his men. Every thing is too conscious in his works. Every thing is distinctly brought home to the mind of the actors in the scene, which is a fault undoubtedly; but then, it must be confessed, every thing is brought home in its full force to the mind of the reader also; and we feel the same interest in the story as if it were our own. Can any thing be more beautiful or affecting than Pamela's reproaches to her "lumpish heart" when she is sent away from her master's at her own request—its lightness, when she is sent for back—the joy which the conviction of the sincerity of his love diffuses in her heart, like the coming on of spring—the artifice of the stuff gown—the meeting with Lady Davers after her marriage—and the trial scene with her husband? Who ever remained insensible to the passion of Lady Clementina, except Sir Charles Grandison himself, who was the object of it? Clarissa is, however, his masterpiece, if we except Lovelace. If she is fine in herself, she is still finer in his account of her.

With that foil, her purity is dazzling indeed; and she who could triumph by her virtue, and the force of her love, over the regality of Lovelace's mind, his wit, his person, his accomplishments and his spirit, conquers all hearts. We should suppose that never sympathy more deep or sincere was excited than by the heroine of Richardson's romance, except by the calamities of real life. The links in this wonderful chain of interest are not more finely wrought, than their whole weight is overwhelming and irresistible. Who can forget the exquisite gradations of her long dying scene, or the closing of the coffin-lid, when Miss Howe comes to take her last leave of her friend; or the heart breaking reflection that Clarissa makes on what was to have been her wedding day? Well does a modern writer exclaim—

"Fools are a real world, both pure and good,
Round which, with tendris strong as flesh and blood,
Our pastime and our happiness may grow!"

Richardson's wit was unlike that of any other writer;—his humour was so too. Both were the effect of intense activity of mind;—laboured, and yet completely effectual. We might refer to Lovelace's reception and description of Hickman, when he calls out Death in his ear, as the name of the person with whom Clarissa had fallen in love: and to the scene at the gloveshop. What can be more magnificent than his enumeration of his companions—"Belton so pert and so pimply—Tourville so fair and so foppish," etc.? In casuistry, he is quite at home; and, with a boldness greater even than his puritanical severity, has exhausted every topic on virtue and vice. There is another peculiarity in Richardson, not perhaps so uncommon, which is, his systematically preferring his most insipid characters to his finest, though both were equally his own invention, and he must be supposed to have understood something of their qualities. Thus he preferred the little, selfish, affected, insignificant Miss Byron, to the divine Clementina; and again, Sir Charles Grandison, to the nobler Lovelace. We have nothing to say in favour of Lovelace's morality; but Sir Charles is the prince of coxcombs,—whose eye was never once taken from his own person, and his own virtues; and there is nothing which excites so little sympathy as this excessive egotism.

MEN OF GENIUS DEFICIENT IN CONVERSATION.

The student who may, perhaps, shine a luminary of learning and of genius in the pages of his volume, is found not rarely to lie obscured beneath a heavy cloud in colloquial discourse.

If you love the man of letters, seek him in the privacies of his study. It is in the hour of confidence and tranquillity his genius shall elicit a ray of intelligence more fervid than the labours of polished composition.

The great Peter Corneille, whose genius resembled that of our Shakspeare, and who has so forcibly expressed the sublime sentiments of the hero, had nothing in his exterior that indicated his genius; on the contrary, his conversation was so insipid, that it never failed of wearying. Nature, who had lavished on him the gifts of genius, had forgotten to blend with them her more ordinary ones. He did not even speaking correctly that language of which he was such a master.

When his friends represented to him how much more he might please by not disdaining to correct these trivial errors, he would smile and say—"I am not the less Peter Corneille!" Descartes, whose habits were formed in solitude and meditation, was silent in mixed company; and Thomas described his mind by saying that he had received his intellectual wealth from nature in solid bars, but not in current coin; or as Addison expressed the same idea, by comparing himself to a banker who possessed the wealth of his friends at home, though he carried none of it in his pocket; or as that judicious moralist Nicolle, one of the Port-Royal Society, who said of a scintillant wit—"He conquers me in the drawing-room, but he surrenders to me at discretion on the staircase." Such may say with Themistocles, when asked to play on a lute—"I cannot fiddle, but I can make a little village a great city."

The deficiencies of Addison in conversation are well known. He preserved a rigid silence amongst strangers; but if he was silent, it was the silence of meditation. How often at that moment he laboured at some future Spectator!

Mediocrity can talk; but it is for genius to observe.

The cynical Mandeville compared Addison, after having passed an evening in his company, to "a silent parson in a tie-wig." It is no shame for an Addison to receive the censures of a Mandeville; he has only to blush when he calls down those of a Pope.

Virgil was heavy in conversation, and resembled more an ordinary man than an enchanting poet.

La Fontaine, says La Bruyere, appeared coarse, heavy, and stupid; he could not speak or describe what he had just seen; but when he wrote, he was the model of poetry.

It is very easy, said a humorous observer on La Fontaine, to be a man of wit or a fool; but to be both, and that, too, in the extreme degree, is indeed admirable, and only to be found in him. This observation applies to that fine natural genius, Goldsmith. Chaucer was more facetious in his tales than in his conversation, and the Countess of Pembroke used to rally him by saying that his silence was more agreeable to her than his conversation.

Isocrates, celebrated for his beautiful oratorical compositions, was of so timid a disposition that he never ventured to speak in public. He compared himself to the whetstone, which will not cut, but enables other things to do this; for his productions served as models to other orators. Vaucanson was said to be as much a machine as any he had made.

Dryden said of himself—"My conversation is slow and dull, my humour saturnine and reserved. In short, I am none of those who endeavour to break jests in company, or make repartees."—D'Israeli.

Of the conversational powers of great men, the following remarks are made in a late number of Blackwood's Magazine:—

Sir James Mackintosh.—The talent of conversation is not quite so simple a thing as it is generally conceived. Even in the extensive and varied circle of London society, there have not been a half dozen in the last half century who had established any kind of name to this rather private path to renown. A man may have considerable knowledge, may have seen a great deal of the world, and may, besides, know well the ambition of figuring in the conversational world, without the talent of a good conversationalist. The late Sir James Mackintosh had all these—he had fluency of speech, and now and then brilliancy of conception. But he was given to talking over much—he often proceeded alarmingly; his anecdotes were from hacks; his sentences had the formality with but seldom the point of Johnson, and his recitations of verse, which were frequent, and of merciless length, showed that he had taken the trouble of preparing his memory for the occasion, and that he was determined not to have his trouble thrown away.

Rogers.—Rogers, the Poet of Memory, has abundance of anecdote, but it lies chiefly among the dead and gone. The mention of Sheridan acts upon him with the effect of a match put to a firework. The composition goes off in a long succession of explosions, all of the bluest kind, until every ear is tired, and then the feu d'artifice, in every sense, drops dead to the ground, and every one flies from the rocket case. Yet he has mixed a good deal in society—not the best, however, for it has been chiefly with the set gathered round the table of Holland House, where people are assembled for the purpose of talk—a process which makes every thing as formal as a parade in St. James's Park—as sets men minuet dancing in odes, epodes, and the last new tragedy, and of course reduces all conversation to the dregs of an article in the Edinburgh Review.

Curran, the Irish barrister, had perhaps the highest conversational ability of any man of his day. He certainly had astonishing wit. There are more showy conceptions of Curran on record, than any man in his time or ours; and the period was remarkable for the animation and cultivated eloquence of society. Devonshire House and the prince's table were the centres around which perpetual pleasure antr'y gathered—where a perpetual rivalry of wit was sustained, and where political disappointments forced the associates to look to their resources in sporting contempt and showy ridicule. As men are forced to the gloom and tempest without, to shut their door light candles, and forget the inclemency of the night in the double comfort and gaiety within, in the assemblages, all men learned to adopt the tone, they could not seize the spirit of the hour. Charles Fisk became a wit for the time, and wrote epigrams; Fitzpatrick turned poet, and wrote sentimental songs; Hare, Harding, Courtenay, and a crowd of those inferior names which float on the surface of gay society, and sink after the agitation of the day has passed—those notes in the sunshine, of whose existence one would have dreamed but for the casual entrance of the beam, were all busy with their little live contributions; and the showy and good-natured duchess, and the not less showy and good-natured prince, received all like divinites, equally welcoming the incense streaming from golden wine, and the fragrance of the flower.

William Sotheby.—The late William Sotheby was a favourite everywhere. He was a man of fortune, without any of the airs belonging to the "landed interest"—a man of general literature without pedantry—and a poet, too, without pressing his poetry on any one, unless after a considerable term of acquaintance. This rendered his old friendship somewhat formidable; but it was seldom inflicted under an intercourse of four or five years; and by that time his bosom friends were sufficiently on their guard to escape, by very weak eyes, an habitual headache, an immediate engagement out of town, or some other ingenious expedient found effectual in previous cases of difficulty. Their escapes were now and then narrow enough.

"Take that tragedy home with you, and let me know your opinion of it as an old friend and excellent critic, as I know you to be," said an author to his visitor. The friend put it in his pocket. On their next meeting, "Have you read my tragedy? and what do you think of it? I ask your candid opinion," said the author. "The fact is, I have not read it yet, but intend to take the first opportunity," said the old friend. "Then lose no time, I beg; for if you think that it will answer for either the press or the stage, I have five more ready, of which you shall have the first reading, in preference to any man in England," said the author. The old friend next day discovered that he had particular business at Paris, or the Antipodes, and set off by the mail, returning the tragedy, with a thousand regrets for its non-perusal.

Coleridge was not a converser; he was a lecturer. His sentences were dissertations; his very metaphors had beginning, middle, and end; his divisions were as numerous, parenthetical, and positive, as those of a preacher of the Moravian connection; and in the briskest conversation he seemed never able to disengage himself from the idea, that it was duty at once to enlighten and astound the whole living race of mankind, besides leaving a handsome legacy for all generations to come. He was an honest man, and without a stain on his reputation, except the praises of the small gang of literatists who constantly follow him, as flies wing and cling round a corpulent alderman. He wrote good poetry in his youth, but muddled his Helicon with metaphysics as he fell into years. It is remarkable that his politics purified as his poetry grew thick. Beginning with proposals for throwing off the incumbrances of coat and pantaloons, and founding an original commonwealth in the western wilderness, he ended with Christian habiliments, a cottage at Highgate, and an honest devotion to conservatism. But he was no conversationalist. He declaimed—he harangued—he talked long and loftily—his reveries were of the pagan mulhoi, of the Mesmetism, of the Samothracian impostures, and the profundities of science lost to man-

Philip, taking the pen from the landlady's hand, hastily wrote (while Mrs. Lacy went to ring him sealing-wax and a light) these words:

"I cannot guess who you are: they say that you call yourself a relation; that must be some mistake. I knew not that my poor mother had relations so kind. But, whoever you be, you soothed her last hours—she died in your arms; and if ever—years, long years hence—we should chance to meet, and I can do anything to aid another, my blood, and my life, and my heart, and my soul all are slaves to your will. If you are really of her kindred, I commend to you my mother; he is at — with Mr. Morton. If you can serve him, my mother's soul will watch over you as a guardian angel. As for me, I ask no help for any one: I go into the world, and will carve out my own way. So much do I shrink from the thought of charity from others, that I do not believe I could bless you as I do now if your kindness to me did not close with the stone upon my mother's grave.

PHILIP."

He sealed his letter and gave it to the woman. "Oh, by-the by," said she, "I had forgot; the doctor said that if you would send for him, he would be most happy to call on you and give you any advice."

"Very well."

"And what shall I say to Mr. Blackwell?"

"That he may tell his employer to remember our last interview."

With that Philip took up his bundle and strode from the house. He went first to the churchyard, where his mother's remains had been that day interred. It was near at hand: a quiet, almost a rural spot. The gate stood ajar, for there was a public path through the churchyard, and Philip entered with a noiseless tread. It was then near evening: the sun had broke out from the mists of the earlier day, and the westering rays shone bright and holy upon the solemn place.

"Mother! mother!" sobbed the orphan, as he fell prostrate before the green mound: "here—here I have come to repeat my oath—to swear again that I will be faithful to the charge you have intrusted to your wretched son! And at this hour I dare ask if there be on this earth one more miserable and forlorn!"

As words to this effect struggled from his lips, a loud, shrill voice—the cracked, painful voice of weak age wrestling with strong passion—rose close at hand.

"Away, reprobate! thou art accursed!"

Philip started, and shuddered as if the words were addressed to himself, and from the grave. But, as he rose on his knee, and, tossing the wild hair from his eyes, looked confusedly round, he saw at a short distance, and in the shadow of the wall, two forms: the one an old man with grey hair, who was seated on a crumbling wooden tomb facing the setting sun; the other a man apparently yet in the vigour of life, who appeared bent as in humble supplication. The old man's hands were outstretched over the head of the younger, as if suiting the terrible action to the terrible words, and, after a moment's pause—a moment, but it appeared far longer to Philip—there was heard a deep, wild, ghastly howl from a dog that cowered at the old man's feet; a howl, perhaps, of fear at the passion of his master, which the animal might associate with danger.

"Father! father!" said the suppliant, reproachfully, "your very dog rebukes your curse."

"Be dumb! My dog! What hast thou left me on earth but him? Thou hast made me loathe the sight of friends, for thou hast made me loathe mine own name. Thou hast covered it with disgrace—thou hast made mine old age a by-word—thy crimes leave me solitary in the midst of my shame!"

"It is many years since we met, father; we may never meet again—shall we part thus?"

"Time, ah!" said the old man, in a tone of withering sarcasm; "I comprehend—you are come for money!"

At this taunt the son started as if stung by a serpent, raised his head to its full height, folded his arms, and replied,

"Sir, you wrong me; for more than twenty years I have maintained myself—no matter how, but without taxing you—and now I felt remorse for having suffered you to discard me—now, when you are old and helpless, and, I heard, blind; and you might want aid even from your poor, good-for-nothing son. But I have done. Forget not my sins, but this interview. Repeal your curse, father; I have enough on my head without yours; and so—let the son at least bless the father who curses him. Farewell!"

The speaker turned as he thus said, with a voice that trembled at the close, and brushed rapidly by Philip, whom he did not, however, appear to perceive; but Philip, by the last red beam of the sun, saw again that marked, storm-beaten face which it was difficult, once seen, to forget, and recognised the stranger on whose breast he had slept the night of his first fatal visit to R—.

The old man's imperfect vision did not detect the departure of his son, but his face changed and softened as the latter strode silently through the rank grass.

"William!" he said at last, gently; "William!" and the tears rolled down his furrowed cheeks: "my son!" but that son was gone; the old man listened for reply—none came. "He has left me—poor William!—we shall never meet again;" and he sank once more on the old tombstone, dumb, rigid, motionless: an image of Time himself in his own domain of Graves. The dog crept closer to his master and licked his hand. Philip stood for a moment in thoughtful silence: his exclamation of despair had been answered as by his better angel. There was a being more miserable than himself; and the Accursed would have envied the Bereaved!

The twilight had closed in: the earliest star—the star of Memory and Love, the Hesperus hymned by every poet since the world began—was fair in the arch of heaven, as Philip quitted the spot with a spirit more reconciled to the future, more softened, chastened, attuned to gentle and pious thoughts, than perhaps ever yet had made his soul dominant over the deep and dark tide of his gloomy passions. He went thence to a neighbouring sculptor, and paid beforehand for a plain tablet to be placed above the grave he had left. He had just quitted that shop, in the same street, not many doors removed from the house in which his mother had breathed her last. He was pausing by a crossing, irresolute whether to repair at once to the home assigned to Sidney, or to seek some shelter in town for that night, when three men who were on the opposite side of the way suddenly caught sight of him.

"There he is—there he is; stop, sir! stop."

Philip heard these words, looked up, and recognised the voice and the person of Mr. Plimmins.

with; the bookseller was accompanied by Mr. Plimmins and a sturdy, ill-favoured stranger.

A nameless feeling of fear, rage, and disgust seized the unhappy boy, and, at the same moment, a ragged vagabond whispered to him, "Stump it, my cove; that's a Bow-street runner."

Then there shot through Philip's head the recollection of the money he had seized, though but to dash away: was he now—he, still, to his own conviction, the heir of an ancient and spotless name—to be hunted as a thief; or, at the best, what right over his person and his liberty had he given to this taskmaster? Ignorant of the law, the law only seemed to him, as it ever does to the ignorant and the friendless, a foe. Quicker than lightning, these thoughts, which it takes so many words to describe, flashed through the storm and darkness of his breast; and, at the very instant that Mr. Plimmins had laid hands on his shoulder, his resolution was formed. The instinct of self beat loud at his heart. With a bound—a spring, that sent Mr. Plimmins sprawling in the kennel, he darted across the road, and fled down an opposite lane.

"Stop him! stop!" cried the bookseller; and the officer rushed after him with almost equal speed. Lane after lane, alley after alley, fled Philip; dodging, winding, breathless, panting; and lane after lane, alley after alley, thickened at his heels the crowd that pursued. The idle and the curious, and the officious—ragged boys, ragged men, from stall and from cellar, from corner and from crossing—joined in that delicious chase, which runs down young crime till it sinks, too often, at the door of the jail or the foot of the gallows. But Philip slackened not his pace; he began to distance his pursuers. He was now in a street which they had not yet entered; a quiet street, with few, if any, shops. Before the threshold of a better kind of public house, or, rather, tavern, to judge by its appearance, lounged two men; and, as Philip flew on, the cry of "Stop him!" had changed, as the shout passed to new voices, into "Stop the thief!" That cry yet howled in the distance. One of the loungers seized him; Philip, desperate and ferocious, struck at him with all his force; but the blow was scarcely felt by that Herculean frame.

"Pish!" said the man, scornfully: "I am no spy; if you run from justice, I would help you to a signpost."

Struck by the voice, Philip looked hard at the speaker. It was the voice of the Accursed Son.

"Save me! You remember me!" said the orphan faintly.

"Ah! I think I do; poor lad! Follow me—this way!"

The stranger turned within the tavern, passed the hall through a sort of corridor that led into a back yard which opened upon a nest of courts or passages.

"You are safe for the present; I will take you where you can tell me all at your ease. See!" As he spoke, they emerged into an open street, and the guide pointed to a row of hackney-coaches. "Be quick—get in. Coachman, drive fast to—" Philip did not hear the rest of the direction.

Our story returns to Sidney.

CHAPTER III.

"Nous vous mettrons à couvert
Repondit le pot de fer.
Si quelque matière dure
Vous menace d'aventure,
Entre deux je passerai,
Et du coup vous sauverai

Le pot de terre en souffre!"—LA FONTAINE.

"Sidney, come here, sir! What have you been at? You have torn your frill into tatters! How did you do this? Come, sir, no lies."

"Indeed, ma'am, it was not my fault. I just put my head out of the window to see the coach go by, and a nail caught me here."

"Why, you little plague! you have scratched yourself: you are always in mischief. What business had you to look after the coach?"

"I don't know," said Sidney, hanging his head ruefully.

"La, mother!" cried the youngest of the cousins, a square built, ruddy, coarse featured urchin about Sidney's age, "la mother, he never sees a coach in the street when we are at play but he runs arter it."

"After, not arter," said Mr. Roger Morton, taking the pipe from his mouth.

"Why do you go after the coaches, Sidney?" said Mrs. Morton; "it is very naughty; you will be run over some day."

"Yes, ma'am," said Sidney, who, during the whole colloquy, had been trembling from head to foot.

"Yes, ma'am, and 'no, ma'am:' you have no more manners than a cobbler's boy."

"Don't tease the child, my dear—he is crying," said Mr. Morton, more authoritatively than usual. "Come here, my man!" and the worthy uncle took him in his lap, and held his glass of brandy and water to his lips. Sidney, too frightened to refuse, sipped hurriedly, keeping his large eyes fixed on his aunt, as children do when they fear a cuff.

"You spoil the boy more than you do your own flesh and blood," said Mrs. Morton, greatly displeased.

Here Tom, the youngest-born before described, put his mouth to his mother's ear, and whispered, loud enough to be heard by all, "He runs arter the coach 'cause he thinks his ma may be in it. Who's homesick, I should like to know? Ba! baa!"

The boy pointed his finger over his mother's shoulder, and the other children burst into a loud giggle.

"Leave the room, all of you—leave the room?" said Mr. Morton, rising angrily and stamping his foot.

The children, who were in great awe of their father, huddled and hustled each other to the door; but Tom, who went last, bold in his mother's favour, popped his head through the doorway, and cried, "Good-bye, little homesick?"

A sudden slap in the face from his father changed his chuckle into a very different kind of music, and a loud, indignant sob was heard without for some moments after the door was closed.

"If that's the way you behave to your children, Mr. Morton, I vow you sha'n't have any more if I can help it. Don't come near me—don't touch me!" and Mrs. Morton assumed the resentful air of offended beauty.

"Pshaw!" growled the spouse; and he reseated himself and resumed his pipe. There was a dead silence. Sidney crouched near his uncle, looking very pale. Mrs. Morton, who was knitting, knitted away with the excited energy of nervous irritation.

"Ring the bell, Sidney," said Mr. Morton. The boy obeyed—the parlour-maid entered. "Take Master Sidney to his room; keep the boys away from him, and give him a large slice of bread and jam, Martha."

"Jam, indeed! Treacle," said Mrs. Morton.

"Jam, Martha!" repeated the uncle, authoritatively.

"Treacle!" reiterated the aunt.

"Jam, I say!"

"Treacle, you hear: and, for that matter Martha has no jam to give!"

The husband had nothing more to say.

"Good-night, Sidney; there's a good boy, go and kiss your aunt and make your bow; and, I say, my lad, don't mind those plagues. I'll talk to them to-morrow, that I will; no one shall be unkind to you in my house."

Sidney muttered something, and went timidly up to Mrs. Morton. His look, so gentle and subdued; his eyes full of tears; his pretty mouth, which, though silent, pleaded so eloquently; his willingness to forgive, and his wish to be forgiven, might have melted many a heart harder, perhaps, than Mrs. Morton's. But there reigned, what is worse than hardness, prejudice and wounded vanity—maternal vanity. His contrast to her own rough, coarse children grated on her, and set the teeth of her mind on edge.

"There, child, don't tread on my gown; you are so awkward: say your prayers, and don't throw off the counterpane! I don't like slovenly boys."

Sidney put his finger in his mouth, drooped, and vanished.

"Now, Mrs. M.," said Mr. Morton abruptly, and knocking out the ashes of his pipe, "now, Mrs. M., one word for all: I have told you that I promised poor Catharine to be a father to that child, and it goes to my heart to see him so snubbed. Why you dislike him I can't guess for the life of me; I never saw a sweeter-tempered child."

"Go on, sir—go on: make your personal reflections on your own lawful wife. They don't hurt me—oh, no, not at all! Sweet-tempered, indeed! I suppose your own children are not sweet-tempered?"

"That's neither here nor there," said Mr. Morton; "my own children are such as God made them, and I am very well satisfied."

"Indeed, you may be proud of such a family; and to think of the pains I have taken with them, and how I have saved you in nurses, and the bad times I have had; and now, to find their noses put out of joint, by that little mischief-making interloper—it is too bad of you, Mr. Morton; you will break my heart, that you will!"

Mrs. Morton put her handkerchief to her eyes and sobbed.

The husband was moved; he got up and attempted to take her hand. "Indeed, Margaret I did not intend to vex you."

"And I, who have been such a fa—fa—faithful wi—wi—wife, and brought you such a deal of mon—mon—monee, and always stud—stud—studied your interests; many's the time when you have been fast asleep, that I have sat up half the night men—men—mending the house linen; and you have not been the same man, Roger, since that boy came!"

"Well, well!" said the good man, quite overcome, and fairly taking her round the waist and kissing her, "no words between us; it makes life quite unpleasant. If it pains you to have Sidney here, I will put him to some school in the town where they'll be kind to him. Only, if you would, Margaret, for my sake—old girl! come, now! there's a darling!—just be more tender with him. You see he frets so after his mother. Think how little Tom would fret if he was away from you! Poor little Tom!"

"La! Mr. Morton, you are such a man! there's no resisting your ways! You know how to come over me, don't you?"

And Mrs. Morton smiled benignly as she escaped from his conjugal arms and smoothed her cap.

Peace thus restored, Mr. Morton refilled his pipe, and the good lady after a pause, resumed, in a very mild, conciliatory tone,

"I'll tell you what it is, Roger, that vexes me with that there child. He is so deceitful, and he does tell such fibs!"

"Fibs! That is a very bad fault," said Mr. Morton, gravely. "That must be corrected."

"It was but the other day that I saw him break a pane of glass in the shop; and, when I taxed him with it, he denied it; and with such a face! I can't abide story-telling."

"Let me know the next story he tells; I'll cure him," said Mr. Morton, sternly. "You know how I broke Tom of it. Spare the rod and spoil the child. And when I promised to be kind to the boy, of course I did not mean that I was not to take care of his morals, and see that he grew up an honest man. Tell truth and shame the devil—that's my motto."

"Spoke like yourself, Roger!" said Mrs. Morton, with great animation. "But you see he has not had the advantage of such a father as you. I wonder your sister don't write to you. Some people make a great fuss about their feelings; but out of sight out of mind."

"I hope she is not ill. Poor Catharine! she looked in a very bad way when she was here," said Mr. Morton, and he turned uneasily to the fire place and sighed.

Here the servant entered with the supper-tray, and the conversation fell upon other topics.

Mrs. Roger Morton's charge against Sidney was, alas! too true! He had acquired under that roof a terrible habit of telling stories. He had never incurred that vice with his mother, because then and there he had nothing to fear; now he had every thing to fear; the grim aunt—even the quiet, cold, austere uncle—the apprentices—the strange servants—and, oh! more than all, those hard-eyed, loud-laughing tormentors, the boys of his own age! Naturally timid, severity made him actually a coward; and, when the nerves tremble, a lie sounds as surely as, when I vibrate that wire, the bell at the end of it will ring. Beware of the man who has been roughly treated as a child.

The day after the conference just narrated, Mr. Morton, who was subject to erysipelas, had taken a little cooling medicine. He breakfasted, therefore, later than usual—after the rest of the family; and at this meal—pour lui soulager—he ordered the luxury of a muffin. Now it so chanced that he had only finished half the muffin and drank one cup of tea, when he was called into the shop by a customer of great importance: a prosy old lady, who always gave her orders with remarkable precision, and who valued herself on a character for affability, which she maintained by never buying a penny riband, without asking the shopman how all his family were, and talking news about every other family in the place. At the time Mr. Morton left the parlour, Sidney and Master Tom were therein, seated on two stools, and casting up division sums on their respective slates; a point of education to which Mr. Morton attended with great care. As soon as his father's back was turned, Master Tom's eyes wandered from the slate to the muffin, as it leered at him from the slop-basin. Never did Pythian sibyl, seated above the bubbling spring, utter more oracular eloquence to her priest than did that muffin—at least the parts of it yet extant—utter to the fascinated senses of Master Tom. First he sighed; then he moved round on his stool; then he got up; then he peered at the muffin from a respectful distance; then he gradually approached, and walked round, and round, and round it, his eyes getting bigger and bigger; then he peeped through the glass-door into the shop, and saw his father busily engaged with the old lady; then he began to calculate and philosophise—perhaps his father had done breakfast; perhaps he would not come back at all; if he came back, he would not miss one corner of the muffin; and if he did miss it, why should Tom be supposed to have taken it? As he thus communed with himself, he drew nearer to the fatal vortex, and at last, with a desperate plunge, he seized the triangular temptation:

"And ere a man had power to say 'Behold,'
The jaws of Thomas had devoured it up."

Sidney, disturbed from his studies by the agitation of his companion, witnessed this proceeding with great and conscientious alarm. "Oh, Tom!" said he, "what will your papa say!"

"Look at that!" said Tom, putting his fist under Sidney's reluctant nose. "If father misses it, you will say the cat took it. If you don't, my eye! what a wapping I will give you!"

Here Mr. Morton's voice was heard wishing the lady "Good-morning!" and Master Tom, thinking it better to leave the credit of the invention solely to Sidney, whispered, "Say I am gone up stairs for my pocket-handker," and hastily absconded.

Mr. Morton, already in a very bad humour, partly at the effects of the cooling medicine, partly at the suspension of his breakfast, stalked into the parlour. His tea—the second cup already poured out—was cold. He turned towards the muffin, and missed the lost piece at a glance.

"Who has been at my muffin!" said he in a voice that seemed to Sidney like the voice he had already supposed an ogre to possess. "Have you, Master Sidney!"

"N—n—no, sir; indeed, sir!"

"Then Tom has. Where is he?"

"Gone up stairs for his handkerchief, sir."

"Did he take my muffin? Speak the truth!"

"No, sir; it was the—it was the—the cat, sir!"

"Oh you wicked, wicked boy!" cried Mrs. Morton, who had followed her husband into the shop: "the cat kittened last night, and is locked up in the coal-cellar!"

"Come here, Master Sidney! No first go down, Margaret, and see if the cat is in the cellar; it might have got out, Mrs. M." said Mr. Morton, just even in his wrath.

Mrs. Morton went, and there was a dead silence, except, indeed, in Sidney's heart, which beat louder than a clock ticks. Mr. Morton, meanwhile, went to a little cupboard: while still there, Mrs. Morton returned: the cat was in the cellar—the key turned on her—in no mood to eat muffins, poor thing!—she would not even lap her milk! Like her mistress, she had had a very bad time!

"Now come here, sir!" said Mr. Morton, withdrawing himself from the cupboard, with a small horsewhip in his hand. "I will teach you how to speak the truth in future! Confess that you have told a lie!"

"Yes, sir, it was a lie! Pray—pray forgive me; but Tom made me!"

"What! when poor Tom is up stairs? Worse and worse!" said Mrs. Morton, lifting up her hands and eyes. "What a viper!"

"For shame, boy, for shame! Take that—and that—and that—"

Writhing, shrinking, still more terrified than hurt, the poor child cowered beneath the lash.

"Mamma! mamma!" he cried at last, "oh why—why did you leave me?"

At these words Mr. Morton stayed his hand—the whip fell to the ground.

"Yet it is all for the boy's good," he muttered. "There, child, I hope this is the last time. There, you are not much hurt. Zounds, don't cry so!"

"He will alarm the whole street," said Mrs. Morton: "I never see such a child! Here take this parcel to Mrs. Birnie's—you know the house—only next street, and dry your eyes before you get there. Don't go through the shop, this way out."

She pushed the child, still sobbing with vehemence that she could not comprehend, through the private passage into the street, and returned to her husband.

"You are convinced now, Mr. M.?"

"Pshaw! ma'am, don't talk. But, to be sure, that's how I cured Tom of fibbing. The tea's as cold as a stone!"

CHAPTER IV.

"La bien nous le faisons; le mal c'est la Fortune,
On a toujours raison, le Destin toujours tort."
LA FONTAINE.

Upon the early morning of the day commemorated by the historical events of our last chapter, two men were deposited by a branch coach at the inn of a hamlet about ten miles distant from the town in which Mr. Roger Morton resided. Though the hamlet was small, the inn was large, for it was placed close by a huge finger-post that pointed to three great roads; one led to the town before mentioned; another to the heart of a manufacturing district; and a third to a populous seaport. The weather was fine, and the two travellers ordered breakfast to be taken into an arbour in the garden, as well as the basins and towels necessary for ablution. The elder of the travellers appeared to be unequivocally foreign; you would have guessed him at once for a German. He wore what was then very uncommon in this country, a loose brown linen blouse, buttoned to the chin, with a leathern belt, into which were stuck a German meerschaum and a tobacco pouch. He had very long flaxen hair, false or real, that streamed half way down his back, large light mustaches, and a rough, sunburned complexion, which made the fairness of the hair more remarkable. He wore an enormous pair of green spectacles, and complained much, in broken English, of the weakness of his eyes. All about him, even to the smallest minutiae, indicated the German; not only the large, muscular frame, the broad feet, and vast though well-shaped hands, but the brooch—evidently purchased of a Jew in some great fair—stuck ostentatiously and superfluously into his stock; the quaint, droll-looking carpet-bag, which he refused to trust to the boots; and the great, massive, dingy ring which he wore on his fore-finger. The other was a slender, remarkably upright and sinewy youth, in a blue frock, over which was thrown a large cloak; a travelling cap, with a shade that concealed all of the upper part of his face except a dark, quick eye of uncommon fire, and a shawl handkerchief, which was equally useful in concealing the lower part of the countenance. On descending from the coach, the German, with some difficulty, made the hostler understand that he wanted a post-chaise in a quarter of an hour; and then, without entering the house, he and his friend strolled to the arbour. While the maid-servant was covering the table with bread, butter, tea, eggs, and a huge round of beef, the German was busy in washing his hands, and talking in his national tongue to the young man, who returned no answer. But, as soon as the servant had completed her operations, the foreigner turned round, and, observing her eyes fixed on his brooch with much female admiration, he made one stride to her.

"Der Teufel, mein goot madchen, but you are von var—pretty—vat you call it?" and he gave her, as he spoke, so hearty a smack, that the girl was more flustered than flattered by the courtesy.

"Keep yourself to yourself, sir!" said she, very tartly—for chambermaids never like to be kissed by middle-aged gentlemen when a younger one is by: whereupon the German replied by a pinch—it is immaterial to state the exact spot to which that delicate caress was directed. But this last offence was so inexpiable, that the "madchen" bounced off with a face of scarlet, and a "Sir, you are no gentleman—that's what you arn't!" The German thrust his head out of the arbour, and followed her with a loud laugh; then, drawing himself in again, he said, in quite another accent and in excellent English, "There, Master Philip, we have got rid of the girl for the rest of the morning, and that's exactly what I wanted to do; women's wits are confoundedly sharp. Well, did I not tell you right; we have baffled all the bloodhounds!"

"And here, then, Gawtreys, we are to part," said Philip mournfully.

"I wish you would think better of it my boy," returned Mr. Gawtreys, breaking an egg; "how can you shift for yourself—no kith nor kin—not even that important machine for giving advice called a friend—no, not a friend, when I am gone? I foresee how it must end. [D— it, salt butter, by Jove!]"

"If I were alone in the world, as I have told you again and again, perhaps I might pin my fate to yours. But my brother!"

"There it is; always wrong when we act from our feelings. My whole life, which some day or other I will tell you, proves that. Your brother—bah! Is he not very well off with his own uncle and aunt? Plenty to eat and drink, I dare say. Come, man, you must be as hungry as a hawk—a slice of the beef. Let well alone, and shift for yourself. What good can you do your brother?"

"I don't know, but I must see him; I have sworn it."

"Well, go and see him, and then strike across the country to me. I will wait a day for you—there, now!"

"But tell me first," said Philip, very earnestly, and fixing his dark eyes on his companion, "tell me—yes, I must speak frankly—tell me, you who would link my fortune with your own—tell me what and who are you?"

"Gawtreys looked up.

"What do you suppose?" said he, drily.

"I fear to suppose anything, lest I wrong you: but the strange place to which you took me the evening on which you saved me from pursuit—the persons I met there—”

“Well-dressed, and very civil to you?”

“True; but with a certain wild looseness in their talk that—But I have no right to judge others by mere appearance. Nor is it this that has made me anxious, and if you will, suspicious.”

“What then?”

“Your dress, your disguise.”

“Disguised yourself! ha! ha! Behold the world's charity! You fly from some danger, some pursuit, disguised—you, who hold yourself guiltless: I do the same, and you hold me criminal—a robber, perhaps—a murderer, it may be! I will tell you what I am: I am a son of Fortune—an adventurer; I live by my wits—so do poets and lawyers, and all the charlatans of the world; I am a charlatan—a chameleon. ‘Each man in his time plays many parts;’ I play any part in which the Manager of the Vast Boards—Money—promises me a livelihood. Are you satisfied?”

“Perhaps,” answered the boy, sadly, “when I know more of the world, I shall understand you better. Strange, strange, that you out of all men should have been kind to me in distress!”

“Not at all strange. Ask the beggar whom he gets the most pence from: the fine lady in her carriage, the beau smelling Eau de Cologne? Pish! the people nearest to being beggars themselves keep the beggar alive. You were friendless, and the man who has all earth for a foe befriends you. It is the way of the world, sir—the way of the world. Come, eat while you can, this time next year you may have no beef to your bread.”

Thus masticating and moralising at the same time, Mr. Gawtreys finished a breakfast that would have astonished the whole Corporation of London; and then taking out a large old watch with an enameled back—doubtless more German than its master—he said, as he lifted up his carpet-bag, “I must be off—tempus fugit, and I must arrive just in time to nick the vessels. Shall get to Ostend or Rotterdam safe and snug, thence to Paris. How my pretty Fan will have grown! Ah; you don't know Fan; make you a nice little wife one of these days! Cheer up, man, we shall meet again. Be sure of it; and, hark ye, that strange place, as you call it, where I took you—you can find it again!

“Not I.”

“Here, then, is the address. Whenever you want me, go there; ask to see Mr. Gregg—old fellow with one eye, you recollect—shake him by the hand just so—you catch the trick—practise it again. No, the fore-finger thus—that's right. Say ‘blater,’ no more—‘blater’—stay, I will write it down for you—and then ask for William Gawtreys's direction. He will give it to you at once, without questions, these signs understood; and, if you want money for your passage, he will give you that also, with advice into the bargain. Always a warm welcome with me. And so take care of yourself, and good-bye. I see my chaise is at the door.”

As he spoke, Gawtreys shook the young man's hand with cordial vigour, and strode off to his chaise, muttering, “Money well laid out—fee money; I shall have him, and, Gad, I like him—poor devil!”

CHAPTER V.

“He is a cunning coachman that can turn well in a narrow room.”—Old Play: from LAMB'S Specimen.

“Here are two pilgrims,
And neither knows one footstep of the way.”
HATWOOD'S Duties of Selfish. Ibid.

The chaise had scarce driven from the inn door, when a coach stopped to change horses on its last stage to the town to which Philip was bound. The name of the destination in gilt letters on the coach-door, caught his eye as he walked from the harbour towards the road, and in a few moments he was seated as the fourth passenger in the “Nelson Slow and Sure.” From under the shade of his cap he darted that quick, quiet glance which a man who hunts or is hunted—in other words, who observes or shuns—soon acquires. At his left hand sat a young woman in a cloak lined with yellow; she had taken off her bonnet and pinned it to the roof of the coach, and looked fresh and pretty in a silk handkerchief which she had tied round her head, probably to serve as a nightcap during the drowsy length of the journey. Opposite to her was a middle-aged man of pale complexion, and a grave, pensive, studious expression of face; and vis-a-vis to Philip sat an overdressed, showy, very good-looking man of about two or three-and-forty. This gentleman wore auburn whiskers, which met at the chin; a foraging cap, with a gold tassel; a velvet waistcoat, across which, in various folds, hung a golden chain, at the end of which dangled an eyeglass, that from time to time he screwed, as it were, into his right eye; he wore, also, a blue silk stock, with a frill much crumpled; dirty kid gloves; and over his lap lay a cloak lined with red silk. As Philip glanced towards this personage, the latter fixed his glass also at him with a scrutinising stare, which drew fire from Philip's dark eyes. The man dropped his glass, and said, in a half provincial, half haw-haw tone, like the stage-exquisite of a minor theatre. “Pawdon me, and split legs!” therewith stretching himself between Philip's limbs, in the approved fashion of inside passengers! A young man in a white greatcoat now came to the door with a glass of warm sherry and water.

“You must take this—you must now; it will keep the cold out,” (the day was broiling,) said he to the young woman.

“Gracious me!” was the answer, “but I never drink wine of a morning, James; it will get into my head.”

“To oblige me!” said the young man, sentimentally; whereupon the young lady took the glass, and, looking very kindly at her Ganymede, said, “Your health!” and sipped, and made a wry face; then she looked at the passengers, tittered, and said, “I can't bear wine!” and so, very slowly and daintily, supped up the rest. A silent and expressive squeeze of the hand, on returning the glass, rewarded the young man, and proved the salutary effect of his prescription.

“All right!” cried the coachman: the hostler twitched the cloths from the leaders, and away went the “Nelson Slow and Sure,” with as much pretension as if it had meant to do the ten miles in an hour. The pale gentleman took from his waistcoat-pocket a little box containing gum Arabic, and, having inserted a couple of morsels between his lips, he next drew forth a little thin volume, which, from the manner the lines were printed, was evidently devoted to poetry.

The smart gentleman, who, since the episode of the sherry and water, had kept his glass fixed upon the young lady, now said, with a genteel smirk, “That young gentleman seems very attentive, miss!”

“He is a very good young man, sir, and takes great care of me.”

“Not your brother, miss, eh?”

“La, sir, why not?”

“No family likeness—noice-looking fellow enough! But your oyes and mouth—ah miss!”

Miss turned away her head and uttered with pert vivacity,

“I never likes compliments, sir! But the young man is not my brother.”

“A sweetheart, eh?” Oh fy, miss! Haw! haw! and the auburn-whiskered Adonis Philip in the knee with one hand, and the pale gentleman in the ribs with the other. The latter looked up, and reproachfully; the former drew in his legs, and uttered an angry ejaculation.

“Well, sir, there is no harm in a sweetheart, is there?”

“None in the least, ma'am; I advise you to double the dose. We often hear of two strings to a bow. Daun't you think it would be noicer to have two beaux to your string?”

As he thus wittily expressed himself, the gentleman took off his cap, and thrust his fingers through a very curling and comely head of hair; the young lady looked at him with evident coquetry, and said, “How you do run on, you gentlemen!”

“I may well run on, miss, as long as I run aufter you,” was the gallant reply.

Here the pale gentleman, evidently annoyed by being talked across, shut his book up and looked round. His eye rested on Philip, who, whether from the heat of the day or from the forgetfulness of thought, had pushed his cap from his brows; and the gentleman, after staring at him for a few moments with great earnestness, sighed so heavily that it attracted the notice of all the passengers.

“Are you unwell, sir?” asked the young lady, compassionately.

“A little pain in my side—nothing more!”

“Change plauces with me, sir,” cried the Lothario, officiously. “Now do!” The pale gentleman, after a short hesitation and a bashful excuse, accepted the proposal. In a few moments the young lady and the beau were in deep and whispered conversation, their heads turned towards the window. The pale gentleman continued to gaze at Philip, till the latter, perceiving the notice he excited, coloured and replaced his cap over his face.

“Are you going to N——?” asked the gentleman, in a gentle, timid voice.

“Yes!”

“Is it the first time you have ever been there?”

“Sir!” returned Philip, in a voice that spoke surprise and distaste at his neighbour's curiosity.

“Forgive me,” said the gentleman, shrinking back; “but you remind me of—of—a family I once knew in the town. Do you know the—the Mortons?”

One in Philip's situation, with, as he supposed, the officers of justice in his track (for Gawtreys, for reasons of his own, rather encouraged than allayed his fears,) might well be suspicious. He replied therefore, shortly, “I am quite a stranger to the town,” and ensconced himself in the corner, as if to take a nap. Alas! that answer was of the many obstacles he was doomed to build between himself and a fairer fate.

The gentleman sighed again, and never spoke more to the end of the journey. When the coach halted at the inn—the same inn which had before given its shelter to poor Catharine—the young man in the white coat opened the door, and offered his arm to the young lady.

"Do you make any stay here, sir?" said she to the beau, as she unpinned her bonnet from the roof.

"Perhaps so: I am waiting for my phe-aton, which my faellow is to bring down—tauking a little tour."

"We shall be very happy to see you, sir," said the young lady, on whom the phe-aton completed the effect produced by the gentleman's previous gallantries; and with that she dropped a very neat card, on which was printed "Wavers and Snow, Staymakers, High-street," into his hand.

The beau put it gracefully into his pocket, leaped from the coach, nudged aside his rival of the white coat, and offered his arm to the lady, who leaned on it affectionately as she descended.

"This gentleman has been so perlit to me, James," said she. James touched his hat, the beau clapped him on the shoulder: "Ah! you are not a happy man—are you? Oh no, not at all a happy man! Good-day to you! Guard, that hatbox is mine."

While Philip was paying the coachman, the beau passed and whispered him,

"Recollect old Gregg—anything on the lay here!—don't spoil my sport if we meet!" and bustled off into the inn, whistling "God save the King!"

Philip started, then tried to bring to mind the faces which he had seen at the "strange place," and thought he recalled the features of his fellow-traveller. However, he did not seek to renew the acquaintance, but enquired the way to Mr. Morton's house, and thither he now proceeded.

He was directed, as a short cut, down one of those narrow passages at the entrance of which poets are placed, as an indication that they are appropriated solely to foot-passengers. A dead white wall, which screened the garden of the physician of the place, ran on one side; a high fence to a nursery-ground was on the other; the passage was lonely, for it was now the hour when few persons walk either for business or pleasure in a provincial town, and no sound was heard save the fall of his own step on the broad flagstones. At the end of the passage in the main street to which it led, he saw already the large, smart, showy shop, with the hot sun shining full on the gilt letters that conveyed to the eyes of the customer the respectable name of "Morton," when, suddenly, the silence was broken by choked and painful sobs. He turned, and beneath a compo portico, jutting from the wall, which adorned the physician's door, he saw a child seated on the stone steps weeping bitterly: a thrill shot through Philip's heart! Did he recognise, disguised as it was by pain and sorrow, that voice? He paused, and laid his hand on the child's shoulder: "Oh, don't—don't—pray don't—I am going, I am, indeed!" cried the child, quailing, and still keeping his hands clasped before his face.

"Sidney!" said Philip. The boy started to his feet, uttered a cry of rapturous joy, and fell upon his brother's breast.

"Oh, Philip! dear, dear Philip! you are come to take me away back to my own, own mamma; I be so good! I will never tease her again—never, never! I have been so wretched!"

"Sit down, and tell me what they have done to you," said Philip, checking the rising heart that heaved at his mother's name.

So there they sat, on the cold stone under the stranger's porch, these two orphans: Philip's arm round his brother's waist, Sidney leaning on his shoulder, and imparting to him—perhaps with pardonable exaggeration—all the sufferings he had gone through; and, when he came to that morning's chastisement, and showed the wale across the little hands which he had vainly held up in supplication, Philip's passion shook him from limb to limb. His impulse was to march straight into Mr. Morton's shop and gripe him by the throat; and the indignation he betrayed encouraged Sidney to colour yet more highly the tale of his wrongs and pain.

When he had done, and, clinging tightly to his brother's broad chest, said,

"But never mind, Philip; now we will go home to mamma."

Philip replied,

"Listen to me, my dear brother. We cannot go back to my mother. I will tell you why, later. We are alone in the world—we two! If you will come with me—God help you! for you will have many hardships: we shall have to work and drudge, and you may be cold, and hungry, and tired very often, Sidney—very, very often! But you know that, long ago, when I was so passionate, I never was knowingly unkind to you; and I declare now that I would bite out my tongue rather than it should say a harsh word to you. That is all I can promise. Think well. Will you never miss all the comforts you have now?"

"Comforts!" repeated Sidney, ruefully, and looking at the wale over his hand. "Oh! let—let—let me go with you: I shall die if I stay here. I shall indeed, indeed!"

"Hush!" said Philip; for at that moment a step was heard, and the pale gentleman walked slowly down the passage, and started, and turned his head wistfully as he looked at the boys.

When he was gone, Philip rose.

"It is settled, then," said he, firmly. "Come with me at once. You shall return to their roof no more. Come, quick: we shall have many miles to go to-night."

CHAPTER VI.

"He comes—
Yet careless what he brings; his one concern
Is to conduct it to the destined inn;
And, having dropped the expected bag, pass on—
To him indifferent whether grief or joy."
Cowper: Description of the Postman.

The pale gentleman entered Mr. Morton's shop; and looking round him, spied the worthy trader showing shawls to a young lady just married. He seated himself on a stool, and said to the bowing foreman,

"I will wait till Mr. Morton is disengaged."

The young lady, having closely examined seven shawls, and declared they were beautiful, said "she would think of it," and walked away. Mr. Morton now approached the stranger.

"Mr. Morton," said the pale gentleman, "you are very little altered. You do not recollect me?"

"Bless me, Mr. Spencer! is it really you? Well, what a time since we met! I am very glad to see you. And what brings you to N—? business?"

"Yes, business. Let us go within."

Mr. Morton led the way to the parlour, where Master Tom, perched on the stool, was rapidly digesting the plundered muffin. Mr. Morton dismissed him to play, and the pale gentleman took a chair.

"Mr. Morton," said he, glancing over his dress, "you see I am in mourning. It is for your sister. I never got the better of that early attachment—never."

"My sister! Good Heavens!" said Mr. Morton, turning very pale; "is she dead?—poor Catharine!—and I not know of it! When did she die?"

"Not many days since; and—and—" said Mr. Spencer, greatly affected, "I fear, in want. I had been abroad for some months; on my return last week, looking over the newspapers (for I always order them to be filed), I read the short account of her lawsuit against Mr. Beaufort some time back. I resolved to find her out. I did so through the solicitor she employed: it was too late; I arrived at her lodgings two days after her corpse had left it for the grave. I then determined to visit poor Catharine's brother, and learn if anything could be done for the children she had left behind."

"She left but two. Philip, the elder, is very comfortably placed at R—; the youngest has his home with me; and Mrs. Morton is a moth—that is to say, she takes great pains with him. Ehem! and my poor, poor sister!"

"Is he like his mother?"

"Very much, when she was young—poor, dear Catharine!"

"What age is he?"

"About ten, perhaps—I don't know exactly—much younger than the other. And so she's dead!"

"Mr. Morton, I am an old bachelor" (here a sickly smile crossed Mr. Spencer's face); "a small portion of my fortune is settled, it is true, on my relations; but the rest is mine, and I live within my income. The elder one is probably old enough to begin to take care of himself. But the younger—perhaps you have a family of your own and can spare him?"

Mr. Morton hesitated, and twitched up his trowsers.

"Why," said he, "this is very kind in you. I don't know—we'll see. The boy is out now; come and dine with us at two—pot-luck. Well, so she is no more!—heighho! Meanwhile, I'll talk it over with Mrs. M."

"I will be with you," said Mr. Spencer, rising.

"Ah!" sighed Mr. Morton, "if Catharine had but married you, she would have been a happy woman."

"I would have tried to make her so," said Mr. Spencer, as he turned away his face and took his departure.

Two o'clock came, but no Sidney. They had sent to the place whither he had been despatched: he had never arrived there. Mr. Morton grew alarmed; and, when Mr. Spencer came to dinner, his host was gone in search of the truant. He did not return till three. Doomed that day to be belated both at breakfast and dinner, this decided him to part with Sidney whenever he should be found. Mrs. Morton was persuaded that the child only sulked, and would come back fast enough when he was hungry. Mr. Spencer tried to believe her, and ate his mutton, which was burned to a cinder; but when five, six, seven o'clock came, and the boy was still missing, even Mrs. Morton agreed that it was high time to institute a regular search. The whole family set off different ways. It was ten o'clock before they were reunited; and then, all the news picked up was, that a boy answering Sidney's description had been seen with a young man in three several parts of the town; the last time at the outskirts, on the high road towards the manufacturing districts. These tidings so far relieved Mr. Morton's mind, that he dismissed the chilling fear that crept there—that Sidney might have drowned himself. Boys will drown themselves sometimes! The description of the young man coincided so remarkably with the fellow-passenger of Mr. Spencer, that he did not doubt it was the same; the more so when he recollected having seen him with a fair-haired child under the portico; and yet more when he recalled the likeness to Catharine that had struck him in the coach, and caused the inquiry that had roused Philip's suspicion. The mystery was thus made clear: Sidney had fled with his brother. Nothing more, however, could be done that night. The next morning active measures should be devised; and, when the morning came, the mail brought to Mr. Morton the two following letters. The first was from Arthur Beaufort,

"Sir,—I have only been prevented by severe illness from writing to you before. I can now scarcely hold a pen; but, the instant my health is recovered, I shall be with you at N—.

"On her deathbed, the mother of the boy under your charge, Sidney Morton, committed him solemnly to me, the heir and representative of his father. I make his fortunes my care, and shall hasten to claim him at your kindly hands. But the elder son—this poor Philip, who has suffered so unjustly; for our lawyer has seen Mr. Plaskwith, and heard the whole story—what has become of him? All our enquiries have failed to track him. Alas! I was too ill to institute them myself while it was yet time. Perhaps he may have sought shelter with you, his uncle; if so, assure him that he is in no danger from the pursuit of the law; that his innocence is fully recognised; and that my father and myself implore him to accept our affection. I can write no more now, but in a few days I shall hope to see you.

"I am, sir, &c.

"ARTHUR BEAUFORT.

"Berkeley Square."

The second letter was from Mr. Plaskwith, and ran thus:

"Dear Morton,—Something very awkward has happened—not my fault, and very unpleasant for me. Your relation, Philip, as I wrote you word, was a painstaking lad, though odd and bad mannered—for want, perhaps, poor boy, of being taught better; and Mrs. P. is, you know, a very genteel woman—women go too much by manners—so she never took much to him. However, to the point, as the French emperor used to say: one evening he asked me for money for his mother, who, he said, was ill, in a very insolent way—I may say, threatening. It was in my own shop, and before Plimmins and Mrs. P.; I was forced to answer with dignified rebuke, and left the shop. When I returned, he was gone, and some shillings—fourteen, I think, and three sovereigns—evidently from the till, scattered on the floor. Mrs. P. and Mr. Plimmins were very much frightened; thought it was clear I was robbed, and that we were to be murdered. Plimmins slept below that night, and we borrowed butcher Johnson's dog. Nothing happened. I did not think I was robbed, because the money, when we came to calculate, was all right. I know human nature: he had thought to take it, but repented—quite clear. However, I was naturally very angry—thought he'd come back again—meant to reprove him properly—waited several days—heard nothing of him—grew uneasy—would not attend longer to Mrs. P. (for as Napoleon Bonaparte observed, 'women are well in their way, not in ours')—made Plimmins go with me to town—hired a Bow-street runner to track him out—cost me £1 1s. and two glasses of brandy and water. Poor Mrs. Morton was just buried—quite shocked! Suddenly saw the boy in the streets. Plimmins rushed forward in the kindest way—was knocked down—hurt his arm—paid 2s. 6d. for lotion. Philip ran off—we ran after him—could not find him. Forced to return home. Next day, a lawyer from a Mr. Beaufort—Mr. George Blackwell, a gentleman-like man called. Mr. Beaufort will do anything for him in reason. Is there anything more I can do? I really am very uneasy about the lad, and Mrs. P. and I have a tiff about it; but that's nothing—thought I had best write to you for instructions.

"Yours truly,

"C. PLASKWITH.

"P. S.—Just open my letter to say, Bow-street officer just been here—has found out that the boy has been seen with a very suspicious character: they think he has left London. Bow-street officer wants to go after him—very expensive: so now you can decide."

Mr. Spencer scarce listened to the former letter, but of the latter he felt jealous. He would fain have been the only protector to Catharine's children; but he was the last man fitted to head the search, now so necessary to prosecute with equal tact and energy.

A soft-hearted, soft-headed man—a confirmed valetudinarian—a day-dreamer, who had wasted away his life in dawdling and maudering over simple poetry, and sighing over his unhappy attachment—no child, no babe, was so thoroughly helpless as Mr. Spencer.

The task of investigation devolved, therefore, on Mr. Morton, and he went about it in a regular, plain, straight-forward way. Handbills were circulated, constables employed, and a lawyer, accompanied by Mr. Spencer, despatched to the manufacturing districts, towards which the orphans had been seen to direct their path.

CHAPTER VII.

"Give the gentle South
Yet leave to court those fairies."
BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER: Beggar's Bush.

"Cut your cloth, sir,
According to your calling."—Ibid.

Meanwhile the brothers were far away, and He who feeds the young ravens made their paths pleasant to their feet. Philip had broken to Sidney the sad news of their mother's death, and Sidney had wept with bitter passion. But children, what can they know of death? Their tears over graves dry sooner than the dews. It is melancholy to compare the depth, the endurance, the far-sighted, anxious, prayerful love of a parent, with the inconsiderate, frail, and evanescent affection of the infant, whose eyes the hues of the butterfly yet dazzle with delight. It was the night of their flight, and in the open air, when Philip (his arms round Sidney's waist) told his brother-orphan that they were motherless. And the air was balmy, the skies filled with the effulgent presence of the August moon: the cornfields stretched round them wide and far, and not a leaf trembled on the beech-tree beneath which they had sought shelter. It seemed as if Nature herself smiled pityingly on their young sorrow, and said to them, "Grieve not for the dead: I, who live for ever, I will be your mother!"

They crept, as the night deepened, into the warmer sleeping-place afforded by stacks of hay, mown that summer, and still fragrant. And the next morning the birds woke them betimes, to feel that Liberty, at least, was with them, and to wander with her at will.

Who in his boyhood has not felt the delight of freedom and adventure—to have the world of woods and sward before him—to escape restriction—to lean, for the first time, on his own resources—to rejoice in the wild but manly luxury of independence—to act the Crusoe—and to fancy a Friday in every footprint—an island of his own in every field? Yes, in spite of their desolation their loss, of the melancholy past, of the friendless future, the orphans were happy; happy in their youth, their freedom, their love, their wanderings in the delicious air of the glorious August. Sometimes they came upon knots of reapers lingering in the shade of the hedgerows over their noonday meal; and, grown sociable by travel and bold by safety, they joined and partook of the rude fare with the zest of fatigue and youth. Sometimes, too, at night, they saw, gleam afar and red by the wood-side, the fires of gipsy tents. But these, with the superstition derived from old nursery tales, they scrupulously shunned, eyeing them with a mysterious awe! What heavenly twilights belong to that golden month! the air so lucidly serene, as the purple of the clouds fades gradually away, and up soars, broad, round, intense, and luminous, the full moon which belongs to the joyous season! The fields then are greener than in the heats of July and June; they have got back the luxury of a second spring. And still, beside the paths of the travellers, lingered on the hedges the clustering honeysuckle; the convolvulus glittered in the tangles of the brake; the hardy heath-flower smiled on the green waste.

And ever, at evening, they came, field after field, upon those circles which recall to children so many charmed legends, and are fresh and frequent in that month—the Fairy rings! They thought, poor boys, that it was a good omen, and half fancied that the fairies protected them, as in the old time they had often protected the desolate and outcast.

They avoided the main roads, and all towns, with suspicious care. But sometimes they paused, for food and rest, at the obscure hostels of some scattered hamlets; though, more often, they loved to spread the simple food they purchased by the way under some thick tree, or beside a stream, through whose limpid waters they could watch the trout glide and play. And they often preferred the chance-shelter of a haystack or a shed to the less romantic repose afforded by the small inns they alone dared to enter. They went, in this, much by the face and voice of the host or hostess. Once only Philip had entered a town, on the second day of their flight, and that solely for the purchase of ruder clothes, and a change of linen for Sidney, with some implements of use necessary in their present course of shift and welcome hardship. A wise precaution; for, thus clad, they escaped suspicion.

So journeying, they consumed several days; and, having taken a direction quite opposite to that which led to the manufacturing districts, whither pursuit had been directed, they were now in the centre of another county—in the neighbourhood of one of the most considerable towns of England: and here Philip began to think their wanderings ought to cease, and it was time to settle on some definite course of life. He had carefully hoarded about his person, and most thriftily managed, the little fortune bequeathed by his mother. But Philip looked on this capital as a deposit sacred to Sidney; it was not to be spent, but kept and augmented—the nucleus for future wealth. Within the last few weeks his character was greatly ripened, and his powers of thought enlarged. He was no more a boy, he was a man; he had another life to take care of. He resolved, then, to enter the town they were approaching, and to seek for some situation by which he might maintain both. Sidney was very loth to abandon their present roving life; but he allowed that the warm weather could not always last, and that in winter the fields would be less pleasant. He therefore, with a sigh, yielded to his brother's reasonings.

They entered the fair and busy town of — one day at noon; and, after finding a small lodging, at which he deposited Sidney, who was fatigued with their day's work, Philip sallied forth alone.

After his long rambling, Philip was pleased and struck with the broad, bustling streets, the gay shops—the evidences of opulence and trade. He thought it hard if he could not find there a market for the health and heart of sixteen. He strolled slowly and alone along the streets till his attention was caught by a small corner-shop, in the window of which was placed a board bearing this inscription:

"OFFICE FOR EMPLOYMENT.—RECIPROCAL ADVANTAGE."

"Mr. John Clump's bureau open every day from ten till four. Clerks, servants, labourers, &c., provided with suitable situations. Terms moderate. N. B.—The oldest established office in the town.

"Wanted, a good cook. An under-gardener."

What he sought was here. Philip entered, and saw a short, fat man, with spectacles, seated before a desk, poring upon the well-filled leaves of a long register.

"Sir," said Philip, "I wish for a situation; I don't care what."

"Half a crown for entry, if you please. That's right. Now for particulars. Hum! you don't look like a servant!"

"No; I wish for any place where my education can be of use. I can read, write—I know Latin and French—I can draw—I know arithmetic and summing."

"Very well; very genteel young man—prepossessing appearance (that's a fudge!)—highly educated—usher in a school, eh?"

"What you like."

"References?"

"I have none."

"Eh! none?" and Mr. Clump fixed his spectacles full upon Philip.

Philip was prepared for the question, and had the art to perceive that a frank reply was his best policy. "The fact is," said he, boldly, "I was well brought up; my father died; I was bound apprentice to a trade I disliked; I left it, and have now no friends."

"If I can help you, I will," said Mr. Clump, coldly, "Can't promise much. If you were a labourer, character might not matter; but educated young men must have a character. Hands always more useful than head. Education no avail nowadays—common, quite common. Call again on Monday."

Somewhat disappointed and chilled, Philip turned from the bureau; but he had a strong confidence in his own resources, and recovered his spirits as he mingled with the throng. He passed at length by a livery-stable, and paused, from old associations, as he saw a groom in the news attempting to manage a young, hot horse, evidently unbroken. The master of the stables, in a green short jacket and top boots, with a long whip in his hand, was standing by, with one or two men who looked like horsedealers.

"Come off, clumsy! You can't manage that 'ere fine hanimal," cried the liveryman. "Ah! he's a lamb, sir, if he were backed properly. But I has not a man in the yard as can ride since Will died. Come off, I say, lubber!"

But to come off without being thrown off was more easily said than done. The horse was now plunging as if Juno had sent her gadfly to him; and Philip, interested and excited, came nearer, and nerear, till he stood by the side of the horsedealers. The other hostlers ran to the help of their comrade, who, at last, with white lips and shaking knees, found himself on terra firma; while the horse, snorting hard, and rubbing his head against the breast and arms of the hostler who held him tightly by the rein, seemed to ask, in his own way, "Are there any more of you?"

A suspicion that the horse was an old acquaintance crossed Philip's mind; he went up to him, and a white spot over the left eye confirmed his doubts. It had been a foal reserved and reared for his own riding; one that, in his prosperous day, had ate bread from his hand, and followed him round the paddock like a dog; one that he had mounted in sport, without saddle, when his father's back was turned: a friend, in short, of the happy lang syne; nay, the very friend to whom he had boasted his affection, when, standing with Arthur Beaufort under the summer sky, the whole world seemed to him full of friends. He put his hand on the horse's neck, and whispered, "Soho! So, Billy!" and the horse turned sharp round with a quick, joyous neigh.

"If you please, sir," said Philip, appealing to the liveryman, "I will undertake to ride this horse, and take him over yon leaping-bar. Just let me try him."

"There's a fine-spirited lad for you!" said the liveryman, much pleased at the offer. "Now, gentlemen, did I not tell you that ere hanimal had no vice if he was properly managed?"

The horsedealers shook their heads.

"May I give him some bread first?" asked Philip; and the hostler was despatched to the house. Meanwhile, the animal evinced various signs of pleasure and recognition as Philip stroked and talked to him; and, finally, when he ate the bread from the young man's hands, the whole yard seemed in as much delight and surprise as if they had witnessed one of Monsieur Van Amburgh's exploits.

And now Philip, still caressing him, slowly and cautiously mounted; the horse made one bound half across the yard—a bound which sent all the horsedealers into a corner—and then went through his paces, one after the other, with as much ease and calm as if he had been broke in at Mr. Fozard's to carry a young lady. And when he crowned all by going thrice over the leaping-bar, and Philip, dismounting, threw the reins to the hostler, and turned triumphantly to the horse-dealer, that gentleman slapped him on the back, and said emphatically, "Sir, you are a man! and I am proud to see you here."

Meanwhile, the horsedealers gathered round the animal; looked at his hoofs, felt his legs, examined his windpipe, and concluded the bargain, which, but for Philip, would have been very abruptly broken off. When the horse was led out of the yard, the liveryman, Mr. Stubmore, turned to Philip, who, leaning against the wall, followed the poor animal with mournful eyes.

"My good sir, you have sold that horse for me—that you have! Anything as I can do for you? One good turn deserves another. Here's a brace of shiners."

"Thank you, sir; I want no money, but I do want some employment. I can be of use to you, perhaps, in your establishment. I have been brought up among horses all my life."

"Saw it, sir! that's very clear. I say that 'ere horse knows you!" and the dealer put his finger to his nose. "Quite right to be mum! He came from an old customer of mine—famous rider!—Mr. Beaufort. Aha! that's where you knew him, I 'spose. Were you in his stables?"

"Hem—I knew Mr. Beaufort well."

"Did you? You could not know a better man. Well, I shall be very glad to engage you, though you seem, by your hands, to be a bit of a gentleman, eh? Never mind; don't want you to groom, but superintend things. D'ye know how to keep accounts, eh?"

"Yes."

"Character?"

Philip repeated to Mr. Stubmore the story he had imparted to Mr. Clump. Somehow or other, men who live much with horses are always more lax in their notions than the rest of mankind. Mr. Stubmore did not seem to grow more distant at Philip's narration.

"Understand you perfectly, my man. Brought up with them 'ere fine creturs, how could you nail your nose to a desk? I'll take you without more palaver. What's your name?"

"Philips."

"Come to-morrow, and we'll settle about wages. Sleep here?"

"No. I have a brother whom I must lodge with, and for whose sake I wish to work. I should not like him to be at the stables—he is too young. But I can come early every day, and go home late."

"Well, just as you like, man. Good-day."

And thus, not from any mental accomplishment—not from the result of his intellectual education, but from the mere physical capacity and brute habit of sticking fast in his saddle, did Philip Morton, in this great, intelligent, civilised, enlightened community of Great Britain, find the means of earning his bread without stealing it.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Don Salluste (souriant). Je parie Que vous ne pensiez pas à moi!"—RUY BLAS.

"Don Salluste. Cousin!
"Don César. De vos bienfaits je n'aurai nulle envie, Tant que je trouverai vivant ma libre vie."—Ibid.

Philip's situation was agreeable to his habits. His great courage and skill in horsemanship were not the only qualifications useful to Mr. Stubmore: his education answered a useful purpose in accounts, and his manners and appearance were highly to the credit of the yard. The customers and loungers soon grew to like Gentleman Philips, as he was styled in the establishment. Mr. Stubmore conceived a real affection for him. So passed several weeks; and Philip, in this humble capacity, might have worked out his destinies in peace and comfort, but for a new cause of vexation that arose in Sidney. This boy was all in all to his brother. For him he had resisted the hearty and joyous invitations of Gawtrey (whose gay manner and high spirits had, it must be owned, captivated his fancy, despite the equivocal mystery of the man's avocations and condition); for him he now worked and toiled, cheerful and contented; and him he sought to save from all to which he subjected himself. He could not bear that that soft and delicate child should ever be exposed to the low and menial associations that now made up his own life—to the obscene slang of grooms and hostlers—to their coarse manners and rough contact. He kept him, therefore, apart and aloof in their little lodging, and hoped in time to lay by, so that Sidney might ultimately be restored, if not to his bright original sphere, at least to a higher grade than that to which Philip was condemned. But poor Sidney could not bear to be thus left alone—to lose sight of his brother from daybreak till bedtime—to have no one to amuse him; he fretted and pined away: all the little inconsiderate selfishness, uneradicated from his breast by his sufferings, broke out the more, the more he felt that he was the first object on earth to Philip. Philip, thinking he might be more cheerful at a day-school, tried the experiment of placing him at one where the boys were much of his own age. But Sidney, on the third day, came back with a black eye, and he would return no more. Philip several times thought of changing their lodging for one where there were young people. But Sidney had taken a fancy to the kind old widow who was their landlady, and cried at the thought of removal. Unfortunately, the old woman was deaf and rheumatic; and, though she bore teasing ad libitum, she could not entertain him long on a stretch. Too young to be reasonable, Sidney could not or would not comprehend why his brother was so long away from him; and once he said peevishly,

"If I had thought I was to be moped up so I would not have left Mrs. Morton. Tom was a bad boy, but still it was somebody to play with. I wish I had not gone away with you!"

This speech cut Philip to the heart. What, then, he had taken from the child a respectable and safe shelter—the sure provision of a life—and the child now reproached him! When this was said to him, the tears gushed from his eyes.

"God forgive me, Sidney," said he, and turned away.

But then Sidney, who had the most endearing ways with him, seeing his brother so vexed, ran up and kissed him, and scolded himself for being naughty. Still the words were spoken, and their meaning rankled deep. Philip himself, too, was morbid in his excessive tenderness for this boy. There is a certain age, before the love for the sex commences, when the feeling of friendship is almost a passion. You see it constantly in girls and boys at school. It is the first vague craving of the heart after the master food of human life—Love. It has its jealousies, and humours, and caprices, like love itself. Philip was painfully acute to Sidney's affection—was jealous of every particle of it. He dreaded lest his brother should ever be torn from him.

He would start from his sleep at night, and go to Sidney's bed to see that he was there. He left him in the morning with forebodings, he returned in the dark with fear. Meanwhile, the character of this young man, so sweet and tender to Sidney, was gradually becoming more hard and stern to others. He had now climbed to the post of command in that rude establishment; and premature command in any sphere tends to make men unsocial and imperious.

One day Mr. Stubmore called him into his own counting-house, where stood a gentleman with one hand in his coat-pocket, the other tapping his whip against his boots.

"Philips, show this gentleman the brown mare. She is a beauty in harness, is not she? This gentleman wants a match for his pheaton."

"She must step very hoigh," said the gentleman, turning round; and Philip recognised the beau in the stagecoach.

The recognition was simultaneous. The beau nodded, then whistled, and winked.

"Come, my man, I am at your service," said he.

Philip, with many misgivings, followed him across the yard. The gentleman then beckoned him to approach.

"You, sir—moind, I never peach—setting up here in the honest line? Dull work, honesty, eh?"

"Sir, I really don't know you."

"Daun't you recollect old Gregg's, the evening you came there with jolly Bill Gawtrey? Recollect that, eh?"

Philip was mute.

"I was among the gentleman in the back-parlour who shook you by the hand. Bill's off to France, then. I am tauking the provinces. I want a good horse—the best in the yard, moind! Cutting such a swell here! My name is Captain De Burgh Smith—never moind yours, my fine fellow. Now, then, out with your rattlers, and keep your tongue in your mouth."

Philip mechanically ordered out the brown mare, which Captain Smith did not seem much to approve of; and after glancing round the stables with great disdain of the collection, he sauntered out of the yard without saying more to Philip, though he stopped and spoke a few sentences to Mr. Stubmore. Philip hoped he had no design of purchasing, and that he was rid, for the present, of so awkward a customer. Mr. Stubmore approached Philip.

"Drive over the grays to Sir John," said he. "My lady wants a pair to job. A very pleasant man, that Captain Smith. I did not know you had been in the yard before—says you were the pet at Elmore's, in London. Served him many a day. Pleasant, gentlemanlike man!"

"Y—e—s!" said Philip, hardly knowing what he said, and hurrying back into the stables to order out the grays.

The place to which he was bound was some miles distant, and it was sunset when he returned. As he drove into the main street, two men observed him closely.

"That is he! I am almost sure it is," said one.

"Oh! then it's all smooth sailing," replied the other.

"But, bless my eyes; you must be mistaken! See whom he's talking to now!"

At that moment Captain De Burgh Smith, mounted on the brown mare, stopped Philip.

"Well, you see I've bought her—hope she'll turn out well. What do you really think she's worth—not to buy, but to sell?"

"Sixty guineas."

"Well, that's a good day's work, and I owe it to you. The old faellow would not have trusted me if you had not served me at Elmore's—ha! ha! If he gets scent and looks shy at you, my lad, come to me. I'm at the Star Hotel for the next few days. I want a tight faellow like you, and you shall have a fair per centage. I'm none of your stingy ones. I say, I hope this devil is quiet. She cocks up her ears dawningly!"

"Look you, sir!" said Philip, very gravely, and rising up in his break, "I know very little of you, and that little is not much to your credit. I give you fair warning, that I shall caution my employer against you."

"Will you, my fine faellow? Then take care of yourself."

"Stay! and if you dare utter a word against me," said Philip, with that frown to which his swarthy complexion and flashing eyes gave an expression of fierce power beyond his years, "you will find that as I am the last to care for a threat, so I am the first to resent an injury!"

Thus saying, he drove on. Captain Smith affected a cough, and put his brown mare into a canter. The two men followed Philip as he drove into the yard.

"What do you know against the person he spoke to?" said one of them.

"Merely that he is one of cunningest swells on this side the Bay," returned the other. "It looks bad for your young friend."

The first speaker shook his head and made no reply.

On gaining the yard, Philip found that Mr. Stubmore had gone out, and was not expected home till next day. He had some relations who were farmers, whom he often visited; to them he was probably gone.

Philip therefore, deferring his intended caution against the gay captain till the morrow, and musing how the caution might be most discreetly given, walked homeward. He had just entered the lane that led to his lodgings, when he saw the two men I have spoken of on the other side of the street. The taller and better dressed of the two left his comrade, and crossing over to Philip, bowed, and thus accosted him:

"Fine evening, Mr. Philip Morton. I am rejoiced to see you at last. You remember me—Mr. Blackwell, Lincoln's Inn?"

"What is your business?" said Philip, halting, and speaking short and fiercely.

"Now don't be in a passion, my dear sir—now don't. I am here on behalf of my clients, Messrs. Beaufort, sen. and jun. I have had such work to find you! Dear, dear! but you are a sly one! Ha! ha! Well, you see we have settled that little affair of Plaskwith's for you (might have been ugly,) and now I hope you will—"

"To your business, sir! What do you want with me?"

"Why, now, don't be so quick! 'Tis not the way to do business. Suppose you step to my hotel. A glass of wine, now, Mr. Philip! We shall soon understand each other."

"Out of my path, or speak plainly!"

Thus put to it, the lawyer, casting a glance at his stout companion, who appeared to be contemplating the sunset on the other side of the way, came at once to the marrow of his subject.

"Well, then—well, my say is soon said. Mr. Arthur Beaufort takes a most lively interest in you—it is he who has directed this inquiry. He bids me say that he shall be most happy—yes, most happy—to serve you in anything; and if you will but see him—he is in the town—I am sure you will be charmed with him—most amiable young man!"

"Look you, sir," said Philip, drawing himself up; "neither from father, nor from son, nor from one of that family, on whose heads rest the mother's death and the orphan's curse, will I ever accept boon or benefit—with them, voluntarily, I will hold no communion; if they force themselves in my path, let them beware! I am earning my bread in the way I desire—I am independent—I want them not. Begone!"

With that, Philip pushed aside the lawyer and strode on rapidly. Mr. Blackwell, absorbed and perplexed, returned to his companion.

Philip regained his home, and found Sidney stationed at the window alone, and with wistful eyes noting the flight of the gray moths as they darted to and fro across the dull shrubs, that, variegated with lines for washing, adorned the plot of ground which the landlady called a garden. The elder brother had returned at an earlier hour than usual, and Sidney did not at first perceive him enter. When he did, he clapped his hands and ran to him.

"This is so good in you, Philip! I have been so dull! You will come and play now?"

"With all my heart. Where shall we play?" said Philip, with a cheerful smile.

"Oh, in the garden! it's such a nice time for hide-and-seek."

"But is it not chill and damp for you?" said Philip.

"There, now, you are always making excuses. I see you don't like it. I have no heart to play now."

Sidney seated himself and pouted.

"Poor Sidney! you must be dull without me. Yes, let us play; but put on this handkerchief," said Philip, took off his own cravat, and tied it round his brother's neck, and kissed him.

Sidney, whose anger seldom lasted long, was reconciled, and they went into the garden to play. It was a little spot, screened by an old moss-grown paling from the neighbouring garden on the one side, and a lane on the other. They played with great glee till the night grew darker and the dews heavier.

"This must be the last time," cried Philip. "It is my turn to hide."

"Very well! Now, then."

Philip secreted himself behind a poplar; and, as Sidney searched for him, and Philip stole round and round the tree, the latter, happening to look across the paling, saw the dim outline of a man's figure in the lane, who appeared watching them. A thrill shot across his breast. These Beauports, associated in his thoughts with every ill omen and augury, had they set a spy upon his movements? He remained erect and gazing at the form, when Sidney discovered and ran up to him with his noisy laugh.

As the child clung to him, shouting with gladness, Philip, unheeding his playmate, called aloud and imperiously to the stranger,

"What are you gaping at? Why do you stand watching us?"

The man muttered something, moved on, and disappeared.

"I hope there are no thieves here! I am much afraid of thieves," said Sidney, tremulously.

The fear grated on Philip's heart. Had he not himself, perhaps, been judged and treated as a thief? He said nothing, but drew his brother within; and there, in their little room, by the one poor candle, it was touching and beautiful to see these boys—the tender patience of the elder lending itself to every whim of the younger—now building houses with cards—now telling stories of fairy and knight-errant, the sprightliest he could remember or invent. At length, as all was over, and Sidney was undressing for the night, Philip, standing apart, said to him in a mournful voice,

"Are you sad now, Sidney?"

"No! not when you are with me; but that is so seldom!"

"Do you read none of the story books I bought for you?"

"Sometimes! but one can't read all day."

"Ah! Sidney, if ever we should part, perhaps you will love me no longer!"

"Don't say so," said Sidney. "But we sha'n't part, Philip?"

Philip sighed and turned away as his brother leaped into bed. Something whispered to him that danger was near; and as it was, could Sidney grow up, neglected and uneducated: was it thus that he was to fulfil his trust?

CHAPTER IX.

"But oh, what storm was in that mind!"

CHARLES: Ruth.

While Philip mused and his brother fell into the happy sleep of boyhood, in a room in the principal hotel of the town sat three persons, Arthur Beaufort, Mr. Spencer, and Mr. Blackwell.

"And so," said the first, "he rejected every overture from the Beauports?"

"With a scorn I cannot convey to you!" replied the lawyer. "But the fact is, that he is evidently a lad of low habits—to think of his being a sort of helper to a horsedealer! I suppose, sir, he was always in the stables in his father's time. Bad company depraves the taste very soon; but that is not the worst. Sharp declares that the man he was talking with, as I told you, is a common swindler. Depend on it, Mr. Arthur, he is incorrigible; all we can do is to save the brother."

"It is too dreadful to contemplate!" said Arthur, who, still ill and languid, reclined on a sofa.

"It is, indeed," said Mr. Spencer; "I am sure I should not know what to do with such a character; but the other poor child, it would be a mercy to get hold of him."

"Where is Mr. Sharp?" asked Arthur.

"Why," said the lawyer, "he has followed Philip at a distance to find out his lodgings, and learn if his brother is with him. Oh! here he is!" and Blackwell's companion in the earlier part of the evening entered.

"I have found him out, sir," said Mr. Sharp, wiping his forehead. "What a fierce 'un he is! I thought he would have had a stone at my head; but we officers are used to it; we do our duty, and Providence makes our heads unkinmon hard!"

"Is the child with him?" asked Mr. Spencer.

"Yes, sir."

"A little, quiet, subdued boy?" asked the melancholy inhabitant of the Lakes.

"Quiet! Lord love you! never heard a noisier little urchin! There they were, romping and rousing in the garden like a couple of jail-birds."

"You see," groaned Mr. Spencer, "he will make that poor child as bad as himself."

"What shall we do, Mr. Blackwell?" asked Sharp, who longed for his brandy and water.

"Why, I was thinking you might go to the horse dealer the first thing in the morning; find out whether Philip is really thick with the swindler; and perhaps Mr. Stubmore may have some influence with him, if, without saying who he is—"

"Yes," interrupted Arthur; "do not expose his name."

"You could still hint that he ought to be induced to listen to his friends, and go with them. Mr. Stubmore may be a respectable man, and—"

"I understand," said Sharp; "I have no doubt as how I can settle it. We learn to know human nature in our profession—'cause why, we gets at its blind side. Good night, gentlemen!"

"You seem very pale, Mr. Arthur; you had better go to bed: you promised your father, you know."

"Yes, I am not well; I will go to bed;" and Arthur rose, lighted his candle, and sought his room.

"I will see Philip to-morrow," he said to himself; "he will listen to me."

The conduct of Arthur Beaufort, in executing the charge he had undertaken, had brought into full light all the most amiable and generous parts of his character. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered, he had expressed so much anxiety as to the fate of the orphans, that, to quiet him, his father was forced to send for Mr. Blackwell. The lawyer had ascertained, through Dr. —, the name of Philip's employer at R—. At Arthur's request, he went down to Mr. Plaskwith, and, arriving there the day after the return of the bookseller, learned those particulars with which Mr. Plaskwith's letter to Roger Morton has already made the reader acquainted. The lawyer then sent for Mr. Sharp, the officer before employed, and commissioned him to track the young man's whereabouts. That shrewd functionary soon reported that a youth every way answering to Philip's description had been introduced, the night of the escape, by a man celebrated, not, indeed, for robberies, or larcenies, or crimes of the coarser kind, but for address in all that more large and complex character which comes under the denomination of living upon one's wits, to a polite rendezvous frequented by persons of a similar profession. Since then, however, all clew of Philip was lost. But, though Mr. Blackwell, in the way of his profession, was thus publicly benevolent towards the fugitive, he did not the less privately represent to his patrons, senior and junior, the very equivocal character that Philip must be allowed to bear. Like most lawyers, hard upon all who wander from the formal tracks, he unaffectedly regarded Philip's flight and absence as proofs of a very reprobate disposition; and this conduct was greatly aggravated in his eyes by Mr. Sharp's report, by which it appeared that, after his escape, Philip had so suddenly, and, as it were, so naturally, taken to such equivocal companionship. Mr. Robert Beaufort, already prejudiced against Philip, viewed matters in the same light as the lawyer; and the story of his supposed predilections reached Arthur's ears in so distorted a shape, that even he was staggered and revolted; still, Philip was so young—Arthur's oath to the orphans' mother so recent—and, if thus early inclined to wrong courses, should not every effort be made to lure him back to the broad path? With these views and reasonings, as soon as he was able, Arthur himself visited Mrs. Lacy; and the note from Philip, which that good lady put into his hands, affected him deeply, and confirmed all his previous resolutions. Mrs. Lacy was very anxious to get his name; but Arthur, having heard that Philip had refused all aid from his father and Mr. Blackwell, thought that the young man's pride might work equally against himself, and therefore evaded the landlady's curiosity. He wrote the next day the letter we have seen to Mr. Roger Morton, whose address Catharine had given to him; and by return of post came a letter from the linen-draper, narrating the flight of Sidney, as it was supposed, with his brother, 'This news so excited Arthur, that he insisted on going down to N — at once, and joining in the search. His father, alarmed for his health, positively refused; and the consequence was an increase of fever, a consultation with the doctors, and a declaration that Mr. Arthur was in that state that it would be dangerous not to let him have his own way. Mr. Beaufort was forced to yield, and, with Blackwell and Mr. Sharp, accompanied his son to N —. The inquiries, hitherto fruitless, then assumed a more regular and business-like character. By little and little they came, through the aid of Mr. Sharp, upon the right clew up to a certain point. But here there was a double scent: two youths answering the description had been seen at a small village; then there came those who asserted that they had seen the same youths at a seaport in one direction; others, who deposed to their having taken the road to an inland town in the other. This had induced Arthur and his father to part company. Mr. Beaufort, accompanied by Roger Morton, went to the seaport, and Arthur, with Mr. Spencer and Mr. Sharp, more fortunate, tracked the fugitives to their retreat. As for Mr. Beaufort senior, now that his mind was more at ease about his son, he was thoroughly sick of the whole thing; greatly bored by the society of Mr. Morton; very much ashamed that he, so respectable and great a man, should be employed on such an errand; more afraid of, than pleased with, any chance of discovering the fierce Philip; and secretly resolving upon slinking back to London at the first reasonable excuse.

The next morning Mr. Sharp entered betimes Mr. Stubmore's counting-house. In the yard he caught a glimpse of Philip, and managed to keep himself unseen by that young gentleman.

"Mr. Stubmore, I think?"

"At your service, sir."

Mr. Sharp shut the glass door mysteriously, and, lifting up the corner of the green curtain that covered the panes, beckoned to the startled Stubmore to approach.

"You see that 'ere young man in the velvet-jacket—you employs him?"

"I do, sir; he is my right hand."

"Well, now, don't be frightened; but his friends are arter him. He has got into bad ways, and we want you to give him a little good advice."

"Pooh! I know he has run away, like a fine-spirited lad as he is; and, as long as he likes to stay with me, they as comes after him may get a ducking in the horse-trough!"

"Be you a father—a father of a family, Mr. Stubmore?" said Sharp, thrusting his hands into his breeches pockets, swelling out his stomach, and pursing up his lips with great solemnity.

"Nonsense! no gammon with me! Take your chaff to the goslings. I tell you I can't do without that 'ere lad. Every man to himself."

"Oho!" thought Sharp, "I must change the tack. Mr. Stubmore," said he, taking a stool, "you speak like a sensible man. No one can reasonably go for to ask a gentleman to go for to inconvenience his-self. But what do you know of that 'ere youngster? Had you a carakter with him?"

"What's that to you?"

"Why it's more to yourself, Mr. Stubmore; he is but a lad, and if he goes back to his friends, they may take care of him; but he got into a bad set afore he come here. Do you know a good-looking chap with whiskers, who talks of his pheaton, and was riding last night on a brown mare?"

"Y—e—s!" said Mr. Stubmore, growing rather pale, "and I knows the mare too. Why, sir, I sold him that mare!"

"Did he pay you for it?"

"Why, to be sure; he gave me a check on Coutts."

"And you took it! My eyes, what a flat!" Here Mr. Sharp closed those orbs he had invoked, and whistled with that sort of self-hugging delight which men invariably feel when another man is taken in.

Mr. Stubmore became evidently nervous.

"Why, what now! You don't think I'm done? I did not let him have the mare till I went to the hotel, found he was cutting a great dash there, a groom, a pheaton, and a fine horse, and as extravagant as the devil!"

"Oh Lord! oh Lord! what a world this is! What does he call his-self?"

"Why, here's the check—George Frederic De—de Burgh Smith."

"Put it in your pipe, my man, put it in your pipe; not worth a d—!"

"And who the deuse are you, sir?" bawled out Mr. Stubmore, in an equal rage both with himself and his guest.

"I, sir," said the visiter, rising with great dignity, "I, sir, am of the great Bow-street Office, and my name is John Sharp!"

Mr. Stubmore nearly fell off his stool; his eyes rolled in his head, and his teeth chattered. Mr. Sharp perceived the advantage he had gained, and continued,

"Yes, sir; and I could have much to say against that chap, who is nothing more or less than Dashing Jerry, as has ruined more girls and more tradesman than any lord in the land. And so I called to give you a bit of a caution; for, says I to myself, 'Mr. Stubmore is a respectable man.'"

"I hope I am, sir," said the crestfallen horse-dealer; "that was always my character."

"And a father of a family?"

"Three boys and a babe at the buzzom," said Mr. Stubmore, pathetically.

"And he sha'n't be taken in if I can help it! That 'ere young man as I am arter, you see, knows Captain Smith—ha! ha! smell a rat now, eh?"

"Captain Smith said he knew him—the wiper! and that's what made me so green."

"Well, we must not be hard on the youngster: 'cause why, he has friends as is 'gemmen. But you tell him to go back to his poor dear relations, and all shall be forgiven; and say as how you won't keep him; and if he don't go back, he'll have to get his livelihood without a karakter; and use your influence with him like a man and a Christian, and, what's more, like a father of a family—Mr. Stubmore—with three boys and a babe at the buzzom. You won't keep him now?"

"Keep him! I have had a precious escape. I'd better go and see after the horse."

"I doubt if you'll find him: the captain caught a sight of me this morning. Why, he lodges at our hotel! He's off by this time!"

"And why the devil did you let him go?"

"'Cause I had no writ agin him!" said the Bow-street officer; and he walked straight out of the counting-office, satisfied that he had "done the job."

To snatch his hat—to run to the hotel—to find that Captain Smith had indeed gone off in his phaeton, bag and baggage, the same as he came, except that he had now two horses to the phaeton instead of one, having left with the landlord the amount of his bill in another check upon Coutts, was the work of five minutes* with Mr. Stubmore. He returned home, panting and purple with indignation and wounded feeling.

"To think that chap, whom I took into my yard like a son, should have connived at this! 'Taint the money—'tis the willany that 'flics me!" muttered Mr. Stubmore, as he re-entered the mews.

Here he came plump upon Philip, who said,

"Sir, I wished to see you, to say that you had better take care of Captain Smith."

"Oh, you did, did you, now he's gone! 'sconded off to America, I dare say, by this time. Now look ye, young man, your friends are after you; I won't say anything agin you; but you go back to them—I wash my hands of you. Quite too much for me. 'There's your week, and never let me catch you in my yard agin, that's all!"

Philip dropped the money which Stubmore had put into his hand, "My friends!—friends have been with you, have they? I thought so—I thank them. And so you part with me! Well, you have been kind, very kind; let us part kindly;" and he held out his hand.

Mr. Stubmore was softened; he touched the hand held out to him, and looked doubtful a moment; but Captain De Burgh Smith's check for eighty guineas suddenly rose before his eyes. He turned on his heel abruptly, and said, over his shoulder,

"Don't go after Captain Smith (he'll come to the gallows); mend your ways, and be ruled by your poor dear relatives, whose hearts you are breaking."

"Captain Smith! Did my relations tell you?"

"Yes—yes—they told me all—that is, they sent to tell me; so you see I'm d—d soft not to lay hold of you. But perhaps, if they be gentlemen, they'll act as sich, and cash me this here check!"

But the last words were said to air. Philip had rushed from the yard.

With a heaving breast, and every nerve in his body quivering with wrath, the proud, unhappy boy strode through the gay streets. They had betrayed him, then, these accursed Beauforts! They circled his steps with schemes to drive him like a deer into the snare of their loathsome charity! The roof was to be taken from his head, the bread from his lips, so that he might fawn at their knees for bounty. "But they shall not break my spirit, nor steal away my curse. No, my dead mother, never!"

As he thus muttered, he passed through a patch of waste land that led to the row of houses in which his lodging was placed. And here a voice called to him, and a hand was laid on his shoulder. He turned, and Arthur Beaufort, who had followed him from the street, stood behind him. Philip did not, at the first glance, recognise his cousin. Illness had so altered him, and his dress was so different from that in which he had first and last beheld him. The contrast between the two young men was remarkable. Philip was clad in the rough garb suited to his late calling; a jacket of black velveteen, ill-fitting and ill-fashioned; loose fustian trousers, coarse shoes, his hat set deep over his pent eye-brows, his raven hair long and neglected. He was just at that age when one with strong features and robust frame is at the worst in point of appearance: the sinewy proportions not yet sufficiently fleshed, and seeming inharmonious and undeveloped, precisely in proportion, perhaps, to the symmetry towards which they insensibly mature; the contour of the face sharpened from the roundness of boyhood, and losing its bloom without yet acquiring that relief and shadow which make the expression and dignity of the masculine countenance. Thus accoutred, thus gaunt and uncouth, stood Morton. Arthur Beaufort, always refined in his appearance, seemed yet more so from the almost feminine delicacy which ill health threw over his pale complexion and graceful figure; that sort of unconscious elegance which belongs to the dress of the rich when they are young—seen most in minute—not observable, perhaps, by themselves—marked forcibly and painfully the distinction of rank between the two. That distinction Beaufort did not feel; but, at a glance, it was visible to Philip.

The past rushed back on him. The sunny lawn—the gun, offered and rejected—the pride of old, much less haughty than the pride of to-day.

"Philip," said Beaufort, feebly, "they tell me you will not accept any kindness from me or mine. Ah! if you knew how we have sought you!"

"Knew!" cried Philip, savagely, for that unhappy sentence recalled to him his late interview with his employer, and his present destitution. "Knew! And why have you dared to hunt me out, and halloo me down? Why must this insolent tyranny, that assumes the right over these limbs and this free will, betray and expose me and my wretchedness wherever I turn!"

"Your poor mother—" began Beaufort.

"Name her not with your lips—name her not!" cried Philip, growing livid with his emotions. "Talk not of the mercy—the forethought—a Beaufort could show to her and her offspring! I accept it not—I believe it not. Oh, yes! You follow me now with your false kindness; and why? Because your father—your vain, hollow, heartless father—"

"Hold!" said Beaufort, in a tone of such reproach that it startled the wild heart on which it fell; "it is my father you speak of. Let the son respect the son."

"No—no—no! I will respect none of your race. I tell you, your father fears me. I tell you that my last words to him ring in his ears! My wrongs! Arthur Beaufort when you are absent I seek to forget them; in your abhorred presence they revive—they—"

He stopped almost choked with his passion; but continued instantly, with equal intensity of fervour:

"Were you tree the gibbet, and to touch your hand could alone save me from it, I would scorn your aid. Aid! the very thought fires my blood and nerves my hand. Aid! Will a Beaufort give me back my birth-right—restore my dead mother's fair name! Minion! sleek, dainty, luxurious minion! out of my path! You have my fortune, my station, my rights; I have but poverty, and hate, and disdain. I swear, again, and again, that you shall not purchase these from me."

"But Philip—Philip," cried Beaufort, catching his arm, "hear one—hear one who stood by your—"

The sentence that would have saved the outcast from the demons that were darkening and swooping round his soul died upon the young protector's lips. Blinded, maddened, excited, and exasperated almost out of humanity itself, Philip fiercely, brutally, swung aside the enfeebled form that sought to cling to him, and Beaufort fell at his feet. Morton stopped—glared at him with clenched hands and a smiling lip—sprung over his prostrate form, and bounded to his home.

He slackened his pace as he neared the house, and looked behind; but Beaufort had not followed him. He entered the house, and found Sidney in the room, with a countenance so much more gay than that he had lately worn, that absorbed as he was in thought and passion, it did not fail to strike him.

"What has pleased you, Sidney!"

The child smiled.

"Ah! it is a secret: I was not to tell you. But I'm sure you are not the naughty boy he says you are."

"He! Who?"

"Don't look so angry, Philip: you frighten me."

"And you torture me. Who could malign one brother to the other?"

"Oh! it was all meant very kindly; there's been such a nice, dear, good gentleman here, and he cried when he saw me, and said that he knew dear mamma. Well, and he has promised to take me home with him, and give me a pretty pony—as pretty—as pretty—oh, as pretty as it can be got! And he is to call again and tell me more: I think he is a fairy, Philip."

"Did he say that he was to take me too, Sidney!" said Morton, seating himself, and looking very pale. At that question Sidney hung his head.

"No, brother: he says you won't go, and that you are a bad boy, and that you associate with wicked people, and that you want to keep me shut up here, and not let any one be good to me. But I told him I did not believe that—yes, indeed, I told him so."

And Sidney endeavoured caressingly to withdraw the hands that his brother placed before his face.

Morton started up, and walked hastily to and fro the room. "This," thought he, "is another emissary of the Beauforts—perhaps the lawyer: they will take him from me—the last thing left to love and hope for. I will foil them. Sidney," he said aloud, "we must go hence to-day—this very hour—nay, instantly."

"What! away from this nice, good gentleman?"

"Curse him! yes, away from him. Do not cry—it is of no use; you must go."

This was said more harshly than Philip had ever yet spoken to Sidney; and when he had said it, he left the room to settle with the landlady and to pack up their scanty effects. In another hour the brothers had turned their backs on the town.

CHAPTER X.

"I'll carry thee
In sorrow's arms to welcome misery."

HEYWOOD'S Dutches of Suffolk.

"Who's here besides foul weather?"—SHAKESPEARE: Lear.

The sun was as bright and the sky as calm during this journey of the orphans as in the last. They avoided, as before, the main roads, and their way lay through landscapes that might have charmed a Gainsborough's eye: Autumn scattered his last hues of gold over the various foliage, and the poppy glowed from the hedges, and the wild convolvuluses, here and there, still gleamed on the wayside with a parting smile.

At times, over the sloping stubbles, broke the sound of the sportsman's gun; and ever and anon, by stream and sedge, they startled the shy wild-fowl, just come from the far lands, nor yet settled in the new haunts too soon to be invaded.

But there was no longer in the travellers the same hearts that had made light of hardship and fatigue. Sidney was no longer flying from a harsh master, and his step was not elastic with the energy of fear that looked behind, and of hope that smiled before. He was going a toilsome, weary journey, he knew not why nor whither; just, too, when he had made a friend, whose soothing words haunted his childish fancy. He was displeased with Philip, and, in sullen and silent thoughtfulness, slowly plodded behind him; and Morton himself was gloomy, and knew not where in the world to seek a future.

They arrived at dusk at a small inn, not so far distant from the town they had left as Morton could have wished; but then the days were shorter than they were in their first flight.

They were shown into a small sanded parlour, which Sidney eyed with great disgust; nor did he seem more pleased with the hacked and jagged leg of cold mutton which was all that the hostess set before them for supper. Philip in vain endeavoured to cheer him up, and ate to set him the example. He felt relieved when, under the auspices of a good-looking, good-natured chambermaid, Sidney retired to rest, and he was left in the parlour to his own meditations. Hitherto it had been a happy thing for Morton that he had had some one dependent on him; that feeling had given him perseverance, patience, fortitude and hope. But now, dispirited and sad, he felt rather the horror of being responsible for a human life, without seeing the means to discharge the trust. It was clear, even to his experience, that he was not likely to find another employer as facile as Mr. Stubmore; and, wherever he went, he felt as if his Destiny stalked at his back. He took out his little fortune and spread it on the table, counting it over and over; it had remained pretty stationary since his service with Mr. Stubmore, for Sidney had swallowed up the wages of his hire. While thus employed, the door opened, and the chambermaid, showing in a gentleman, said, "We have no other room, sir."

"Very well, then—I'm not particular; a tumbler of brandy and water, stiffish, cold—with-out—the newspaper—and a cigar. You'll excuse smoking, sir?"

Philip looked up from his hoard, and Captain De Burgh Smith stood before him.

"Ah!" said the latter, "well met!" And, closing the door, he took off his greatcoat, seated himself near Philip, and bent both his eyes with considerable wistfulness on the neat rows into which Philip's bank-notes, sovereigns, and shillings were arrayed.

"Pretty little sum for pocket-money: caush in hand goes a great way, properly invested. You must have been very lucky. Well, so I suppose you are surprised to see me here without my pheasant?"

"I wish I had never seen you at all," replied Philip, uncourteously, and restoring his money to his pocket; "your fraud upon Mr. Stubmore, and your assurance that you knew me, have sent me adrift upon the world."

"What's one man's meat is another man's poison," said the captain, philosophically; "no use fretting; care killed a cat. I am as badly off as you; for, hang me, if there was not a Bow-street runner in the town. I caught his eye fixed on me like a gimlet, so I bolted; went to N—, left my pheasant and groom there for the present, and have doubled back, to baffle pursuit, and cut across the country. You recollect that nice girl we saw in the coach; 'gad, I served her spouse that is to be a pretty trick! Borrowed his money under pretence of investing it in the New Grand Anti-Dry-Rot Company—cool hundred—it's only just gone, sir."

Here the chambermaid entered with the brandy and water, the newspaper, and cigars; the captain lighted the last, took a deep sup at the beverage, and said gaily,

"Well, now, let us join fortunes; we are both, as you say, 'adrift.' Best way to staund the breeze is to unite the caubles."

Philip shook his head, and, displeased with his companion, sought his pillow. He took care to put his money under his head and to lock his door.

The brothers started at daybreak; Sidney was even more discontented than on the previous day. The weather was hot and oppressive; they rested for some hours at noon, and in the cool of the evening renewed their way. Philip had made up his mind to steer for a town in the thick of a hunting district, where he hoped his equestrian capacities might again befriend him; and their path now lay through a chain of vast, dreary commons, which gave them, at least, the advantage to skirt the roadside unobserved. But, somehow or other, either Philip had been misinformed as to an inn where he had proposed to pass the night, or he had missed it; for the clouds darkened, and the sun went down, and no vestige of human habitation was discernible. Sidney, footsore and querulous, began to weep and declare that he could stir no farther; and while Philip, whose iron frame defied fatigue, compassionately paused to rest his brother, a low roll of thunder broke upon the gloomy air. "There will be a storm," said he, anxiously. "Come on—pray, Sidney, come on."

"It is so cruel in you, brother Philip," replied Sidney, sobbing. "I wish I had never, never gone with you."

A flash of lightning, that illuminated the whole heavens, lingered round Sidney's pale face as he spoke; and Philip threw himself instinctively on the child, as if to protect him even from the wrath of the unshelterable flame. Sidney, hushed and terrified, clung to his brother's breast; after a pause, he silently consented to resume their journey. But now the storm came near and nearer to the wanderers. The darkness grew rapidly more intense, save when the lightning lit up heaven and earth alike with intolerable lustre. And when at length the rain began to fall in merciless and drenching torrents, even Philip's brave heart failed him. How could he ask Sidney to proceed, when they could scarcely see an inch before them! All that could now be done was to gain the high road, and hope for some passing conveyance. With fits and starts, and by the glare of the lightning, they attained their object, and stood at last on the great broad thoroughfare, along which, since the day when the Roman carved it from the waste, Misery hath plodded and Luxury rolled their common way.

Philip had stripped handkerchief, coat, vest, all to shelter Sidney; and he felt a kind of strange measure through the dark even to hear Sidney's voice wail and moan. But that voice grew at last more languid and faint—it ceased—Sidney's weight hung heavy—heavier on the fostering arm.

"For Heaven's sake, speak! Speak, Sidney! only one word. I will carry you in my arms!"

"I think I am dying," replied Sidney, in a low murmur; "I am so tired and worn out, I can go no farther—I must lie here." And he sunk at once on the reeking grass beside the road. At this time the rain gradually relaxed, the clouds broke away, a gray light succeeded to the darkness, the lightning was more distant, and the thunder rolled onward in its awful path. Kneeling on the ground, Philip supported his brother in his arms, and cast his pleading eyes upward to the softening terrors of the sky. A star—a solitary star—broke out for one moment, as if to smile comfort upon him, and then vanished. But, lo! in the distance there suddenly gleamed a red, steady light, like that in some solitary window; it was no will o'-the-wisp, it was too stationary; human shelter was then nearer than he had thought for. He pointed to the light, and whispered, "Rouse yourself—one struggle more—cannot be far off."

"It is impossible—I cannot stir," answered Sidney; and a sudden flash of lightning showed his countenance, ghastly, as if with the damps of death. What could the brother do?—stay there, and see the boy perish before his eyes?—leave him on the road, and fly to the friendly light? The last plan was the sole one left, yet he shrunk from it in greater terror than the first. Was that a step that he heard across the road? He held his breath to listen; a form became dimly visible—it approached.

Philip shouted aloud.

"What now?" answered the voice; and it seemed familiar to Morton's ear. He sprang forward, and, putting his face close to the wayfarer, thought to recognise the features of Captain De Burgh Smith. The captain, whose eyes were yet more accustomed to the dark, made the first overture.

"Why, my lad, it is you then! Gad, you frightened me!"

Odious as this man had hitherto been to Philip, he was as welcome to him as daylight now; he grasped his hand: "My brother—a child—s here, dying, I fear, with cold and fatigue; he cannot stir. Will you stay with him—support him—but for a few moments, while I make to you light? See, I have money—plenty of money!"

"My good lad, it is very ugly work staying here at this hour; still—where's the child?"

"Here, here! make haste! raise him! that's right! God bless you! I shall be back ere you think me gone."

He sprang from the road, and plunged through the heath, the furze, the rank, glistening pools, straight towards the light, as the swimmer towards the shore.

The captain, though a rogue, was human; and when life—an innocent life—is at stake, even a rogue's heart rises up from its silent and weedy bed. He muttered a few oaths, it is true, but he held the child in his arms, and, taking out a little tin case, poured some brandy down Sidney's throat, and then, by way of company, down his own. The cordial revived the boy; he opened his eyes, and said, "I think I can go on now, Philip."

We must return to Arthur Beaufort. He was naturally, though gentle, a person of high spirit, and not without pride. He rose from the ground with bitter, resentful feelings and a blushing cheek, and went his way to the hotel. Here he found Mr. Spencer just returned from his visit to Sidney. Enchanted with the soft and endearing manners of his lost Catharine's son, and deeply affected with the resemblance the child bore to the mother as he had seen her last at the gay and rosy age of fair sixteen, his description of the younger brother drew Beaufort's indignant thoughts from the elder. He cordially concurred with Mr. Spencer in the wish to save one so gentle from the domination of one so fierce; and this, after all, was the child Catharine had most strongly commended to him. She had said little of the elder; perhaps she had been aware of his ungracious and untractable nature, and, as it seemed to Beaufort, his predilections for a coarse and low career.

"Yes," said he, "this boy, then, shall console me for the perverse brutality of the other. He shall indeed drink of my cup, and eat of my bread, and be to me as a brother."

"What!" said Mr. Spencer, changing countenance, "you do not intend to take Sidney to live with you? I meant him for my son—my adopted son."

"No; generous as you are," said Arthur, pressing his hand, "this charge devolves on me; it is my right. I am the orphan's relation; his mother consigned him to me. But he shall be taught to love you not the less."

Mr. Spencer was silent. He could not bear the thought of losing Sidney as an inmate of his cheerless home, a tender relic of his early love. From that moment he began to contemplate the possibility of securing Sidney to himself, unknown to Beaufort.

The plans both of Arthur and Spencer were interrupted by the sudden retreat of the brothers. They determined to depart different ways in search of them. Spencer, as the more helpless of the two, obtained the aid of Mr. Sharp; Beaufort departed with the lawyer.

Two travellers, in a hired barouche, were slowly dragged by a pair of jaded posterns along the commons I have just described.

"I think," said one, "that the storm is very much abated. Heigho! what an unpleasant night!"

"Unkimmon ugly, sir," answered the other; "and an awful long stage, eighteen miles. These here remote places are quite behind the age, sir—quite. However, I think we shall kitch them now."

"I am very much afraid of that eldest boy, Sharp. He seems a dreadful vagabond."

"You see, sir, quite hand in glove with Dashing Jerry—met in the same inn last night—preconcerted, you may be quite sure. It would be the best day's job I have done this many a day to save that ere little feller from being corrupted. You sees he is just of a size to be useful to these bad karakters. If they took to burglary, he would be a treasure to them: slip him through a pane of glass like a ferret, sir."

"Don't talk of it, Sharp," said Mr. Spencer, with a groan; "and, recollect, if we get hold of him, that you are not to say a word to Mr. Beaufort."

"I understand, sir; and I always goes with the gemman who behaves most like a gemman." Here a loud halloo was heard close by the horses' heads.

kind in the burning of the Alexandrian library. His mind was like one of the obelisks of his favourite land—wild, odd, antique, covered with characters which, doubtless, meant something, but which no man could interpret, and puzzling every body with the question, why so much trouble was taken in vain.

In the "Literary Remains" of this amiable man, published by his nephew, the very first passage in a treatise on his belief, saves us the task of giving a specimen of his conversation.

"The absolute subjectivity, whose only attribute is the Good—whose only definition is, that which is essentially causative of all possible true being; the adorable propton, which, whatever is assumed as the first, must be presumed its antecedent, Theos without an article, and yet not as an adjective," &c. This we conceive to be in the purest style of the hieroglyphics, and to establish Coleridge's oracularity beyond all question.

James Smith.—James Smith, like every man of sense in England, and every man of principle, was a conservative; but no man was less a talker on that most commonplace of all subjects, politics. His enjoyment was conversation; and he must have seen too many instances of the inroad which this trite verbiage makes on it, to suffer himself to be led into the temptation. "My political opinions," he gallantly said, "are those of the lady who sits next to me; and as the fair sex are generally

'Perplexed, like monarchs, with the fear of change,' I constantly find myself conservative."

Some of his bon mots, on this and other subjects were happy.

"Mr. Smith," said a gentleman across the table, "you look like a conservative."

"Certainly, sir," was the reply, "my crutches remind me that I am no member of the movement party."

As solicitor, he had an office in a large house in Austin Friars. However, another James Smith taking chambers in the same building, considerable confusion arose from the letters of each falling into the hands of the other.—They met accordingly to remedy this inconvenience, and it was agreed that the only resource was, that either should take chambers somewhere else. The question then was, "which?"

"Nothing can be more easily decided," said he.—"You came last, and, as James the Second, you ought to abdicate."

A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF ALFIERI.

BY J. C. C.

Two men who had sought for protection from the rays of the sun in an arbour which was overshadowed by the thick leaves of a wide spreading vine, were seated opposite to each other, leaning on a table, and smoking perfumed cigarettes.

The elder, who appeared to be about forty years of age, was tall and pale; his costume was rich although simple, had somewhat of a military appearance about it. As for the younger, he was characterised by that slovenly elegance which had begun to be fashionable in Italy as well as in France, towards the end of the eighteenth century.

"Faith, Alfieri," said the elder of the two, "you were the last person in the world I expected to have met at Abano."

"Yet methinks the sick man's place should be where he may hope to mend his health."

The young man looked at the count:

"The fact is, you do look paler than usual; have you consulted the best physicians?"

"Yes."

"And what do they say?"

"The same thing over and over again. They promise me in the winter that I shall be well in the summer; and when the summer comes and I feel no relief, they assure me that I shall be better in the winter. The Milanese doctors recommend the air of Naples, and the Neapolitan doctors that of Milan; and so they go on, turning me over from one to the other, until I expect some day to die on the road between these two places, if I continue to follow all their ordinances."

"Come, come, nonsense, did you ever hear of any body dying at your age?"

"Sometimes," murmured Alfieri pensively, and shaking his head.

"I bet I know what ails you: you have eternally in your mind the predictions of your old sorceress."

"Am I wrong, Cellini? I was only twelve years of age when that old woman told me all that has happened to me since. She said that I should leave Piedmont, that I should become a poet, and that I would be celebrated."

"And that you would die at thirty-five. Who doesn't know that part of your history? You have written on it an admirable sonnet which all Italy knows by heart. But that a man like you should put faith in the mummery of an old woman, is what I cannot understand."

The count sighed, but made no answer: a short silence ensued.

"Shall I tell you what it is that kills you?" rejoined Cellini. "At the bottom you are not ill, you are only low-spirited."

"That's what the doctors say," replied the count sadly, "but I feel it will carry me off at last."

"Why not seek for some distractions? Why don't you travel? When you quitted Milan, your intention, if I mistake not, was to go to Spain."

"I have been there."

"Ah! indeed—and from thence to France."

"I have been there."

"And thence to Germany."

"I have been there."

"But you must have been everywhere, if that is the case. The fact is, I know you are a most expeditious traveller; you traverse each country as fast as your horse can gallop; but you can't have had time to see anything."

"Pardon me; I have seen mountains, cities, roads, and plains; and, in the midst of all this, numberless myriads of human beings very busy doing nothing."

"And what did you particularly notice?"

"Three splendid institutions—the schalque in Germany, the police in France, and the inquisition in Spain."

"You're as full of satire as ever, I see," said Cellini laughing; "a misanthropist and a republican, a real descendant of Brutus in the papal states. But really, Alfieri, you do not deserve the favours which fortune has bestowed upon you; all our theatres ring with your triumphs. Italy has its eye upon you; you are noble, rich, young, and yet you seem tired of life. What is it you would have to be happy?"

"That's more than I can say; something perhaps which is possessed by the lowliest of the crowd which covers me with acclamations; a retired habitation, an obscure destiny, and a woman who would love me seated by my side."

"But what hinders you from having all this, Alfieri?"

Alfieri shrugged up his shoulders, and heaved a deep sigh.

"You forget," said he, "that chance has made a celebrated man of me, and a celebrated man is like a wild beast, everybody rushes to get a sight of him. Every man thinks that he has a right to spy into my actions; I am never alone; my books are like couriers, they announce my arrival wherever I go. As soon as I appear in an assembly, farewell to free and friendly conversation; universal silence prevails, the guests are all on the tip-toe of expectation; they expect to hear me speak as if I were a book. The women are all silent through fear, or else they give themselves airs to attract my notice. Brought up, as I was, almost in the midst of woods, secluded from society in my youth, I feel confused at being singled out as the object of universal attention: unable to distinguish between real sympathy and importunate curiosity, I wrap myself up in my reserve, and remain silent. I am therefore, considered proud, when I am only unhappy. Ah! were I poor, destitute, miserable, I might believe in the affection of those who surround me; but I am now ever in doubt whether it is myself or my reputation which is sought after."

"I understand—you are as unfortunate as a king."

"You seem to jest, but it is strictly true nevertheless. When I arrived here, I thought I had escaped all my troubles; for a few days I was free to live like everybody else, I was comparatively happy—but the arrival of a man, who had seen me I don't know where, destroyed everything."

"That's the way of the world," said Cellini—"your celebrity is a burden to you, and I who work my fingers off, remain buried in the most enviable obscurity."

"It's your own fault; you don't stick to anything seriously."

"My dear count, you seem to forget that I am in the pay of an impresario, obliged to have three acts ready every month. You don't know what it is to be a composer to a theatre; it's like the landlord of a public house, where there is a continued call on his genius."

"Until he at last gets to the bottom of it."

"That's just what has happened to me; I managed to live some time on about a dozen decent ideas—you know what an idea is, a thing you can dish up with fifty different sauces; you can put the beginning at the end, the middle at the beginning, and people wonder at the author's fecundity. I went on in this manner for about three years; but at last the public discovered that I gave turned cloth for new—I was hissed."

"Well, and how did you manage then?"

"Why, I determined to travel and regenerate my ideas."

"And do you succeed?"

"Quite certain of it. There are a great many persons at Abano, and plots are as thick here as the grasshoppers were in Egypt in the time of Pharaoh. In less than a month, I warrant you that I shall have gathered materials enough for as many comedies and dramas as will last me ten years at a moderate calculation. I only arrived yesterday, and am already on the scent of an intrigue."

Alfieri smiled incredulously.

"'Tis a fact," continued Cellini, lowering his voice; "yesterday, heated by traveling and unable to sleep, I ventured into the garden; you know the small pavilion at the extremity of the gravel walk."

"Yes."

"Well, I was strolling about near it, when I heard a door or a window suddenly close. I turned about, and found myself cheek by jowl with a man."

"Can it be possible?"

"Seeing me, he stopped short and seemed inclined to speak, but he altered his mind, turned away, and disappeared."

"Did you distinguish his features?"

"As I do yours now—it was splendid moonlight."

"And you would recognise him again?"

"I have done so already."

"How?"

"This morning I saw him in the pump-room."

"Do you know his name?"

"They call him Marliano."

The count started up with vivacity.

"Are you sure he came out of the pavilion?"

"I couldn't swear to it, but I think he did."

"And you are sure that it was close to the pavilion at the bottom of the garden, near the poplar trees, that you met him?"

"Yes, under the windows of the Marchioness Alcanza."

Alfieri turned pale, his lips trembled convulsively, but he mastered his emotion and sat down again.

"You see that I haven't lost my time," continued Cellini, who had not remarked the count's uneasiness. "I am on the scent of a love affair, which will no doubt furnish me with some excellent scenes. I had already remarked this Marliano, on account of his being so very ugly; he looks like the impenitent thief, in my idea.—Seeing him continually in the company of the marchioness, who, by the by, appears to hate him, I at first took him for her husband, but I was mistaken; there is a secret about it, which you must help me to penetrate."

It was indeed a secret; but it was not only the count that now desired to discover it. Cellini was far from being aware how interested his friend was in this mystery, and what anguish his recital had inflicted upon him.

The marchioness had been about three months at Abano. She had come alone, and was ill.—Alfieri had done his best to avoid her; indeed he let slip no opportunity of showing his aversion when chance threw them together; but the young widow did her utmost to overcome a hatred, the cause of which she really was, or affected to be, ignorant of. Subsequently the count's coldness had yielded to the marks of interest which he received from the marchioness, and a sort of intimacy, which became more familiar every day, sprang up between them.—He felt that this woman exercised more influence over him every time he saw her; that his existence was, as it were, incomplete without her society; and that, in short, his happiness depended on the continuance of that friendship which had so unexpectedly arisen out of his former dislike.

He was on the point of telling her so one day, when Marliano arrived. At the sight of this man Bianca appeared confused; she welcomed him with concealed affright; there arose a sort of mute combat between them, in which the young widow was vanquished.

Alfieri then remarked that she avoided him. It seemed to him as if this Marliano exercised over her a sort of jealous guardianship, to which she submitted, but against her will. What connection could there exist between these two beings? Cellini's story cleared up all his doubts, but he could not bring himself to put faith in the conclusions which it seemed to warrant. Then who was this Marliano? A first glance seemed to indicate one of those men who pass their lives in the frivolities and dissipations of the world; but after a more minute examination he desisted under this assumed mask a violent tenacity, a stubborn and headstrong will, one of those ignoble and coarse minds in a case of adamant. Alfieri had in vain endeavoured to study more deeply this man's character; all his advances were met with distant civility; indeed the marchioness always interfered to put an end to any discussion which might arise between them; she seemed to fear their coming in contact with each other.

Such was the state of things, when one day the count, on descending into the garden rather earlier than usual, met the young widow alone. It was the first time since the arrival of Marliano, and he resolved to profit by it. After several useless attempts to discourse on indifferent topics, finding that he became more and more embarrassed, he at last suddenly stopped, and taking the hand of the marchioness—

"What have you against me?" said he; "and why do you avoid me?"

"I avoid you!" repeated she; "what can induce you to think so?"

"Do you think I am blind, madam? For more than a fortnight this is the first time I have been able to speak to you."

The marchioness, who had been troubled for a moment, had now recovered herself.

"Are you sure that it is my fault?" asked she, smiling; "we seldom find those whom we do not care to seek."

"Ah, madam! you do not doubt my desire to partake of your society?"

"Why not? I know that my arrival at Abano displeased you at first. Did the intimacy of a few days suffice to destroy all your former prejudices?"

The count blushed, and endeavoured to exculpate himself.

"Do not attempt to deny it," continued the marchioness; "some one had poisoned your mind against me. I know that the only reason of your stay was your being obliged to wait for some letters which you expected; you were consequently compelled to put up with my society."

"I do not know who can have given you all these details," said Alfieri, with unaffected simplicity; "but I cannot deny my faults, or conceal my thoughts. It is true that your name awakened in me a painful emotion, and that I did not attempt to hide it. But if such be the cause of your coldness towards me, which has succeeded so suddenly to your prior affability, you punish too cruelly a prejudice which your presence has sufficed to dissipate."

"And may I ask you what this prejudice might be?"

"Were I to refuse to give you the explanation you demand, you might be inclined to suppose that it arose from some injurious repugnance on my part; but your presence renewed a sensation of sorrow within my breast, of which I was not the master."

"And for what reason?"

"I once had a friend, madam, who had likewise been the companion of my studies. We had grown together, and I loved him as children love one another, because they are of the same age and enjoy the same pleasures. We had separated, but kept up a regular correspondence, for we could not forget the happy days of our boyhood. I heard that he lived respected by all who knew him at Genoa. About a year back I learned that he had fallen in love with a woman, beautiful, admired, and courted by all. Two of my letters remained unanswered; at last I received one from his mother—his love had been fatal to him."

"And your friend was called?"

"Julie Aldi."

On hearing this name, a cry escaped the marchioness.

"It was then that I heard your name pronounced for the first time," continued Alfieri; but seeing that the young woman had buried her face in her hands—"Pardon me, madam, said he, with a supplicating and agitated voice, "I have afflicted you, but it was unavoidable. Now you are aware why I wished to avoid a person whose presence recalled to me the death of my friend."

"How you must have hated me!" exclaimed the marchioness, bathed in tears.

"No, madam; for I knew that you did everything in your power to prevent their duel, that you even went to the place of rendezvous."

"Too late, sir—too late!"

"The fault was not yours, and Aldi's mother rendered you full justice; she did not accuse you in the agony of her grief, but the young man's imprudence, which had exposed him to the Baron Rocca's sword. Ah, how often have I condemned him for having ventured, in the chances of a duel, a life full of hope in the future! I then did not know the anguish of always finding near the person beloved a face whose impassibility insults our sufferings—of hearing, whenever her voice is heard, the voice of another who answers her with familiarity! Now I comprehend why Aldi preferred certain death to tortures such as these; for I, a man of thought and reveries as I am, who never touched a sword in my life, I feel a thirst for shedding blood; a challenge is ever on my lips, and I wish to be placed opposite to my adversary, sword in hand, to acquire the right of loving exclusively to myself."

Alfieri's voice had risen as he spoke, his pale face was flushed, and, on pronouncing these last words, his hand was outstretched as if he had grasped a sword; the marchioness made an involuntary motion to stop him.

"Ah! you need not fear," rejoined he with a bitter smile; "I have devoured my anger. What right had I to provoke a rival? Jealousy is only permitted to him who can hope for a return to his affection. And yet," continued he, after a short pause, "what risk should I run in a duel? Is there not a terrible one engaged between me and my mad lady? and I well know what will be the issue of that."

The marchioness had insensibly drawn closer to him. Her looks were fixed upon the poet's dejected countenance with an indescribable expression of compassion, and she said, in a voice trembling with emotion, "Good heavens! what is the matter with you?"

"Do you ask me? Do you not know both the cause and the cure? Nothing but a little affection which might inspire me with the desire to live; for an instant I had imagined I had found it; I then breathed more freely; I felt all the vigour of my youth return, because I was happy; but it only lasted a few days, for I soon perceived that my hopes were groundless."

"Who told you so?"

"Bianca!" exclaimed he; "have I understood you? Speak, I beseech you—for pity's sake, speak."

(Conclusion in our next.)

NEW BOOKS.

The Ecclesiastical and Political History of the Popes of Rome, during the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. By Leopold Rauke, Professor in the University of Berlin. Translated from the German, by Sarah Austin, 2 vols. 8vo., Philadelphia, Lea and Blanchard, 1841.

This work will form an invaluable addition to the historical portion of standard literature. When we consider that the period to which it relates includes that of the Reformation and of the Huguenot wars, the Thirty Years' war, &c.; that it includes the history of the most active and influential power of the period; and finally that it solves the grand problem of modern history, viz: the cause of the progress of protestantism being so suddenly arrested; we shall find abundant reason for giving this history a place among the most interesting and useful extant. It will be regarded as essential to the completeness of every library which professes to supply itself with every first rate standard work which appears. Those who deem it necessary to purchase the works of Bancroft, Prescott, and Sparks, as they appear, will not fail to supply their shelves with Rauke's History of the Popes.

Life of De Witt Clinton. By James Renwick, L.L.D., Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy and Chemistry, in Columbia College, New York. Harper and Brother, 1841.

A life of so distinguished a citizen, patriot, and public benefactor, from so able a writer as Professor Renwick, cannot fail to command universal attention and respect. We are glad to see that the New Yorkers are true to the interests of their state, by cherishing the historical reputation of their illustrious men. Would to Heaven that Pennsylvania could be induced to consult her true interest by remembering her claims and merits as a state.

NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

In tracing the progress by which the art of fictitious narrative has advanced from its rude origin to its perfection, we are struck, amidst all the diversities occasioned by government, climate, and education, with the singular coincidence of certain phenomena attending its different stages, which have given a kind of uniformity to its history in all ages and countries in the world.

The infancy of fiction, for example, is everywhere characterised by a superabundance of incident. Attention is kept awake by rapidity of succession; and the beauty or propriety of individual occurrences, or their relation to each other, is forgotten in the bustle and excitement produced by the train. If there exist a principle of selection at all, it seems to be in favour of what is most wild and improbable. Everything is viewed by the novelist through a veil of mystery, for so the face of nature was actually regarded by those to whom he addresses himself. Ignorant of the laws that regulate the course of the material world, and by which he is afterwards enabled almost to control its movements, man at first regards himself as an inferior being in the chain of existences by which he believes himself surrounded. He humbles himself before the objects of his terror; he endows the elements with will and intelligence; peoples the rocks, mountains, and streams with imaginary beings, to whom he ascribes powers surpassing his own, and, like Tancred in the Enchanted Forest, sees a nymph or a spirit issuing from every tree. The narrator, with an "untaught innate philosophy," avails himself of these feelings; and trusting little to the delineation of familiar occurrences, endeavours to excite and sustain attention by touching the master-key of mysterious terror;—by the tales of mythology, the legends of superstition, the detail of those strange phenomena which at times disturb the course of nature, or of those dark and fearful moral calamities which, surpassing the common powers of thought and action, seem to render man a helpless instrument in the hands of an overpowering and irresistible destiny.

As society advances, however, this mode of interesting passes away. Feeling emerges with the increase of intelligence, as warmth follows the dawn. The mind, "touched to finer issues," is acted on by gentler stimuli. The tales which formerly fettered the reason, are now addressed only to the imagination, and gradually sink into nursery legends. The influence of female society appears more visible, in the less revolting character of the materiel of fiction, and in the increasing tendency to the representation of the affairs of actual and domestic life, to which it has communicated so many varied aspects and new attractions. The aim of merely exciting attention by a multitude of incidents, is exchanged for that of touching the feelings, which is found to be more effectually accomplished by a few. The novelist abandons the character of a chronicler or annalist;—he exercises a principle of selection, passes over or details events according to their importance, and their relation to the end he has in view; and in supplying his imaginary actors with motives, language, and sentiments suited to the scenes in which they are placed; he invents and delineates character.

There is still another stage in the progress of fiction. When knowledge and intelligence have been diffused over the whole surface of society; when life becomes daily more uniform, decorous, and conventional,—less subject to strange interruptions—less animated by enthusiasm; when men, amply furnished with materials for contemplation, and little solicited by external objects that lead to emotion, desire rather the repose of thought than the stir of action or of feeling; and, in the representation of the things of life, are occupied more with the springs and motives, the hopes or fears which lead to action, than with action itself; then a corresponding character is impressed on fictitious writing. Plots become simple and domestic to excess; the place of incident is supplied by wit, by sentiment, by eloquence, by argument, by metaphysical analysis; and novels, no longer intended merely to amuse, are made the vehicle of communicating dogmata, moral, political, religious, or philosophical, as the author's peculiar vein may incline.

STERNE.

It remains to speak of Sterne;—and we shall do it in a few words. There is more of manerism and affectation in him, and a more immediate reference to preceding authors;—but his excellences, where he is excellent, are of the first order. His characters are intellectual and inventive, like Richardson's—but totally opposite in the execution. The one are made out by continuity, and patient repetition of touches; the others, by rapid and masterly strokes, and graceful opposition. His style is equally different from Richardson's:—it is, at times, the most rapid,—the most happy,—the most idiomatic of any of our novel writers. It is the pure essence of English conversational style. His works consist only of morceaux,—of brilliant passages. His wit is poignant, though artificial;—and his chaacters (though the groundwork has been laid before) have yet invaluable original differences;—and the spirit of the execution, the master-strokes constantly thrown into them, are not to be surpassed. It is sufficient to name them—Yorick, Dr. Slop, Mr. Shandy, my Uncle Toby, Trim, Susanna, and the Widow Wadman; and in these he has contrived to oppose, with equal felicity and originality, two characters,—one of pure intellect, and the other of pure good-nature, in my Father and my Uncle Toby. There appears to have been in Sterne a vein of dry, sarcastic humour, and of extreme tenderness of feeling;—the latter sometimes carried to affectation, as in the tale of Maria, and the apostrophe to the recording angel;—but at other times pure, and without blemish. The story of Le Fevre is perhaps the finest in the English language. My Father's restlessness, both of body and mind, is inimitable. It is the model from which all those despicable performances against modern philosophy ought to have been copied, if their authors had known anything of the subject they were writing about. My Uncle Toby is one of the finest compliments ever paid to human nature. He is the most unoffending of God's creatures; or, as the French express it—un petit bon homme! Of his bowling-green,—his sieges,—and his amours, who would say or think anything amiss?

A PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF ALFIERI.

BY J. C. C.

(Concluded from our last.)

The marchioness was about to answer; but she suddenly uttered a cry of terror; and tore herself from his embrace. The count raised his eyes; Marliano was standing at the corner of the parterre.

The Geneoise bowed coldly. On seeing him the marchioness had fallen back motionless on the bench; he advanced, and without appearing to notice her emotion, enquired after her health with impassable politeness.

As for Alfieri, the arrival of this man at the moment that he was about to receive an avowal which he had so long and so ardently sought after, had at first drawn from him a gesture of anger; but his attention was soon attracted towards Bianca, who by looks appeared to be supplicating Marliano. Alfieri felt all his doubts return; an invisible instinct pointed out this man to him as his rival, and he resolved to do his utmost to verify his suspicions. He observed to the marchioness that it was time to go to the spring, and he offered to escort her there.

"I thank you, sir," said the marchioness with embarrassment; "I remain here, but do not let me interfere with your arrangements."

"My arrangements are yours, madam," said the count; "you know it—the only hours that I enjoy, are those which I pass with you."

"I see, count, that you would succeed quite as well in madrigals as in tragedy," replied the marchioness with effort.

Alfieri shook his head. "Do not rail, I beseech you, at the expression of a sentiment which you know to be sincere," said he, "you cannot mistake the cause of the change which your presence has worked in me. Before I knew you I was unhappy, wearied with all that vain applause which is called glory. I saw you—melancholy, fatigue, all disappeared. You have acted on me as the rays of the sun on a drooping plant—I owe you my very existence."

"Sir!" exclaimed the marchioness, terrified; and then she turned her eyes upon Marliano, but he remained calm and motionless.

Alfieri had watched her looks and her movements.

"You will excuse me," rejoined he, turning towards the Genoese; "such confessions are not usually made in the presence of a third person. I have doubtless been indiscreet."

Marliano bowed. "I feel happy," said he, "count, to have inspired you with so much confidence as to induce you to make such an avowal of your sentiments."

"I assure you, signor, that I rejoice that you hear me."

"It is rather for me to rejoice to find that a great poet employs, to express his passion, an eloquence which others in vain seek for in their love."

The irony with which these last words had been pronounced had something so cold, so piercing about it, that it produced on Alfieri the effect of those wounds which we do not feel at first; but when he understood the full force of it, a flush of indignation caused his very blood to boil; his eyes met those of Marliano. Bianca threw herself between these two glances, in which they exchanged their hatred.

"We well know your gallantry, count," said she; "but we have had quite enough on that chapter for to-day. I do not intend to go to the spring, but I do not wish to hinder you from taking your accustomed walk; you will bring me a nosegay on your return."

The count made an effort on himself, and took his leave. Marliano was about to follow him.

"Signior Marliano?" exclaimed the marchioness, "you promised to read me a chapter."

The Genoese turned towards her, a sardonic smile played upon his lips, "Are you so much afraid for him?" said he.

Bianca laid her hand on her heart, and sat down without being able to answer.

"Yet you have reason to be satisfied with me, madam," rejoined Marliano, bitterly. "Did I not allow him to speak of his love? Did I not suffer his insults, for his intention was to insult me? Did I not carry my patience to such a pitch that he must have thought me a vile coward? Does not this suffice you?"

"I must leave this place," said the marchioness with anguish. "I cannot stay here any longer. I shall return to Genoa."

"I am ready."

Bianca cast on Marliano a long look of terror and indignation.

"Yes," continued she, "I shall return to Genoa, but to bid an eternal adieu to the world. I have often thought of it—my determination is taken—I shall retire into a convent."

Marliano started. "What say you, madam? A convent?"

"I am resolved."

"Impossible! So young, so beautiful—to bury yourself in an eternal prison."

"Am I free now?"

The Genoese looked at her. "It is to avoid me that you shun the world," said he, sorrowfully; "you then hate me more than you love its pleasures."

"And even were it so, have you not forced me to it?"

"What have I done?"

The marchioness briskly raised her head. "Do you dare ask me?" said she with indignant surprise.

"Baron Rocca, have you forgotten the past? Have you not traced around me a fatal circle which none can pass without certain death? You ask me what you have done. Have you not profited by your odious address as a brave to assume to yourself the authority of a guardian over me against my will, and call to account all those who approach me? I could not demand the assistance of those who would have had the courage to protect me against this tyranny, for it would have exposed them to certain destruction. Sheltered under the point of honour, you would have awaited their provocation—then, master of the arms and conditions, you would have murdered them as you did the unfortunate Aldi. Thus have you enslaved me to your will during three years, trembling beneath your regard, obliged to suffer your society, and estranging all others from me through fear. In vain have I tried to escape you; you have followed me everywhere. Even here, where I had fled for concealment, you appear under the false name of Marliano as if you had feared that yours would have been the signal of my flight—and you now ask me what you have done?"

Whilst the marchioness had been speaking, the Genoese had turned paler and paler; his features had assumed an expression impossible to describe, it was an anguish which had something cruel about it—a sort of despair which tormented him, but inspired no pity; it was the grief of Satan crowned king of evil and of pain.

"Why did you not love me?" said he, fixing on the marchioness a withering look of anger, "it is you who have caused all that has happened. Happiness would have softened my soul. You have exasperated it. That skill which you reproach me with—the world itself forced me to acquire it. I was ugly, abandoned; I required a defence against contempt—I acquired the art of killing. What had at first been necessity, became at last a habit—I placed my honour in a science which I had studied merely as a safeguard. Besides, why should I spare those who hate me? The hatred of others render us cruel, madam. Ah! as soon as I knew you, I take heaven to witness that I repented ever having shed blood—but I could not efface the past. My love was disdained. I saw that you despised and hated me. I was then seized with a secret rage. Why should I leave to another the happiness which had been refused to myself? Would you even have thanked me for it at the bottom of your soul? No! If I am cruel, Bianca, it is because I cannot bear the idea that you should love another."

"Thus I am the slave of your passion."

"I love you and am jealous."

"But I—I do not love you."

"I know it—I know it. And yet your love would change my whole life, and redeem the past."

He seized the hands of Bianca, and pressed them convulsively against his heart. "Oh! I love you, Bianca; I love you as man never loved," exclaimed he; "why are you without pity?"

"Leave me—leave me," said the young woman, struggling to escape.

"What can I do to induce you to listen to me?"

"Leave me, I say."

"Bianca, you cannot eternally resist my prayers—you will relent—I love you too much—you must be mine at last."

"A convent rather!" exclaimed the young woman distractedly.

"I will tear you from it."

"Then the tomb!"

Marliano let drop her hands, which he held in his. "You love the count," said he gnashing his teeth with rage.

The marchioness shuddered, attempted to speak, but burst into tears.

"To-morrow we start for Genoa," said he after a long silence.

At this moment some person appeared at the extremity of the walk; Marliano offered the countess his arm, and they both walked away.

Hardly had they disappeared among the trees, when Cellini crept cautiously from behind a clump of acacias where he had concealed himself. He had arrived there a little after Alfieri's departure, and having distinguished the voices of the marchioness and Marliano, he had allowed his curiosity to get the better of his discretion. Wishing to clear up the suspicions which he entertained, he had listened attentively, and had heard all that passed between them. The beginning of their conversation had only excited his astonishment, and he merely saw in it a capital subject for a scenario, but the end had taught him the part which Alfieri played in the affair. He therefore ran to him immediately, and told him all that he had discovered thus opportunely. His revelation was for the count as welcome as it was unexpected; his doubts were removed, and he saw that he was beloved. Everything was now explained; the trouble of the marchioness at the sight of Marliano; her timid submission to his will; the sudden alternation in her behaviour towards himself. His joy knew no bounds.

"But," observed Cellini, "she has promised this Marliano, or rather this Baron Rocca, to start to-morrow."

"No, no," exclaimed Alfieri; "she shall stay. Ah! heaven be thanked that I have learned the truth; for this once this Baron Rocca will find some one betwixt him and the woman whom he oppresses."

"You forget that you never handled an arm in your life, and that this man will infallibly kill you."

"I do not care."

"Of course you are too happy just now to care about life; only, if you succumb, the marchioness will remain without a protector, and exposed to the mercy of her persecutor."

"You are right. But need I fight this man? Would it not be sufficient to publish the truth?"

"It is injurious to the baron; he will challenge you, and you cannot refuse to give him satisfaction, or it will be said you are afraid."

"Well, I will give him satisfaction."

"Then he will kill you, and you will not have benefitted her in the least. You walk in a circle out of which you can find no issue."

Alfieri stamped with rage on the ground. "Is it possible that this point of honour can cover every enormity? What! because a villain is clever in the art of killing, he has the right to force you to silence, or to murder you! Strange justice of the world! If I refuse to allow myself to be assassinated by this cut-throat, a thousand voices will be raised to brand me as a coward, and my celebrity will only serve to publish my shame to every corner of the world, and render my name more despicable. Since life is nothing but an arena of gladiators, why was not I taught to shed blood? What use is what I am and what I know, to me? O God! I would barter my genius, my glory, every thing, for the science of a fencing-master. What's to be done—what's to be done?"

"Formerly a brave might have served your turn; unfortunately they are out of fashion now."

Alfieri shook his head and remained pensive. But he suddenly awoke from his reverie: "Yes," murmured he, "it must be so; it's the only means I have."

"What are you going to do?" asked his friend.

"You shall know very soon," answered the count, and he left the room.

The following hours were employed by him in arranging his affairs and writing his last instructions. However firm the soul may be, such preparations cannot but weigh heavily upon it. There is always some smiling corner in life, some happy spot, which we then recal to mind, and to which the humid eye looks back with regret. How many doubts arise, how many anxieties do we rake up from the bottom of our hearts! Will our name be long remembered? Who will weep for our loss?—Melancholy reflections, to solve which we dare not consult the experience of the past.

And Alfieri thought of all this: of the mountains where he had passed his boyhood; of his first verses; of the old woman's prediction, which was now, doubtless, to be accomplished. He then examined his papers, separating his finished compositions from those which he had as yet as it were only sketched out, the children of his imagination, which he intended to have impressed with the whole power of "Good Heavens, if that is a footpad!" said Mr. Spencer, shaking violently.

"Lord, sir, I have my barkers with me. Who's there?"

The barouche stopped: a man came to the window.

"Excuse me, sir," said the stranger, "but there is a poor boy here so tired and ill that I fear he will never reach the next town unless you will kindly give him a lift."

"A poor boy!" said Mr. Spencer, poking his head over the head of Mr. Sharp. "Where?"

"If you would just drop him at the King's Arms it would be a chaurity," said the man.

Sharp pinched Mr. Spencer on the shoulder.

"That's Dashing Jerry: I'll get out." So saying, he opened the door, jumped into the road, and presently reappeared with the lost and welcome Sidney in his arms. "Ben't this the boy?"

he whispered to Mr. Spencer; and, taking the lamp from the carriage, he raised it to the child's face. "It is! it is! God be thanked!" exclaimed the worthy man.

"Will you leave him at the King's Arms? We shall be there in an hour or two," cried the captain.

"We! Who's we?" said Sharp, gruffly.

"Why, myself and the child's brother."

"Oh!" said Sharp, raising the lantern to his own face, "you knows me, I think, Master Jerry? Let me kitch you again, that's all. And give my compliments to your 'sociate, and say, if he prosecutes this 'ere hurchin any more, we'll settle his business for him; and so take a hint and make yourself scarce, old boy!"

With that Mr. Sharp jumped into the barouche, and bade the postboy drive on as fast as he could.

Ten minutes after this abduction, Philip, followed by two labourers, with a barrow, a lantern, and two blankets, returned from the hospitable farm to which the light had conducted him. The spot where he had left Sidney, and which he knew by a neighbouring milestone, was vacant; he shouted in alarm, and the captain answered from the distance of some threescore yards. Philip came to him. "Where is my brother?"

"Gone away in a barouche and pair. Devil take me if I understand it." And the captain proceeded to give a confused account of what had passed.

"My brother! my brother! they have torn thee from me, then!" cried Philip; and he fell to the earth insensible.

CHAPTER XI.

"Vous me rendrez mon frere!"
CASIMIR DELAVIGNE: Les Enfants d'Edouard.

One evening, a week after this event, a wild, tattered, haggard youth knocked at the door of Mr. Robert Beaufort.

The porter slowly presented himself.

"Is your master at home? I must see him instantly."

"That's more than you can, my man; my master does not see the like of you this time of night," replied the porter eyeing the ragged apparition before him with great disdain.

"See me he must and shall," replied the young man; and, as the porter blocked up the entrance, he grasped his collar with a hand of iron, swung him, huge as he was, aside, and strode into the spacious hall.

"Stop! stop!" cried the porter, recovering himself. "James! John! here's a go!"

I—41. 13

Mr. Robert Beaufort had been back in town several days. Mrs. Beaufort, who was waiting his return from his club, was in the dining-room. Hearing a noise in the hall, she opened the door, and saw the strange, grim figure advancing towards her. "Who are you?" she said; "what do you want?"

"I am Philip Morton. Who are you?"

"My husband," said Mrs. Beaufort, shrinking into the parlour, while Morton followed her and closed the door, "my husband, Mr. Beaufort, is not at home."

"You are Mrs. Beaufort, then! Well, you can understand me. I want my brother. He has been basely reft from me. Tell me where he is, and I will forgive all. Restore him to me, and I will bless you and yours." And Philip fell on his knees, and grasped the train of her gown.

"I know nothing of your brother, Mr. Morton," cried Mrs. Beaufort, surprised and alarmed. "Arthur, whom we expect every day, writes us word that all search for him has been in vain."

"Ha! you admit the search?" cried Morton, rising and clenching his hands. "And who else but you or yours would have parted brother and brother? Answer me where he is. No subterfuge, madam: I am desperate!"

Mrs. Beaufort, though a woman of that worldly coldness and indifference which, on ordinary occasions, supply the place of courage, was extremely terrified by the tone and mien of her rude guest. She laid her hand on the bell, but Morton seized her arm, and, holding it sternly, said, while his dark eyes shot fire through the glimmering room, "I will not stir hence till you have told me. Will you reject my gratitude—my blessing? Beware! Again, where have you hid my brother?"

At that instant the door opened, and Mr. Robert Beaufort entered. The lady, with a shriek of joy, wrenched herself from Philip's grasp, and flew to her husband.

"Save me from this ruffian!" she said, with an hysterical sob.

Mr. Beaufort, who had heard from Blackwell strange accounts of Philip's obdurate perverseness, vile associates, and unredeemable character, was roused from his usual timidity by the appeal of his wife.

"Insolent reprobate!" he said, advancing to Philip; "after all the absurd goodness of my son and myself—after rejecting all our offers, and persisting in your miserable and vicious conduct, how dare you presume to force yourself into this house? Begone, or I will send for the constables to remove you!"

"Man—man," cried Philip, restraining the fury that shook him from head to foot, "I care not for your threats—I scarcely hear your abuse: your son or yourself have stolen away my brother; tell me only where he is; let me see him once more. Do not drive me hence without one word of justice—of pity. I implore you—on my knees I implore you—yes, I, I implore you, Robert Beaufort, to have mercy on your brother's son. Where is Sidney?"

Like all mean and cowardly men, Robert Beaufort was rather encouraged than softened by Philip's abrupt humility,

"I know nothing of your brother; and, if this is not all some villanous trick—which it may be—I am heartily rejoiced that he, poor child! is rescued from the contamination of such a companion," answered Beaufort.

"I am at your feet still; again, for the last time, clinging to you, a supplicant: I pray you to tell me the truth."

Mr. Beaufort, more and more exasperated by Morton's forbearance, raised his hand as if to strike; when, at that moment, one hitherto unobserved—one who, terrified by the scene she had witnessed but could not comprehend, had slunk into a dark corner of the room—now came from her retreat. And a child's soft voice was heard, saying,

"Do not strike him, papa! Let him have his brother!"

Mr. Beaufort's arm fell to his side: kneeling before him, and by the outcast's side, was his own young daughter; she had crept into the room unobserved when her father entered.

Through the dim shadows, relieved only by the red and fitful gleam of the fire, he saw her fair meek face looking up wistfully at his own, with tears of excitement, and perhaps of pity—for children have a quick insight into the reality of grief in those not far removed from their own years—glistening in her soft eyes. Philip looked round bewildered; and he saw that face, which seemed to him, at such a time, like the face of an angel.

"Hear her!" he murmured; "oh, hear her! For her sake, do not sever one orphan from the other!"

"Take away that child, Mrs. Beaufort," cried Robert, angrily. "Will you let her disgrace herself thus? And you, sir, begone from this roof; and when you can approach me with due respect, I will give you, as I said I would, the means to get an honest living!"

Philip rose: Mrs. Beaufort had already led away her daughter, and she took that opportunity of sending in the servants: their forms filled up the doorway.

"Will you go," continued Mr. Beaufort, more and more emboldened as he saw the menials at hand, "or shall they expel you?"

"It is enough, sir," said Philip, with a sudden calm and dignity that surprised, and almost awed, his uncle. "My father, if the dead yet watch over the living, has seen and heard you. There will come a day for justice. Out of my path, hirelings!"

He waved his arm, and the menials shrunk back at his tread, stalked across the inhospitable hall, and vanished.

When he had gained the street, he turned and looked up at the house. His dark and hollow eyes, gleaming through the long and raven hair that fell profusely over his face, had in them an expression of menace almost preternatural from its settled calmness; the wild and untutored majesty, which, through rags and squalor, never deserted his form, as it never does the forms of men in whom the will is strong and the sense of injustice deep—the outstretched arm—the haggard, but noble features—the bloomless and scathed youth—all gave to his features and his stature an aspect awful in its sinister and voiceless wrath.

There he stood a moment, like one to whom wo and wrong have given a prophet's power, guiding the eye of the forgetful Fate to the roof of the oppressor. Then slowly, and with a half smile, he turned away, and strode through the streets till he arrived at one of the narrow lanes that intersect the more equivocal quarters of the huge city. He stopped at the private entrance of a small pawnbroker's shop; the door was opened by a slipshod boy; he ascended the dingy stairs till he came to the second floor; and there, in a small back room, he found Captain De Burgh Smith, seated before a table with a couple of candles on it, smoking a cigar, and playing at cards by himself.

"Well, what news of your brother, Bully Phil?"

"None: they will reveal nothing."

"Do you give him up?"

"Never! My hope now is in you!"

"Well, I thought you would be driven to come to me, and I will do something for you that I should not like to do for myself. I told you that I knew the Bow-street runner who was in the barouche. I will find him out—Heavens knows, that is easily done—and, if you can pay well, you will get your news."

"You shall have all I possess if you restore my brother. See what it is—one hundred pounds—it was his fortune. It is useless to me without him. There, take fifty now, and if—"

Philip stopped, for his voice trembled too much to allow him farther speech. Captain Smith thrust the notes into his pocket, and said, "We'll consider it settled."

Captain Smith fulfilled his promise. He saw the Bow-street officer. Mr. Sharp had been bribed too high by the opposite party to tell tales, and he willingly encouraged the suspicion that Sidney was under the care of the Beauforts. He promised, however, for the sake of ten guineas, to procure Philip a letter from Sidney himself. This was all he would undertake.

Philip was satisfied. At the end of another week, Mr. Sharp transmitted to the captain a letter, which he, in his turn, gave to Philip. It ran thus, in Sidney's own sprawling hand:

"Dear Brother Philip,—I am told you wish to know how I am, and therefore take up my pen, and assure you that I write all out of my own head. I am very comfortable and happy—much more so than I have been since poor dear mama died; so I beg you won't vex yourself about me: and pray don't try and find me out. For I would not go with you again for the world. I am so much better off here. I wish you would be a good boy, and leave off your Bad ways; for I am sure, as every one says, I don't know what would have become of me if I had staid with you, Mr. — [the Mr. half-scratched out], the gentleman I am with, says, if you turn out properly, he will be a friend to you too; but he advises you to go, like a Good boy, to Arthur Beaufort, and ask his pardon for the past, and then Arthur will be very kind to you. I send you a great big sum of £20, and the gentleman says he would send more, only it might make you naughty, and set up. I go to church now every Sunday, and read good books, and always pray that God may open your eyes. I have such a nice pony, with such a long tale. So no more at present from your affectionate brother,

"SIDNEY MORTON.

"Oct. 8, 18—,

"Pray, pray don't come after me any more. You know I neerly died of it, but for this dear good gentleman I am with."

So this, then, was the crowning reward of all his sufferings and all his love. There was the letter, evidently undictated, with its errors of orthography, and in the child's rough scrawl: the serpent's tooth pierced to the heart, and left there its most lasting venom.

"I have done with him for ever," said Philip, brushing away the bitter tears. "I will molest him no farther: I care no more to pierce this mystery. Better for him as it is: he is happy. Well, well, and I—I will never care for a human being again."

He bowed his head over his hands, and when he rose, his heart felt to him like stone. It seemed as if Conscience herself had fled from his soul on the wings of departed Love.

CHAPTER XII.

"But you have found the mountain's top: there sit
On the calm, flourishing head of it;
And while with wearied steps we upward go,
See us and clouds below."—COWLEY.

It was true that Sidney was happy in his new home, and thither we must now trace him.

On reaching the town where the travellers in the barouche had been requested to leave Sidney, "The King's Arms" was precisely the inn eschewed by Mr. Spencer. While the horses were being changed, he summoned the surgeon of the town to examine the child, who had already much recovered; and, by stripping his clothes, wrapping him in warm blankets, and administering cordials, he was permitted to reach another stage, so as to baffle pursuit that night; and in three days Mr. Spencer had placed his new charge with his maiden sisters, 150 miles from the spot where he had been found. He would not take him to his own home yet. He feared the claims of Arthur Beaufort. He artfully wrote to that gentleman, stating that he had abandoned the chase of Sidney in despair, and desiring to know if he had discovered him; and a bribe of £300 to Mr. Sharp, with a candid exposition of his reasons for secreting Sidney—reasons in which the worthy officer professed to sympathise—secured the discretion of his ally. But he would not deny himself the pleasure of being in the same house with Sidney, and was therefore, for some months the guest of his sisters. At length he heard that young Beaufort had been ordered abroad for his health, and he then deemed it safe to transfer his new idol to his Lares by the lakes. During this interval, the current of the younger Morton's life had indeed flowed through flowers. At his age the care of females were almost a want as well as a luxury, and the sisters spoiled and petted him as much as any elderly nymphs in Cytherea ever petted Cupid. They were good, excellent, high-nosed, flat-bosomed spinsters, sentimentally fond of their brother, whom they called "the poet," and dotingly attached to children. The cleanness, the quiet, the good cheer of their neat abode, all tended to revive and invigorate the spirits of their young guest, and every one there seemed to vie which should love him the most. Still his especial favourite was Mr. Spencer: for Spencer never went out without bringing back cakes and toys; and Spencer gave him his pony; and Spencer rode a little crop-eared nag by his side; and Spencer, in short, was associated with his every comfort and caprice. He told them his little history; and when he said how Philip had left him alone for long hours together, and how Philip had forced him to his last and nearly fatal journey, the old maids groaned, and the old bachelor sighed, and they all cried in a breath that "Philip was a very wicked boy." It was not only their obvious policy to detach him from his brother, but it was their sincere conviction that they did right to do so. Sidney began, it is true, by taking Philip's part; but his mind was ductile, and he still looked back with a shudder to the hardships he had gone through; and so, by little and little, he learned to forget all the endearing and fostering love Philip had evinced to him; to connect his name with dark and mysterious fears; to repeat thanksgiving to Providence that he was saved from him; and to hope that they might never meet again. In fact, when Mr. Spencer learned from Sharp that it was through Captain Smith, the swindler, that application had been made by Philip for news of his brother, and having also learned before, from the same person, that Philip had been implicated in the sale of a horse, swindled, if not stolen, he saw every additional reason to widen the stream that flowed between the wolf and the lamb. The older Sidney grew, the better he comprehended and appreciated the motives of his protector; for he was brought up in a formal school of propriety and ethics, and his mind naturally revolted from all images of violence or fraud. Mr. Spencer changed both the Christian and the surname of his protégé, in order to elude the search whether of Philip, the Mortons, or the Beauforts, and Sidney passed for his nephew by a younger brother who had died in India.

So there, by the calm banks of the placid lake, amid the fairest landscapes of the island garden, the youngest born of Catharine passed his tranquil days. The monotony of the retreat did not fatigue a spirit which, as he grew up, found occupation in books, music, poetry, and the elegances of the cultivated, if quiet life, within his reach. To the rough past he looked back as to an evil dream, in which the image of Philip stood dark and threatening. His brother's name, as he grew older, he rarely mentioned; and if he did volunteer it to Mr. Spencer, the bloom on his cheek grew paler. The sweetness of his manners, his fair face and winning smile, still combined to secure him love, and to screen from the common eye whatever of selfishness yet lurked in his nature. And, indeed, that fault in so serene a career, and with friends so attached, was seldom called into action. So thus was he severed from both the protectors, Arthur and Philip, to whom poor Catharine had bequeathed him. By a perverse and strange mystery, they to whom the charge was most intrusted were the very persons who were forbidden to redeem it. On our deathbeds, when we think we have provided for those we leave behind, should we lose the last smile that gilds the solemn agony if we could look one year into the Future?

Arthur Beaufort, after, as might be expected, an ineffectual search for Sidney, on returning to his home, heard no unexaggerated narrative of Philip's visit, and listened with deep resentment to his mother's distorted account of the language addressed to her. It is not to be surprised that, with all his romantic generosity, he felt sickened and revolted at violence that seemed to him without excuse. Though not a revengeful character, he had not that meekness which never resents. He looked upon Philip Morton as upon one rendered incorrigible by bad passions and evil company. Still Catharine's last bequest, and Philip's note to him, the unknown comforter, often recurred to him, and he would have willingly yielded had Philip been thrown in his way. But as it was, when he looked around, and saw the examples of that charity that begins at home, in which the world abounds, he felt as if he had done his duty; and prosperity having, though it could not harden his heart, still sapped the habits of perseverance, so by little and little the image of the dying Catharine, and the thought of her sons, faded from his remembrance. And for this there was the more excuse after the receipt of an anonymous letter, which relieved all his apprehensions on behalf of Sidney. The letter was short, and stated simply that Sidney Morton had found a friend who would protect him throughout life, but who would not scruple to apply to Beaufort if ever he needed his assistance. So one son, and that the youngest and the best-loved, was safe. And the other, had he not chosen his own career? Alas, poor Catharine! when you fancied that Philip was the one sure to force his way into fortune, and Sidney the one most helpless, how ill did you judge of the human heart! It was that very strength in Philip's nature which tempted the winds that scattered the blossoms, and shook the stem to its roots; while the lighter and frailer nature bent to the gale, and bore transplanting to a happier soil. If a parent read these pages, let him pause and think well on the characters of his children; let him at once fear and hope the most for the one whose passions and whose temper lead to a struggle with the world. That same world is a tough wrestler, and has a bear's gripe for the poor.

Meanwhile, Arthur Beaufort's own complaints, which grew serious and menaced consumption, recalled his thoughts more and more every day to himself. He was compelled to abandon his career at the University, and to seek for health in the softer breezes of the South. His parents accompanied him to Nice; and when, at the end of a few months, he was restored to health, the desire of travel seized the mind and attracted the fancy of the young heir. His father and mother, satisfied with his recovery, and not unwilling that he should acquire the polish of Continental intercourse, returned to England; and young Beaufort, with gay companions and munificent income, already courted, spoiled, and flattered, commenced his tour with the fair climes of Italy.

So, oh dark mystery of the moral world!—so, unlike the order of the external universe, glide together, side by side, the shadowy steeds of NIGHT AND MORNING. Examine life in its own world: confound not that world, the inner one, the practical one, with the more visible, yet airier and less substantial system, doing homage to the sun, to whose throne, afar in the infinite space, the human heart has no wings to flee. In life, the mind and the circumstance give the true seasons, and regulate the darkness and the light. Of two men standing on the same foot of earth, the one revels in the joyous noon, and the other shudders in the solitude of night. For Hope and Fortune the daystar is ever shining. The “Anmuth-Strahlendes” live ever in the air. For Care and Penury, night changes not with the ticking of the clock or the shadow on the dial. Morning for the heir, night for the houseless, and God's eye in both!

CHAPTER I.

“The knight of arts and industry,
And his achievements fair.”
THOMPSON'S Castle of Inolence; Replematory Verses to C. n. II.
In a popular and respectable, but not very fashionable quartier in Paris, and in the tolerably broad and effective locale of the Rue —, there might be seen, at the time I now treat of, a curious-looking building, that jutted out semicircularly from the neighbouring shops, with plaster pilasters and compo ornaments. The virtuosi of the quartier had discovered that the building was constructed in imitation of an ancient temple in Rome; this erection, then fresh and new, reached only to the entresol. The pilasters were painted light green, and gilded in the cornices, while surmounting the architrave were three little statues—one held a torch, another a bow, and a third a bag; they were therefore rumoured, I know not with what justice, to be the artistical representatives of Hymen, Cupid, and Fortune.

On the door was neatly engraved, on a brass plate, the following inscription:

“MONSIEUR LOVE, ANGLAIS.
A L'ENTRESOL.”

And if you had crossed the threshold, and mounted the stairs, and gained that mysterious story inhabited by Monsieur Love, you would have seen upon another door to the right another epigraph, informing those interested in the inquiry that the bureau of M. Love was open daily, from nine in the morning to four in the afternoon.

The office of M. Love—for office it was, and of a nature not unfrequently designated in the “petites affiches” of Paris—had been established about six months; and, whether it was the popularity of the profession, or the shape of the shop, or the manners of M. Love himself, I cannot pretend to say, but certain it is that the Temple d'Hymen, as M. Love classically termed it, had become exceedingly in vogue in the Faubourg St. —. It was rumoured that no less than nine marriages in the immediate neighbourhood had been manufactured at this fortunate office, and that they had all turned out happily except one, in which the bride being sixty, and the bridegroom twenty-four, there had been rumours of domestic dissension; but, as the lady had been delivered—I mean of her husband, who had drowned himself in the Seine about a month after the ceremony—things had turned out, in the long run, better than might have been expected, and the widow was so little discouraged that she had been seen to enter the office already: a circumstance that was greatly to the credit of Mr. Love.

Perhaps the secret of Mr. Love's success, and of the marked superiority of his establishment in rank and popularity over similar ones, consisted in the spirit and liberality with which the business was conducted. He seemed resolved to destroy all formality between parties who might desire to draw closer to each other, and he hit upon the lucky device of a table d'hôte, very well managed, and held twice a week, and often followed by a soirée dansante; so that, if they pleased, the aspirants to matrimonial happiness might become acquainted without gêne. As he himself was a jolly, convivial fellow of much savoir vivre, it is astonishing how well he made these entertainments answer. Persons who had not seemed to take to each other in the first distant interview grew extremely enamoured when the corks of the Champagne—an extra, of course, in the abonnement—bounced against the wall. Added to this, Mr. Love took great pains to know the tradesmen in his neighborhood; and, what with his jokes, his appearance of easy circumstances, and the fluency with which he spoke the language, he became a universal favourite. Many persons, who were uncommonly starch in general, and who professed to ridicule the bureau, saw nothing improper in dining at the table d'hôte. To those who wished for secrecy he was said to be wonderfully discreet; but there were others who did not affect to conceal their discontent at the single state; for the rest, the entertainments were so contrived as never to shock the delicacy, while they always forwarded the suit.

It was about eight o'clock in the evening, and Mr. Love was still seated at dinner, or, rather, at dessert, with a party of guests. His apartments, though small, were somewhat gaudily painted and furnished, and his dining-room was decorated à la Turque. The party consisted, first, of a rich épicier, a widower, Monsieur Goupille by name, an eminent man in the faubourg; he was in his grand climacteric, but still belhomme; wore a very well made perruque of light auburn, with tight pantaloons, which contained a pair of very respectable calves; and his white neckcloth and his large frill were washed and got up with especial care. Next to Monsieur Goupille sat a very demure and very spare young lady of about two-and-thirty, who was said to have saved a fortune—Heaven knows how—in the family of a rich English milord, where she had officiated as governess; she called herself Mademoiselle Adele de Courval, and was very particular about the de, and very melancholy about her ancestors. Monsieur Goupille generally put his finger through his perruque, and fell away a little on his left pantaloons when he spoke to Mademoiselle de Courval; and Mademoiselle de Courval generally pecked at her bouquet when she answered Monsieur Goupille. On the other side of this young lady sat a fine-looking, fair man, M. de Sovolofski, a Pole, buttoned up to the chin, and rather threadbare, though uncommonly neat. He was flanked by a little fat lady, who had been very pretty, and who kept a boarding-house or pension for the English, she herself being English, though long established in Paris. Rumour said she had been gay in her youth, and dropped in Paris by a Russian nobleman, with a very pretty settlement—she and the settlement having equally expanded by time and season; she was called Madame Beavor. On the other side of the table was a red-headed Englishman, who spoke very little French; who had been told that French ladies were passionately fond of light hair; and who, having £2000 of his own, intended to quadruple that sum by a prudent marriage. Nobody knew what his family was, but his name was Higgins. His neighbour was an exceedingly tall, large-boned Frenchman, with a long nose and a red riband, who was much seen at Frescati's, and had served under Napoleon. Then came another lady, extremely pretty, very piquante and very gay, but past the première jeunesse, who ogled Mr. Love more than she did any of his guests: she was called Rosalie Caumartin, and was at the head of a large bonbon establishment; married, but her husband had gone four years ago to the Isle of France, and she was a little doubtful whether she might not be justly entitled to the privileges of a widow. Next to Mr. Love, in the place of honour, sat no less a person than the Vicomte de Vaudemont, a French gentleman really well-born, but whose various excesses, added to his poverty, had not served to sustain that respect for his birth which he considered due to it. He had already been twice married; once to an Englishwoman, who had been decoyed by the title; by this lady, who died in childbed, he had one son; a fact which he sedulously concealed from the world of Paris by keeping the unhappy boy, who was now some eighteen or nineteen years old, a perpetual exile in England. Monsieur de Vaudemonte did not wish to pass for more than thirty, and he considered that to produce a son of eighteen would be to make the lad a monster of ingratitude by giving the lie every hour to his own father! In spite of this precaution, the vicomte found great difficulty in getting a third wife, especially as he had no actual and visible income; was, not seamed, but ploughed up with the small pox; small of stature, and was considered more than un peu bete. He was, however, a prodigious dandy, and wore a lace frill and embroidered waistcoat. Mr. Love's vis-à-vis was Mr. Birnie, an Englishman, a sort of assistant in the establishment, with a hard, dry, parchment face, and—a remarkable talent for silence. The host himself was a splendid animal; his vast chest seemed to occupy more space at the table than any four of his guests, yet he was not corpulent nor unwieldy; he was dressed in black, wore a velvet stock very high, and four gold studs glittered in his shirt-front; he was bald to the crown, which made his forehead appear singularly lofty, and what hair he had left was a little grayish and curled; his face was shaved smoothly except a close-clipped mustache; and his eyes, though small, were bright and piercing. Such was the party.

"These are the best bonsbons I ever ate," said Mr. Love, glancing at Madame Caumartin. "My fair friends have compassion on the table of a poor bachelor."

"But you ought not to be a bachelor, Monsieur Love," replied the fair Rosalie, with an arch look; "you, who make others marry, should set the example."

"All in good time," answered Mr. Love, nodding; "one serves one's customers to so much happiness that one has none left for one's self."

Here a loud explosion was heard. Monsieur Goupille had pulled one of the bonbon crackers with Mademoiselle Adèle.

"I've got the motto!—no—monsieur has it; I'm always unlucky," said the gentle Adèle.

The épicier solemnly unrolled the little slip of paper; the print was very small, and he longed to take out his spectacles, but he thought that would make him look old. However, he spelled through the motto with some difficulty:

"Comme elle fait soumettre un cœur
En refusant son doux hommage,
On peut traiter la coquette en vainqueur
De la beauté modeste on chérit l'esclavage."

"I present it to mademoiselle," said he, laying the motto solemnly in Adèle's plate, upon a little mountain of chestnut-husks.

"It is very pretty," said she, looking down.

"It is very à propos whispered the épicier, caressing the perruque a little too roughly in his emotion. Mr. Love gave him a kick under the table, and put his finger to his own bald head, and then to his nose, significantly. The intelligent épicier smoothed back the irritated perruque.

"Are you fond of bonsbons, Mademoiselle Adèle? I have a very fine stock at home," said Monsieur Goupille.

Mademoiselle Adèle de Courval sighed, "Hélas! they remind me of happier days. When I was a petite, and my dear grandmamma took me in her lap, and told me how she escaped the guillotine—she was an émigrée, and you know her father was a marquis."

The épicier bowed and looked puzzled. He did not quite see the connection between the bonsbons and the guillotine.

"You are triste, monsieur," observed Madame Beavor, in rather a piqued tone, to the Pole, who had not said a word since the rôti.

"Madame, an exile is always triste: I think of my pauvre pays."

"Bah!" cried Mr. Love. "Think that there is no exile by the side of a belle dame."

The Pole smiled mournfully.

"Pull it," said Madame Beavor, holding a cracker to the patriot, and turning away her face.

"Yes, madame; I wish it were a cannon in defence of La Pologne."

With this magniloquent aspiration, the gallant Sovolofski pulled lustily, and then rubbed his fingers with a little grimace, observing that crackers were sometimes dangerous, and that the present combustible was d'une force immense.

"Hélas! J'ai cru jusqu'à ce jour Pouvoir triompher de l'amour," said Madame Beavor, reading the motto. "What do you say to that?"

"Madame, there is no triumph for La Pologne!"

Madame Beavor uttered a little peevish exclamation, and glanced in despair at her red-headed countryman, "Are you, too, a great politician, sir!" said she, in English.

"No, mem! I'm all for the ladies."

"What does he say?" asked Madame Caumartin.

"Monsieur Higgins est tout pour les dames."

"To be sure he is," cried Mr. Love; "all the English are, especially with that coloured hair; a lady who likes a passionate adorer should always marry a man with gold-coloured hair—always. What do you say, Mademoiselle Adèle?"

"Oh, I like fair hair," said mademoiselle, looking bashfully askew at Monsieur Goupille's perruque. "Grandmamma said her papa—the marquis—used yellow powder: it must have been very pretty."

"Rather à la sucre d'orge remarked the épicier, smiling on the right side of his mouth, where his best teeth were.

Mademoiselle de Courval looked displeased. "I fear you are a republican, Monsieur Goupille?"

"I, mademoiselle? No, I'm for the Restoration;" and again the épicier perplexed himself to discover the association of idea between republicanism and sucre d'orge.

"Another glass of wine. Come, another," said Mr. Love, stretching across the vicomte to help Madame Caumartin.

"Sir," said the tall Frenchman with the riband, eyeing the épicier with great disdain, "you say you are for the Restoration—I am for the Empire—Moi!"

"No politics!" cried Mr. Love. "Let us adjourn to the salon."

The vicomte, who had seemed supremely ennuyé during this dialogue, plucked Mr. Love by the sleeve as he rose, and whispered petulantly, "I do not see any one here to suit me, Monsieur Love—none of my rank."

"Mon Dieu!" answered Mr. Love; "point d'argent, point Suisse. I could introduce you to a duchess, but then the fee is high. There's Mademoiselle de Courval—she dates from the Carolingians."

"She is very like a boiled sole," answered the vicomte, with a wry face. "Still—what dower has she?"

"Forty thousand francs, and sickly," replied Mr. Love; "but she likes a tall man, and Monsieur Goupille is—"

"Tall men are never well made," interrupted the vicomte, angrily; and he drew himself aside as Mr. Love, gallantly advancing, gave his arm to Madame Beavor, because the Pole had, in rising, folded both his arms across his breast.

"Excuse me, ma'am," said Mr. Love to Madame Beavor, as they adjourned to the salon, "I don't think you manage that brave man well."

"Ma foi, comme il est ennuyeux avec sa Pologne," replied Madame Beavor, shrugging her shoulders.

"True, but he is a very fine shaped man; and it is a comfort to think that one will have no rival but his country. Trust me, and encourage him a little more; I think he would suit you to a T."

Here the garçon engaged for the evening announced Monsieur and Madame Giraud; whereupon there entered a little—little couple, very fair, very plump, and very like each other. This was Mr. Love's show couple—his decoy ducks—his last best example of match-making; they had been married two months out of the bureau, and were the admiration of the neighbourhood for their conjugal affection. As they were now united, they had ceased to frequent the table d'hôte; but Mr. Love often invited them after the dessert, pour encourager les autres.

"My dear friends," cried Mr. Love, shaking each by the hand, "I am ravished to see you. Ladies and gentlemen, I present to you the happiest couple in Christendom; if I had done nothing else in my life but to bring them together, I should not have lived in vain!"

The company eyed the objects of this eulogium with great attention.

"Monsieur, my prayer is to deserve my bonheur," said Monsieur Giraud.

"Cher ange!" murmured madame: and the happy pair seated themselves next to each other.

Mr. Love, who was all for those innocent pastimes which do away with conventional formality and reserve, now proposed a game at "Hunt the Slipper," which was welcomed by the whole party except the Pole and the vicomte; though Mademoiselle Adèle looked prudish, and observed to the épicier "that Monsieur Love was so droll! but she should not have liked her pauvre grand-maman to see her."

The vicomte had stationed himself opposite to Mademoiselle de Courval, and kept his eyes fixed on her very tenderly.

"Mademoiselle, I see, does not approve of such bourgeois diversions," said he.

"No, monsieur," said the gentle Adèle. "But I think we must sacrifice our own tastes to those of the company."

"It is a very amiable sentiment," said the épicier.

"It was one attributed to grandmamma's papa, the Marquis de Courval. It has become quite a hackneyed remark since," said Adèle.

"Come, ladies," said the joyous Rosalie, "I volunteer my slipper."

"Sisseyez-vous donc," said Madame Beavor to the Pole. "Have you no games of this sort in Poland?"

"Madame, La Pologne is no more," said the Pole. "But with the swords of her brave—"

"No swords here, if you please," said Mr. Love, putting his vast hands on the Pole's shoulders, and sinking him forcibly down into the circle now formed.

The game proceeded with great vigour and much laughter from Rosalie, Mr. Love, and Madame Beavor, especially whenever the last thumped the Pole with the heel of the slipper.

Monsieur Giraud was always sure that Madame Giraud had the slipper about her, which persuasion on his part gave rise to many little endearments, which are always so innocent among married people. The vicomte and the épicière were equally certain the slipper was with Mademoiselle Adèle, who defended herself with much more energy than might have been supposed in one so gentle. The épicière, however, grew jealous of the attentions of his noble rival, and told him that he *gêné*d mademoiselle; whereupon the vicomte called him an impertinent; and he tall Frenchman with the red riband sprung up and said,

"Can I be of any assistance, gentlemen?"

Therewith Mr. Love, the great peacemaker, interposed, and, reconciling the rivals, proposed to change the game to Colin Maillard, Anglice, 'Blind Man's Buff.' Rosalie clapped her hands, and offered herself to be blindfolded. The tables and chairs were cleared away; and Madame Beavor pushed the Pole into Rosalie's arms, who, having felt him about the face for some moments, guessed him to be the tall Frenchman. During his time Monsieur and Madame Giraud hid themselves behind the window-curtain.

"Amuse yourself, mon ami," said Madame Beavor to the liberated Pole.

"Ah, madam," sighed Monsieur Sovolofski, "how can I be gay! All my property confiscated by the Emperor of Russia! Has La Pologne no Brutus?"

"I think you are in love," said the host, clapping him on the back.

"Are you quite sure," whispered the Pole to the matchmaker, "that Madame Beavor has vingt mille livres de rentes?"

"Not a sous less."

The Pole mused, and glancing at Madame Beavor, said, "And yet, madame, your charming gaiety consoles me amid all my sufferings;" upon which Madame Beavor called him "flatterer," and rapped his knuckles with her fan; the latter proceeding the brave Pole did not seem to like, for he immediately buried his hands in his trowsers pockets.

The game was now at its meridian. Rosalie was uncommonly active, and flew about here and there, much to the harassment of the Pole, who repeatedly wiped his forehead, and observed that it was warm work, and put him in mind of the last sad battle for La Pologne. Monsieur Goupille, who had lately taken lessons in dancing, and was vain of his agility, mounted the chairs and tables, as Rosalie approached, with great grace and gravity. It so happened that in these salutations he ascended a stool near the curtain behind which Monsieur and Madame Giraud were ensconced. Somewhat agitated by a slight fluttering behind the folds, which made him fancy, on the sudden panic, that Rosalie was creeping that way, the épicière made an abrupt pirouette, and the hook on which the curtains were suspended caught his left coat-tail:

"The fatal gesture left the unguarded side:"

just as he turned to extricate the garment from that dilemma, Rosalie sprung upon him, and naturally lifting her hands to that height where she fancied the human face divine, took another extremity of Monsieur Goupille's graceful frame, thus exposed, by surprise.

"I don't know who this is. Quelle drôle de visage!" muttered Rosalie.

"Mais, madame," faltered Monsieur Goupille, looking greatly disconcerted.

The gentle Adèle, who did not seem to relish this adventure, came to the relief of her wooer, and pinched Rosalie very sharply in the arm.

"That's not fair. But I will know who this is," cried Rosalie, angrily; "you sha'n't escape!"

A sudden and universal burst of laughter roused her suspicions—she drew back—and exclaiming, "Mais quelle mauvaise plaisanterie; c'est trop fort!" applied her fair hand to the place in dispute with so hearty a good-will, that Monsieur Goupille uttered a dolorous cry, and sprang from the chair, leaving the coat-tail (the cause of all his woe) suspended upon the hook.

It was just at this moment, and in the midst of the excitement caused by Monsieur Goupille's misfortune, that the door opened, and the garçon reappeared, followed by a young man in a large cloak.

The new-comer paused at the threshold, and gazed around him in evident surprise.

"Diable!" said Mr. Love, approaching, and gazing hard at the stranger. "Is it possible? You are, then, come at last? Welcome!"

"But," said the stranger, apparently still bewildered, "there is some mistake; you are not—"

"Yes, I am Mr. Love!—Love all the world over. How is our friend Gregg? Told you to address yourself to Mr. Love, eh? Mum! Ladies and gentlemen, an acquisition to our party. Fine fellow, eh? Five feet eleven without his shoes, and young enough to hope to be thrice married before he dies. When did you arrive?"

"To-day."

And thus Philip Morton and Mr. William Gawtreay met once more.

CHAPTER II.

"Happy the man who, void of care and strife
In silken or in leathern purse retains A splendid shilling!"—The Splendid Shilling.

"And wherefore should they take or care for thought,
The unreasoning vulgar willing to obey,
And leaving toil and poverty behind,
Run forth by different ways, the blissful boon to find."
—Wast's Education.

"Poor boy! your story interests me. The events are romantic, but the moral is practical, old, everlasting—life, boy, life. Poverty by itself is no such great curse; that is, if it stops short of starving. And passion by itself is a noble thing, sir; but poverty and passion together—poverty and feeling—poverty and pride—poverty, not of birth, but reverse; and the man who ousts you out of your easy-chair, kicking you with every turn he takes, as he settles himself more comfortably—why, there's no romance in that—hard every-day life, sir! Well, well: so, after your brother's letter, you resigned yourself to that fellow Smith."

"No; I gave him my money, not my soul. I turned from his door with a few shillings that he himself thrust into my hand, and walked on—I cared not whither—out of the town, into the fields, till night came; and then, just as I suddenly entered on the high road, many miles away, the moon rose, and I saw by the hedgeside something that seemed like a corpse: it was an old beggar, in the last stage of raggedness, disease, and famine. He had lain himself down to die. I shared with him what I had, and helped him to a little inn. As he crossed the threshold, he turned round and blessed me. Do you know, the moment I heard that blessing, a stone seemed rolled away from my heart. I said to myself,

'What then! even I can be of use to some one; and I am better off than that old man, for I have youth and health.' As these thoughts stirred in me, my limbs, before heavy with fatigue, grew light; a strange kind of excitement seized me. I ran on gaily beneath the moonlight that smiled over the crisp, broad road. I felt as if no house, not even a palace, were large enough for me that night. And when, at last wearied out, I crept into a wood and laid myself down to sleep, I still murmured to myself, 'I have youth and health.' But in the morning, when I rose, I stretched out my arms, and missed my brother! . . . In two or three days I found employment with a farmer; but we quarreled after a few weeks, for once he wished to strike me; and, somehow or other, I could work, but not serve. Winter had begun when we parted—oh, such a winter! Then—then I knew what it was to be houseless. How I lived for some months—if to live it can be called—it would pain you to hear, and humble me to speak. At last, I found myself again in London; and one evening, not many days since, I resolved at last—for nothing else seemed left, and I had not touched food for two days—to come to you."

"And why did that never occur to you before?"

"Because," said Philip, with a deep blush, "because I trembled at the power over my actions and my future life that I was to give to one whom I was to bless as a benefactor, yet distrust as a guide."

"Well," said Love or Gawtreay, with a singular mixture of irony and compassion in his voice, "and it was hunger, then, that terrified you at last, even more than I?"

"Perhaps hunger, or perhaps rather the reasoning that comes from hunger. I had not, I say, touched food for two days; and I was standing on that bridge from which, on one side, you see the palace of a head of the Church, on the other the towers of the Abbey, within which the men I have read of in history lie buried. It was a cold, frosty evening, and the river below looked bright with the lamps and stars. I leaned, weak and sickening, against the wall of the bridge; and in one of the arched recesses beside me a cripple held out his hat for pence. I envied him! He had a livelihood; he was inured to it, perhaps bred to it; he had no shame. By a sudden impulse, I too turned abruptly round, held out my hand to the first passenger, and started at the shrillness of my own voice as it cried 'Charity.'"

Gawtreay threw another log on the fire, looked complacently round the comfortable room, and rubbed his hands. The young man continued:

"You should be ashamed of yourself. I've a great mind to give you up to the police," was the answer, in a pert and sharp tone. I looked up, and saw the livery my father's menials had worn. I had been begging my bread from Robert Beaufort's lackey! I said nothing; the man went on his business on tiptoe, that the mud might not splash above the soles of his shoes. Then thoughts so black that they seemed to blot out every star from the sky—thoughts I had often wrestled against, but to which I now gave myself up with a sort of mad joy—seized me, and I remembered you. I had still preserved the address you gave me; I went straight to the house. Your friend, on naming you, received me kindly, and, without question, placed food before me—pressed on me clothing and money—procured me a passport—gave me your address—and now I am beneath your roof. Gawtreys, I know nothing yet of the world but the dark side of it. I know not what to deem of you! but, as you alone have been kind to me, so it is to your kindness rather than your aid that I now cling—your kind words and kind looks—yet—” he stopped short and breathed hard.

“Yet you would know more of me. Faith, my boy, I cannot tell you more at this moment. I believe, to speak fairly, I don't live exactly within the pale of the law. But I'm not a villain! I never plundered my friend, and called it play! I never murdered my friend, and called it honour! I never seduced my friend's wife, and called it gallantry!” As Gawtreys said this, he drew the words out, one by one, through his grinded teeth, paused, and resumed more gaily, “I struggle with Fortune—voilà tout! I am not what you seem to suppose—exactly a swindler, certainly not a robber! But, as I before told you, I am a charlatan: so is every man who strives to be richer or greater than he is. I too want kindness as much as you do. My bread and my cup are at your service. I will try and keep you unsullied, even by the clean dirt that now and then sticks to me. On the other hand, youth, my young friend, has no right to play the censor; and you must take me as you take the world, without being over scrupulous and dainty. My present vocation pays well; in fact, I am beginning to lay by. My real name and past life are thoroughly unknown, and, as yet, unsuspected in this quartier; for, though I have seen much of Paris, my career hitherto has passed in other parts of the city; and, for the rest, own that I am well disguised! What a benevolent air this bald forehead gives me, eh? True,” added Gawtreys, somewhat more seriously, “if I saw how you could support yourself in a broader path of life than that in which I pick out my own way, I might say to you, as a gay man of fashion might say to some sober stripling—nay, as many a dissolute father says (or ought to say) to his son, ‘It's no reason you should be a sinner because I am not a saint.’ In a word, if you were well off in a respectable profession, you might have safer acquaintances than myself. But as it is, upon my word as a plain man, I don't see what you can do better.” Gawtreys made this speech with so much frankness and ease, that it seemed greatly to relieve the listener; and when he wound up with, “What say you? In fine, my life is that of a great schoolboy, getting into scrapes for the fun of it, and fighting his way out as he best can! Will you see how you like it?” Philip, with a confiding and grateful impulse, put his hand into Gawtreys's. The host shook it cordially, and without saying another word, showed his guest into a little cabinet where there was a sofa-bed, and they parted for the night.

The new life upon which Philip Morton entered was so odd, so grotesque, and so amusing, that at his age it was perhaps natural that he should not be clear-sighted as to its danger.

William Gawtreys was one of those men who are born to exert a certain influence and ascendancy wherever they may be thrown; his vast strength, his redundant health, had a power of themselves—a moral as well as physical power. He naturally possessed high animal spirits, beneath the surface of which, however, at times there was visible a certain under-current of malignity and scorn. He had evidently received a superior education, and could command at will the manners of a man not unfamiliar with a politer class of society. From the first hour Philip had seen him on the top of the coach on the R—road, this man had attracted his curiosity and interest; the conversation he had heard in the churchyard, the obligations he owed to Gawtreys in his escape from the officers of justice, the time afterward passed in his society till they separated at the little inn, the rough and hearty kindness Gawtreys had shown him at that period, and the hospitality extended to him now, all contributed to excite his fancy, and in much—indeed, very much—entitled this singular person to his gratitude. Morton, in a word, was fascinated; this man was the only friend he had made. I have not thought it necessary to detail to the reader the conversations that had taken place between them during that passage of Morton's life when he was before for some days Gawtreys's companion; yet those conversations had sunk deep in his mind. He was struck, and almost awed, by the profound gloom which lurked under Gawtreys's broad humour: a gloom, not of temperament, but of knowledge. His views of life, of human justice and human virtue, were (as, to be sure, is commonly the case with men who have had reason to quarrel with the world) dreary and despairing; and Morton's own experience had been so sad, that these opinions were more influential than they could ever have been with the happy. However, in this, their second reunion, there was a greater gaiety than in their first; and, under his host's roof, Morton insensibly, but rapidly, recovered something of the early and natural tone of his impetuous and ardent spirits. Gawtreys himself was generally a boon companion; their society, if not select, was merry. When their evenings were disengaged, Gawtreys was fond of haunting cafés and theatres, and Morton was his companion; Birnie (Mr. Gawtreys's partner) never accompanied them. Refreshed by this change of life, the very person of this young man regained its bloom and vigour, as a plant, removed from some choked atmosphere and unwholesome soil, where it had struggled for light and air, expands on transplanting: the graceful leaves burst from the long, drooping boughs, and the elastic crest springs upward to the sun in the glory of its young prime. If there was still a certain fiery sternness in his aspect, it had ceased, at least, to be haggard and savage; it even suited the character of his dark and expressive features. He might not have lost the something of the tiger in his fierce temper, but in the sleek hues and the sinewy symmetry of the frame he began to put forth also something of the tiger's beauty.

Mr. Birnie did not sleep in the house; he went home nightly to a lodging at some little distance. We have said but little about this man, for, to all appearance, there was little enough to say; he rarely opened his own mouth except to Gawtreys, with whom Philip often observed him engaged in whispered conferences, to which he was not admitted. His eye, however, was less idle than his lips; it was not a bright eye; on the contrary, it was dull, and, to the unobservant, lifeless, of a pale blue, with a dim film over it—the eye of a vulture; but it had in it a calm, heavy, stealthy watchfulness, which inspired Morton with great distrust and aversion. Mr. Birnie not only spoke French like a native, but all his habits, gestures, his tricks of manner were French; not the French of good society, but more idiomatic, as it were, and popular. He was not exactly a vulgar person—he was too silent for that—but he was evidently of low extraction and coarse breeding; his accomplishments were of a mechanical nature; he was an extraordinary arithmetician; he was a very skilful chemist, and kept a laboratory at his lodgings; he mended his own clothes and linen with incomparable neatness. Philip suspected him of blacking his own shoes—but that was prejudice. Once he found Morton sketching horses' heads—pour se désennuyer; and he made some short criticisms on the drawings which showed him well acquainted with the art. Philip, surprised, sought to draw him into conversation; but Birnie eluded the attempt, and observed that he had once been an engraver.

Gawtreys himself did not seem to know much of the early life of this person, or, at least, he did not seem to like much to talk of him. The footstep of Mr. Birnie was gliding, noiseless, and catlike; he had no sociality in him—enjoyed nothing—drank hard, but was never drunk. Somehow or other, he had evidently over Gawtreys an influence little less than Gawtreys had over Morton, but it was of a different nature. Morton had conceived an extraordinary affection for his friend; while Gawtreys seemed secretly to dislike Birnie, and to be glad whenever he quitted his presence. It was, in truth, Gawtreys's custom, when Birnie retired for the night, to rub his hands, bring out the punch bowl, squeeze the lemons, and while Philip, stretched on the sofa, listened to him, between sleep and waking, to talk on for the hour together, often till day-break, with that bizarre mixture of knavery and feeling, drollery and sentiment, which made the dangerous charm of his society.

One evening, as they thus sat together, Morton, after listening for some time to his companion's comments on men and things, said abruptly, “Gawtreys! there is so much in you that puzzles me, so much which I find it difficult to reconcile with your present pursuits, that, if I ask no indiscreet confidence, I should like greatly to hear some account of your early life. It would please me to compare it with my own; when I am your age, I will then look back and see what I owed to your example.”

“My early life! Well—you shall hear it. It will put you on your guard, I hope, betimes against the two rocks of youth—love and friendship.” Then, while squeezing the lemon into his favourite beverage, which Morton observed he made stronger than usual, Gawtreys thus commenced

THE HISTORY OF A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.

CHAPTER III.

“All his success must on himself depend.
He had no money, counsel, guide, or friend;
With spirit high, John learn'd the world to brave,
And in both senses was a ready knave.”—C. B. B.

“My grandfather sold walking-sticks and umbrellas in the little passage by Exeter Change; he was a man of genius and speculation. As soon as he had scraped together a little money, he lent it to some poor devil with a hard landlord at twenty per cent., and made him take half the loan in umbrellas or bamboo. By these means he got his foot into the ladder, and climbed upward and upward, till at the age of forty, he had amassed 5000*l.* He then looked about for a wife. An honest trader in the Strand, who dealt largely in cotton prints, possessed an only daughter; this young lady had a legacy, from a great aunt, of 3220*l.*, with a small street in St. Giles's, where the tenants paid weekly (all thieves or rogues—all, so their rents were sure.) Now my grandfather conceived a great friendship for the father of this young lady; gave him a hint as to a new pattern in spotted cottons; enticed him to take out a patent, and lent him 700*l.* for the speculation; applied for the money at the very moment cottons were at their worst, and got the daughter instead of the money; by which exchange, you see, he won 2520*l.*, to say nothing of the young lady. My grandfather then entered into partnership with the worthy trader, carried on the patent with spirit, and begat two sons. As he grew older, ambition seized him: his sons should be gentlemen: one was sent to College, the other put into a marching regiment. My grandfather meant to die worth a plum; but a fever he caught, in visiting his tenants in St. Giles's, prevented him, and he only left 20,000*l.*, equally divided between the sons. My father, the College man" (here Gawtreys paused a moment, took a large draught of the punch, and resumed with a visible effort)—"my father the College man, was a person of rigid principles—bore an excellent character—had a great regard for the world. He married early and respectably. I am the sole fruit of that union; he lived soberly; his temper was harsh and morose, his home gloomy: he was a very severe father, and my mother died before I was ten years old. When I was fourteen, a little old Frenchman came to lodge with us; he had been persecuted under the old régime for being a philosopher; he filled my head with odd crotchets, which, more or less, have stuck there ever since. At eighteen I was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge. My father was rich enough to have let me go up in the higher rank of a pensioner, but he had lately grown avaricious; he thought that I was extravagant; he made me a sizar, perhaps to spite me. Then, for the first time, those inequalities in life which the Frenchman had dinned into my ears met me practically. A sizar! another name for a dog! I had such strength, health, and spirits, that I had more life in my little finger than half the fellow-commoners—gentle, spindle-shanked striplings, who might have passed for a collection of my grandfather's walking-canes—had in their whole bodies. And I often think," continued Gawtreys, "that health and spirits have a great deal to answer for! When we are young we so far resemble savages—who are Nature's young people—that we attach prodigious value to physical advantages. My feats of strength and activity—the clouds I thrashed, and the railings I leaped, and the boat-races I won—are they not written in the chronicle of St. John's? These achievements inspired me with an extravagant sense of my own superiority; I could not but despise the rich fellows whom I could have blown down with a sneeze. Nevertheless, there was an impassable barrier between me and them: a sizar was not a proper associate for the favourites of Fortune! But there was one young man, a year younger than myself, of high birth, and the heir to considerable wealth, who did not regard me with the same supercilious insolence as the rest; his very rank, perhaps, made him indifferent to the little conventional formalities which influence persons who cannot play at football with this round world; he was the wildest youngster in the university—lamp-breaker—tandem-driver—mob-fighter—a very devil, in short—clever, but not in the reading line—small and slight, but brave as a lion. Congenial habits made us intimate, and I loved him like a brother—better than a brother—as a dog loves his master. In all our rows I covered him with my body. He had but to say to me, 'Leap into the water,' and I would not have stopped to pull off my coat. In short, I loved him as a proud man loves one who stands betwixt him and contempt—as an affectionate man loves one who stands between him and solitude. To cut short a long story, my friend, one dark night, committed an outrage against discipline of the most unpardonable character. There was a sanctimonious, grave old fellow of the College crawling home from a tea-party; my friend and another of his set seized, blindfolded, and handcuffed this poor wretch; carried him, vi et armis, back to the house of an old maid whom he had been courting for the last ten years, fastened his pig-tail (he wore a long one) to the knocker, and so left him. You may imagine the infernal hubbub which his attempts to extricate himself caused in the whole street; the old maid's old maid-servant, after emptying on his head all the vessels of wrath she could lay her hand to, screamed 'rape and murder!' The proctor and his bulldogs came up, released the prisoner, and gave chase to the delinquents, who had incautiously remained near to enjoy the sport. The night was dark, and they reached the College in safety, but they had been tracked to the gates. For this offence I was expelled."

"Why, you were not concerned in it?" said Phi.

"No; but I was suspected and accused. I could have got off by betraying the true culprits; but my friend's father was in public life—a stern, haughty old statesman: young Lilburne was mortally afraid of him—the only person he was afraid of. If I had too much insisted on my innocence, I might have set enquiry on the right track. In fine, I was happy to prove my friendship for him. He shook me most tenderly by the hand on parting, and promised never to forget my generous devotion. I went home in disgrace: I need not tell you what my father said to me; I do not think he ever loved me from that hour. Shortly after this, my uncle, George Gawtreys, the captain, returned from abroad: he took a great fancy to me, and I left my father's house (which had grown insufferable) to live with him. He had been a very handsome man—a gay spendthrift; he had got through his fortune, and now lived on his wits—he was a professed gambler. His easy temper, his lively humour fascinated me; he knew the world well; and, like all gamblers, was generous when the dice were lucky—which, to tell you the truth, they generally were with a man who had no scruples. Though his practices were a little suspected, they had never been discovered. We lived in an elegant apartment, mixed familiarly with men of various ranks, and enjoyed life extremely. I brushed off my college rust, and conceived a taste for expense: I knew not why it was, but in my new existence every one was kind to me; to be sure, they were all ne vaut rien, and I had spirits that made me welcome everywhere. I was a scamp—but a frolicsome scamp—and that is always a popular character. As yet I was not dishonest, but saw dishonesty around me, and it seemed a very pleasant, jolly mode of making money; and now I again fell into contact with the young heir. My college friend was as wild in London as he had been at Cambridge; but the boy-ruffian, though not then twenty years of age, had grown into a man-villain."

Here Gawtreys paused and frowned darkly.

"He had great natural parts, this young man—much wit, readiness, and cunning, and he became very intimate with my uncle. He learned of him how to play the dice and to pack the cards—he paid him £1000 for the knowledge!"

"How! a cheat? You said he was rich."

"His father was very rich, and he had a liberal allowance, but he was very extravagant; and rich men love gain as well as poor men do! He had no excuse but the grand excuse for all vice—SELFISHNESS. Young as he was, he became the fashion, and he fattened upon the plunder of his equals, who desired the honour of his acquaintance. Now I had seen my uncle cheat, but I had never imitated his example; when the man of fashion cheated, and made a jest of his earnings and my scruples—when I saw him courted, flattered, honoured, and his acts unsuspected, because his connections embraced half the peerage, the temptation grew strong, but I still resisted it. However, my father always said I was born to be a good-for-nothing, and I could not escape my destiny. And now I suddenly fell in love: you don't know what that is yet—so much the better for you. The girl was beautiful, and I thought she loved me—perhaps she did—but I was too poor, so her friends said, for marriage. We courted, as the saying is, in the mean while. It was my love for her, my wish to deserve her, that made me iron against my friend's example. I was fool enough to speak to him of Mary—to present him to her: this ended in her seduction." (Again Gawtreys paused and breathed hard.) "I discovered the treachery—I called out the seducer; he sneered, and refused to fight the lowborn adventurer. I struck him to the earth, and then we fought; I was satisfied by a ball through my side! but he," added Gawtreys, rubbing his hands, and with a vindictive chuckle, "he was a cripple for life! When I recovered, I found that my foe, whose sick chamber was crowded with friends and comforters, had taken advantage of my illness to ruin my reputation. He, the swindler, accused me of his own crime: the equivocal character of my uncle confirmed the charge. Him, his own highborn pupil was enabled to unmask, and his disgrace was visited on me. I left my bed to find my uncle (all disguise over) an avowed partner in a hell; and myself, blasted alike in name, love, past and future. And then, Philip—then I recommenced that career which I have trodden since, the prince of good-fellows and good-for-nothings, with ten thousand aliases, and as many strings to my bow. Society cast me off when I was innocent. Egad, I have had my revenge on society since! Ho! ho! ho!"

The laugh of this man had in it a moral infection. There was a sort of glorying in its deep tone; it was not the hollow hysteric of shame and despair—it spoke a sanguine joyousness! William Gawtreys was a man whose animal constitution had led him to take animal pleasure in all things: he had enjoyed the poisons he had lived on.

"But your father—surely your father—"

"My father," interrupted Gawtreys, "refused me the money (but a small sum) that, once struck with the strong impulse of a sincere penitence, I begged of him to enable me to get an honest living in an humble trade: his refusal soured the penitence; it gave me an excuse for my career; and conscience grapples to an excuse as a drowning wretch to a straw. And yet this hard father—this cautious, moral, money-loving man—three months afterward, suffered a rogue—almost a stranger—to decoy him into a speculation that promised to bring him fifty per cent.: he invested in the traffic of usury what had sufficed to save a hundred such as I am from perdition, and he lost it all; it was nearly his whole fortune, but he lives, and has his luxuries still: he cannot speculate, but he can save: he cared not if I starved, for he finds an hourly happiness in starving himself."

"And your friend," said Philip, after a pause, in which his young sympathies went dangerously with the excuses for his benefactor, "what has become of him, and the poor girl?"

"My friend became a great man; he succeeded to his father's peerage—a very ancient one—and to a splendid income. He is living still. Well, you shall hear about the poor girl! We are told of victims of seduction dying in a workhouse or on a dunghill, penitent, broken-hearted, and uncommonly ragged and sentimental; may be a frequent case, but it is not the worst. It is worse, I think, when the fair, penitent, innocent, credulous dupe becomes in her turn the deceiver; when she catches vice from the breath upon which she has hung; when she ripens, and mellows, and rots away into painted, blazing, staring, wholesale harlotry; when, in her turn, she ruins warm youth with false smiles and long bills; and when, worse, worse than all, when she has children—daughters, perhaps—brought up to the same trade, cooped, plumped for some hoary lecher, without a heart in their bosoms, unless a balance for weighing money may be called a heart: Mary became this; and I wish to Heaven she had rather died in an hospital! Her lover polluted her soul as well as her body: he found her another lover when he was tired of her. When she was at the age of thirty-six, I met her in Paris with a daughter of sixteen. I was then flush with money, frequenting salons, and playing the part of a fine gentleman; she did not know me at first, and she sought my acquaintance. For you must know, my dear friend," said Gawtrety, abruptly breaking off the thread of his narrative, "that I am not altogether the low dog you might suppose in seeing me here. At Paris—ah! you don't know Paris—there is a glorious ferment in society, in which the dregs are often uppermost. I came here at the Peace; and here have I resided the greater part of each year ever since. The vast masses of energy and life, broken up by the great thaw of the Imperial system, floating along the tide, are terrible icebergs for the vessel of the state. Some think Napoleonism over: its effects are only begun. Society is shattered from one end to the other, and I laugh at the little rivets by which they think to keep it together. But to return: Paris, I say, is the atmosphere for adventurers; new faces and new men are so common here that they excite no impertinent enquiry, it is so usual to see fortunes made in a day and spent in a month; except in certain circles, there is no walking round a man's character to spy out where it wants piecing! Some lean Greek poet put lead in his pockets to prevent being blown away; put gold in your pockets, and at Paris you may defy the sharpest wind in the world—yea, even the breath of that old Æolus—Scandal! Well, then, I had money—no matter how I came by it—and health, and gaiety; and I was well received in the coteries that exist in all capitals, but mostly in France, where pleasure is the cement that joins many discordant atoms: here, I say, I met Mary, and her daughter by my old friend—the daughter, still innocent, but, sacré! in what an element of vice! We knew each other's secrets, Mary and I, and kept them: she thought me a greater knave than I was, and she intrusted to me her intention of selling her child to a rich English marquis.

On the other hand, the poor girl confided to me her horror of the scenes she witnessed and the snares that surrounded her. What do you think preserved her pure from all danger? Bah! you will never guess! It was partly because, if example corrupts, it as often deters, but principally because she loved. A girl who loves one man purely has about her an amulet which defies the advances of the profligate. There was a handsome young Italian, an artist, who frequented the house—he was the man. I had to choose, then, between mother and daughter: I chose the last."

Philip seized hold of Gawtrety's hand, grasped it warmly, and the Good-for-nothing continued:

"Do you know that I loved that girl as well as I had ever loved the mother, though in another way? She was what I had fancied the mother to be; still more fair, more graceful, more winning, with a heart as full of love as her mother's had been of vanity. I loved that child as if she had been my own daughter; I induced her to leave her mother's house—I secreted her—I saw her married to the man she loved—I gave her away, and saw no more of her for several months."

"Why?"

"Because I spent them in prison! The young people could not live upon air; I gave them what I had, and, in order to do more, I did something which displeased the police. I narrowly escaped that time; but I am popular—very popular; and, with plenty of witnesses, not over scrupulous, I got off! When I was released, I would not go to see them, for my clothes were ragged: the police still watched me, and I would not do them harm in the world! Ay, poor wretches! they struggled so hard: he could get very little by his art, though I believe he was a cleverish fellow at it, and the money I had given them could not last for ever. They lived near the Champs Elysées, and at night I used to steal out and look at them through the window. They seemed so happy, and so handsome, and so good; but he looked sickly, and I saw that, like all Italians, he languished for his own warm climate. But man is born to act as well as to contemplate," pursued Gawtrety, changing his tone into the allegro, "and I was soon driven into my old ways, though in a lower line. I went to London just to give my reputation an airing; and when I returned, pretty flush again, the poor Italian was dead, and Fanny was a widow, with one boy, and enceinte with a second child. So then I sought her again, for her mother had found her out, and was at her with her devilish kindness; but Heaven was merciful, and took her away from both of us: she died in giving birth to a girl, and her last words were uttered to me, imploring me—the adventurer—the charlatan—the good-for-nothing—to keep her child from the clutches of her own mother. Well, sir, I did what I could for both the children; but the boy was consumptive, like his father, and sleeps at Père la Chaise. The girl is here—you shall see her some day. Poor Fanny! if ever the devil will let me, I shall reform for her sake; meanwhile, for her sake, I must get grist for the mill. My story is concluded, for I need not tell you of all my pranks—of all the parts I have played in life. I have never been a murderer, or a burglar, or a highway robber, or what the law calls a thief. I can only say as I said before, I have lived upon my wits, and they have been a tolerable capital on the whole. I have been an actor, a money-lender, a physician, a professor of animal magnetism (that was lucrative till it went out of fashion—perhaps it will come in again); I have been a lawyer, a house-agent, a dealer in curiosities and china; I have kept a hotel; I have set up a weekly newspaper; I have seen almost every city in Europe, and made acquaintance with some of its jails: but a man who has plenty of brains generally falls on his legs."

"And your father?" said Philip: and here he informed Gawtrety of the conversation he had overheard in the churchyard, but on which a scruple of natural delicacy had hitherto kept him silent.

"Well, now," said his host, while a slight blush rose to his cheeks, "I will tell you, that though to my father's sternness and avarice I attribute many of my faults, I yet always had a sort of love for him; and when in London, I accidentally heard that he was growing blind, and living with an artful old jade of a housekeeper, who might send him to rest with a dose of magnesia the night after she had coaxed him to make a will in her favour, I sought him out—and—But you say you heard what passed?"

"Yes; and I heard him also call you by name when it was too late, and I saw the tears on his cheeks."

"Did you? Will you swear to that!" exclaimed Gawtrety, with vehemence; and then shading his brow with his hand, he fell into a reverie that lasted some moments. "If anything happen to me, Philip," he said abruptly, "perhaps he may yet be a father to poor Fanny; and if he takes to her, she will repay him for whatever pain I may, perhaps, have cost him. Stop! now I think of it, I will write down his address for you—never forget it—there! It is time to go to bed."

Gawtrety's tale made a deep impression on Philip. He was too young, too inexperienced, too much borne away by the passion of the narrator, to see that Gawtrety had less cause to blame Fate than himself. True, he had been unjustly implicated in the disgrace of an unworthy uncle; but he had lived with that uncle, though he knew him to be a common cheat: true, he had been betrayed by a friend; but he had before known that friend to be a man without principle or honour. But what wonder that an ardent boy saw nothing of this—saw only the good heart that had saved a poor girl from vice, and sighed to relieve a harsh and avaricious parent? Even the hints that Gawtrety unawares let fall, of practices scarcely covered by the jovial phrase of "a great schoolboy's scrapes," either escaped the notice of Philip, or were charitably construed by him, in the compassion and the ignorance of a young, hasty, and grateful heart.

CHAPTER IV.

"And she's a stranger!
Women—beware women."—MIDDLETON.

"As we love our youngest children best,
So the last fruit of our affection,
Wherever we bestow it, is most strong;
Since 'tis indeed our latest harvest-home,
Last merriment 'fore winter!"

WEBSTER: Droit's Law Case.

"I would fain know what kind thing a man's heart is!
I will report it to you: 'tis a thing framed
With divers corners!"—ROWLEY.

I have said that Gawtrety's tale made a deep impression on Philip; that impression was increased by subsequent conversations, more frank even than their talk had hitherto been. There was certainly about this man a fatal charm which concealed his vices. It arose, perhaps, from the perfect combination of his physical frame; from a health which made his spirits buoyant and hearty under all circumstances; and a blood so fresh, so sanguine, that it could not fail to keep the pores of the heart open. But he was not the less—for all his kindly impulses and generous feelings, and despite the manner in which, naturally anxious to make the least unfavourable portrait of himself to Philip, he softened and glossed over the practices of his life—a thorough and complete rogue; a dangerous, desperate, reckless dare-devil: it was easy to see when anything crossed him, by the cloud on his shaggy brow, by the swelling of the veins on the forehead, by the dilation of the broad nostril, that he was one to cut his way through every obstacle to an end—choleric, impetuous, fierce, determined; such, indeed, were the qualities that made him respected among his associates, as his more bland and humorous ones made him beloved: he was, in fact, the incarnation of that great spirit which the laws of the world raise up against the world, and by which the world's injustice, on a large scale, is awfully chastised; on a small scale, merely nibbled at and harassed, as the rat that gnaws the hoof of the elephant: the spirit which, on a vast theatre, rises up, gigantic and sublime, in the heroes of war and revolution—in Mirabeaus, Marats, Napoleons; on a minor stage, it shows itself in demagogues, fanatical philosophers, and mob-writers; and on the forbidden boards, before whose reeking lamps outcasts sit, at once audience and actors, it never produced a knave more consummate in his part, or carrying it off with more buskined dignity, than William Gawtrety. I call him by his aboriginal name; as for his other appellations, Bacchus himself had not so many!

One day a lady, richly dressed, was ushered by Mr. Birnie into the bureau of Mr. Love, alias Gawtrety. Philip was seated by the window, reading, for the first time, the "Candide;" that work, next to "Rasselas," the most hopeless and gloomy of the sports of genius with mankind. The lady seemed rather embarrassed when she perceived Mr. Love was not alone. She drew back, and, drawing her veil still more closely around her, said in French,

"Pardon me, I would wish a private conversation."

Philip rose to withdraw, when the lady, observing him with eyes whose lustre shone through the veil, said gently,

"But perhaps the young gentleman is discreet."

"He is not discreet, he is discretion!—my adopted son. You may confide in him—upon my honour you may, madam!" and Mr. Love placed his hand on his heart.

"He is very young," said the lady, in a tone of involuntary compassion, as, with a very white hand, she unclasped the buckle of her cloak.

"He can the better understand the curse of celibacy," returned Mr. Love, smiling.

The lady lifted part of her veil, and discovered a handsome mouth, and a set of small, white teeth; for she too smiled, though gravely, as she turned to Morton and said,

"You seem, sir, more fitted to be a votary of the temple than one of its officers. However, Monsieur Love, let there be no mistake between us: I do not come here to form a marriage, but to prevent one. I understand that Monsieur the Vicomte de Vaudemont has called into request your services. I am one of the vicomte's family; we are all anxious that he should not contract an engagement of the strange, and, pardon me, unbecoming character which must stamp a union formed at a public office."

"I assure you, madam," said Mr. Love, with dignity, "that we have contributed to the very first—"

"Mon Dieu!" interrupted the lady, with much impatience, "spare me a eulogy on your establishment: I have no doubt it is very respectable; and for grisettes and épicières may do extremely well. But the vicomte is a man of birth and connections. In a word, what he contemplates is preposterous. I know not what fee Monsieur Love expects; but if he contrive to amuse Monsieur de Vaudemont, and to frustrate every connection he proposes to form, that fee, whatever it may be, shall be doubled. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly, madam; yet it is not your offer that will bias me, but the desire to oblige so charming a lady."

"It is agreed, then?" said the lady, carelessly; and, as she spoke, she again glanced at Philip.

"If madame will call again, I will inform her of my plans," said Mr. Love.

"Yes, I will call again. Good-morning!"

As she rose and passed Philip, she wholly put aside her veil, and looked at him with a gaze entirely free from coquetry, but curious, searching, and perhaps admiring: the look that an artist may give to a picture that seems of more value than the place where he finds it would seem to indicate. The countenance of the lady herself was fair and noble, and Philip felt a strange thrill at his heart, as, with a slight inclination of her head, she turned from the room.

"Ah!" said Gawtrety, laughing, "this is not the first time I have been paid by relations to break off the marriages I had formed. Egad! if one could open a bureau to make married people single, one would be a Cræsus in no time! Well, then, this decides me to complete the union between Monsieur Goupille and Mademoiselle de Courval. I had balanced a little hitherto between the épicier and the vicomte. Now I will conclude matters. Do you know, Phil, I think you have made a conquest?"

"Pooh!" said Philip, colouring.

In effect, that very evening Mr. Love saw both the épicier and Adele, and fixed the marriage-day. As Monsieur Goupille was a person of great distinction in the faubourg, this wedding was one that Mr. Love congratulated himself greatly upon; and he cheerfully accepted an invitation for himself and his partners to honour the noces with their presence.

A night or two before the day fixed for the marriage of Monsieur Goupille and the aristocratic Adele, when Mr. Birnie had retired, Gawtrety made his usual preparations for enjoying himself. But this time the cigar and the punch seemed to fail of their effect; Gawtrety remained moody and silent; and Morton was thinking of the bright eyes of the lady who was so much interested against the amours of the Vicomte de Vaudemont.

At last Gawtrety broke silence:

"My young friend," said he, "I told you of my little protégé!—I have been buying toys for her this morning—she is a beautiful creature: to-morrow is her birthday—she will then be six years old. But—but—" here Gawtrety sighed, "I fear she is not all right here," and he touched his forehead.
